California has passed through two devilish and disastrous years, and what makes the fact more humiliating to confess is that there has been no necessity and no real cause for the stagnation. During all these later years, while the East has been seeing hard times, we enjoyed a measure of uninterrupted prosperity; but just as everything began to recuperate elsewhere we went to work and deliberately took the epidemic, and went to bed with it, and a hard time we have had of it. It has been a short but a malignant, and, thank God, not a fatal attack. We say there has not been any necessity for hard times on this coast, and there has not. Our mines—with the exception of the bonanzas—have yielded their usual revenue. Our last two years' crops have been fairly remunerative. The last year has been an abundant one with good prices. Wheat, grapes, wool, and hops have brought exceptional prices; there has been no necessity for the depreciation of values. There has been a cause, and it is in the people. We have been cowards, and have allowed Kearney and the sand-lot to frighten us. We ought to have murdered this Irish blackguard and swept the criminals and loafers from the sand-lot with shotguns. We have been gambling: too many people, neglecting their legitimate occupations, have been betting on the rise and fall of mining stocks. We have neglected our duties as citizens, and allowed the rabble to run away with the ballot-box, and while we have been quarreling whether Republicans or Democrats should get office a set of hybrid politicians have stolen into place. Californians are of all people the worst in the world to endure a set-back. We endure prosperity splendidly. We are cheerful winners, but most unhappy losers. We have in our mind's eye a person who delights in poker—when he wins he is most amiable. He takes his opponent's money with even hilarity; his wit flows in exhaustless measure; jokes, repartee, and brilliant sarcasms follow each other in endless succession. But when the luck turns and he loses, he becomes sour and silent, then irascible and quarrelsome, then noisy and insolent, and then, if he is quite certain that his challenge to personal combat will be arrested by friends, he will almost persuade himself that he is brave enough to draw a pistol or knife. It is a good deal that way with us as a community. We are all gamblers, and so long as the luck runs our way we are in the most exuberant spirits. We spend our money like princes. But a little set-back and we get blue and despondent; we lose our grip; courage oozes out of our fingers' ends; we sweat great drops of anxiety, our muscle relaxes; everything looks blue, and instead of courageously meeting reverses we look around for somebody to blame. If the season is over dry or over wet, we quarrel with God; if idleness and crime run away with the ballot-box, we blame Kearney; if stock gambling pans out badly, we curse Flood and the bonanza firm; if we get drunk and have the headache, we find fault with the liquor. It never occurs to us that the fault is in ourselves. We have struggled through the two devilish and disastrous years, and the discipline has done us good. We shall be better for it when we get well.

Times are already improving. Merchants that gambled and lost their money in mining stocks are now attending to their legitimate employments, and if they would be half as adventurous and risk half the money in sending ships to the Pacific islands, they would find a return for their risks, and would better deserve the name of merchants. If we had more manufacturers and less speculators; if some of the money hazarded at real estate and other speculations was risked in manufacturing the thousand and one articles in demand that are now imported, times would be flush. If there was less stock-gambling and more mining, times would improve; and if mechanics and laboring men would cure themselves of the idea of becoming suddenly rich by betting on a stock rise, there would be less disaster. If the money sent out of California to search for and open mines, were expended on the western slope of the Sierra from Jackson County, Oregon, to Arizona, there would be no end of our prosperity. If the Railroad Company would send its branches up through our foot hills, that mining, and grape culture, and fruit raising might be encouraged, it would be a wise thing for the Company and the State. If the Nevada Bank and the bonanza kings, instead of investing their millions in Government 4-per-cent. bonds, would lend it to our people for the encouragement of local enterprises at 5 or 6 per cent., it would be better for the borrowers and for the lenders. If our agitators would leave politics and go to work, it would be better for them. If they would not indulge their appetites for gin, but would drink pure California wine, it would improve their purses and their tempers. If the wine growers would plant more vines, be more honest in labeling their wines, be more careful in gaining for them a reputation, it would become the greatest and most profitable industry of California. Grape culture, embracing raisins, will, in ten years, exceed any other single industry of the Pacific Coast. It will beat gold and silver, or grain. If our fruit-growers would dry and can their fruits, and show some little sense and judgment, they might lay the foundation of a great and profitable industry. If our newspapers and immigration societies would cease misrepresenting California, and let it alone, and let its immigration come from healthful and natural causes, it would be better and more sensible. We have people enough here now, and we do not want any more unless they are industrious, have money, and come prepared to labor. Of the lower class of European foreigners, we need no more, and of Asiatics, we need none. The great trouble with California is that it has no contented class. There is no portion of the community that is willing to simply live. All desire to get rich.

The new year promises well. It looks as though the cloud had passed over, and that we were to have a good year. One of the most cheering indications is that we have reached a period when a panic in the stock market does not seriously affect other business; we are narrowing our gamblers down to a class, and stocks no longer carry everything else up or down as they may themselves be inflated or depressed. The milking process does not reach as widely as it did; laborers, mechanics, manufacturers, merchants, and professional men do not come up to Pine Street to be milked with their wonted regularity. The last and most disastrous decline in Comstock values caused the failure of no business man or firm, and the generally expressed opinion of the public is delight at the collapse, and there is also a general and freely expressed hope that they will never advance. The Comstock Lode will be worked—at least we think so—for generations yet to come; it will be carried down to marvelous depths by the new and constantly improving machinery. As a remunerative working lode the Comstock has a brilliant future, but so long as there is a class of gamblers who simply bet upon the rise or fall of its stocks, just so long it will be manipulated to catch their money. We look forward to a decline in stock gambling, or at least think it will be confined to a stock-gambling class, as in New York, Paris, London, Amsterdam, or Frankfort, or wherever there is a Bourse. We have but scant sympathy for the man or woman who loses at stock speculating. We regard as a doubly-dyed idiot and fool the man who will play at the game when his opponent sees both hands, and has every deal, and the cards marked.

Mining is a great and splendid and legitimate industry, and the money honestly and intelligently invested in it is as worthily risked as that expended for seed wheat or vine cuttings. There are hundreds of mines in California being now diligently worked, of which no mention is made, of which no report is ever heard, that are making money. There are thousands of quartz ledges, river beds, gravel banks, all along our Sierra, that will make the men who work them rich, and we doubt whether in amount of capital as much is demanded as to establish a good sized farm, dairy, vineyard, or hop ranch; and we doubt whether the risk is any greater in working them. A little science, a good deal of sense, some money, hard labor, and personal attention would open many valuable mines that are now entirely neglected in California.

The most promising thing for the future is the now demonstrated fact that small farming is more profitable than large farming. Colonies distributed over the State have illustrated the fact that by organized, united, and intelligent effort industrious families can live and flourish and grow fat on twenty or forty acres of land. Many of our great plains, seemingly almost deserts, and in dry seasons barren of vegetation, become under irrigation gardens, and produce all that the family may demand in way of luxury and comfort. From the north to San Bernardino along the coast, and along the plains, these colonies have been established, and in nearly every instance have proved successful. It demands judgment to select the location, money to purchase and pay for the land, so that there may be no debt, industry to work it, and enough of good nature on the part of the colonist to agree not to disagree, and to cooperate in all matters where cooperation and united effort will produce better results than individual action. In all cases of irrigated land the water should belong to the land.

For thirty years we have been endeavoring to reclaim tule lands, and are just beginning to begin to know how to do it. Reclamation is expensive. It must be thorough; but ten acres of well reclaimed and well cultivated fresh-water tule land is in itself a fortune to an industrious family. The river banks of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin will in time be a busy hive of agricultural industry. The plains will be irrigated, and they will be the homes of a vast people; the foot-hills, less productive, but more beautiful in climate, and more delightful for homes than plain or swamp, will be teeming with a cultivated and busy population. The mountains to their heights will be mined for precious metals. The Bay of San Francisco, with its commerce and its manufactures, its cities and its suburban villages, its beautiful city and village homes, will be the centre of a splendid and prosperous population that shall equal any in the world. Nevada and Arizona will pour their treasures into its lap, Oregon and Washington Territory will contribute, and it will not be many years until we shall look back to the two disastrous years of 1878 and 1879, and wonder that we permitted small troubles to vex us, and such slight reverses to make us question the resources and destiny of our marvelous State.

The Reverend Mayor in God, the Honorable Baptist preacher of the Tabernacle, received his first political black eye from the Board of Supervisors on Tuesday evening. It was the Reverend Honorable's first veto message, passed over his clerical head by a vote of eleven to one. He undertook to say that thirty thousand people who have been and will be taxed more than four millions of dollars for the opening of Montgomery Avenue, and who are now expending $50,000 for sewers on Union Street, should not be allowed to build themselves a cable road, and have a horse-car attachment to the water front. For an illogical, undignified, untrue, and jumbled-up piece of demagogical clap-trap, we commend this olla-podrida of stump speech and pulpit oratory to that portion of the Mayor's friends who know how to read. The remarks of Messrs. Stetson, Mason, Schottler and Torrey, giving their reasons for overriding the veto, were sound and business-like. They were based upon propositions that are incontrovertible. The statement and the charges of the Hon. C. L. Taylor should not pass unanswered by Mr. Kallach, and we commend him, upon his return from Los Angeles, to rise to a question of privilege, and explain that he is not a liar, and did not, on the 24th, promise not to veto the ordinance, and did not say, on the 26th, that he had not vetoed it, the message having been written on the 25th. And while the Reverend Mayor is on his feet, let him explain why he withheld his message over a regular Board, if not to play a trick worthy of a preacher, but altogether unbecoming to a respectable politician. We regard the Mayor of the sand-lot as a thoroughly bad egg, and shall not be fooled by his opposition to one road—that does not pay—in the interest of other corporations—which do pay. We shall not be fooled by his opposition to the Laguna de Merced water scheme, to think that he will not favor some bigger job when the time comes. This man of accident, demagoguery, and bad shooting, will bear watching. We prophesy now that the Bulletin will not be licking Mayor Kallach the smooth way of the hair for very long.

Our new officials are in a quandary concerning their obligation to refund a portion of their salary. They affect to believe that there are legal difficulties in the way of doing what they have promised, and perhaps there are. So far as we are concerned we shall be quite willing that they keep their salaries if they prove honest, industrious, and economical in the administration of their offices. Salaries are too high, and should be reduced by the Legislature. The Workingmen in the Legislature will have power to pass such a law, and neither Democrats nor Republicans will dare oppose them. The attitude of Auditor Dunn in this matter is entirely creditable to him. The views of Sheriff Desmond, as expressed to the Ward Presidents, on Tuesday evening, commands our best approval. His utterances were brave and manly; they sound well, and have an honest ring in them. We hope he means what he says, and says what he means. He says:

"At the time of my nomination I was requested to take the salary pledge. I did so; but if I had been asked whether or not I regarded it as wise and politic, I should have said emphatically that it was not. The party seems to have discovered this. But since I took the pledge I shall endeavor to keep it. I will try and return the money into the treasury—that's all. But there is something else I wish to say. Ever since my election you have importuned me with demands for office. I have promised the people an administration of honest reform, and you shall have it. But I will let neither you nor anybody else interfere with my duties. I shall run the Sheriff's office to suit myself. You are the most inconsistent set of men that ever I met. Your party platform discourages office-seeking, and yet you have gone down on your knees before me begging appointments. I speak plainly to you; I don't care how you may think about me. Before I would lower myself as you have done I would jump into the Bay. I give you fair notice now, after to-day, no one need come to me for appointments. I want you to leave me in peace. I understand my duties toward the city and toward my bondsmen, and shall endeavor to fulfill them. Your interference in my affairs is not warranted, and I do not want it. As regards the return of my salary, I shall attempt to comply with my pledge, but I do not want your advice on it. If the Convention and the party has done a foolish act the blame lies with them, and not with me, for you do not know yourselves what shall be done."

It is but just for us to say that we think the Workingmen's portion of the city officers, are, as a body, doing their duty. The Sheriff, the Auditor, the Tax Collector, and, we presume, the Treasurer, City and County Surveyor, and Public Administrator are giving general satisfaction. We are not sufficiently partisan not to be glad of it, and we hope not to be so prejudiced, or unreasonable, or ungenerous as not to be willing to admit the truth when it tells to the advantage of officials whose election we have sincerely and honestly opposed. In reference to Mr. Kallach and his conduct in vetoing our Presidio Railroad, we confess to a personal feeling. For twenty-four years, through mud and darkness, in poverty and on foot, the writer has trudged back and forth from home to office, and from office to home; for years no public streets, no sidewalks, no railroads, no gas lights. He has been bled to death in paying assessments for grading, sewerage, sidewalk and curbing streets upon land that has no market value because inaccessible. Old man Casbolt has cursed that part of the city with his blacksmith engineering. The Gas Company gives us the worst gas at the highest price. The Omnibus, and North Beach and Mission Railroad Companies say we shall not lay a track upon Montgomery Avenue that we have been taxed to open; and when, finally, we have the hope of a cable road, this Baptist preacher sits down upon us, and we squeal; we squeal for ourselves, and vicariously for our neighbors. There are not less than thirty thousand of us, men, women, and children, who want a road to the Presidio. We have it, and we are indignant that Mayor Kallach have struck us a foul blow under the pretense of being a friend of the people and the enemy of the city. His conscience is too thin.

ASHES.

Soft and still, cold and gray,
A pile of ashes before me lies;
I, motionless, wonder if they will stir,
When the first faint breath of morn shall rise.

All night long I have watched them fall,
Softly and silently, one by one:
A gray, cold mass, 'neath the blackening grate.
They all have fallen—my watch is done.

Some hours ago, when I lit the fire,
(Is it hours or years I have passed since then?)
My heart beat high with a strong desire—
A love, a hope, like other men.

The cheery flame leaped quick and high,
As if it waited the touch of my hand,
And flashed a reply to my inmost thought—
I almost think it did understand.

What pictures I saw in the glowing coals!
What a truthful glimpse bright thoughts can be!
And mine were bright as the dancing flame,
As they painted me pictures fair to see.

What was it that dimmed the pictures' glow?
A letter—a marvel of delicate art.
We have both been quite mistaken, and so
You must see it is better that we should part."

'Twas a dainty sheet, like a rose leaf, pale;
Its breath of perfume filled all the air:
Since I crushed it in my bruising hand,
There's a scent of rose-leaves everywhere.

"Give it to me," the fierce flame cried.
I smoothed it out, and kissed it thrice,
Then laid it upon the glowing coals—
It was turned to ashes in a trice.

O God! how it writhed in the flame's hot grasp;
I strove with my might its mad course to stay.
Then I knew by the coldness I felt within,
It was my heart that had burned away.

There is no flower when the root is dead.
What need of hope when the heart is gone?
So I said farewell to my hopes so bright,
And burned them to ashes one by one.

They were sweet as the first warm breath of June,
And fair as the blossom on Alpine snow—
My hand was ice, and my lips were dumb,
As I yielded them up to the crimson glow.

My fair, false love, could you see them now,
The heart and the hopes that were yours before,
Would you care, I wonder, that naught remains
But ashes piled on a marble floor?

The night is past, the day dawns fair;
Below, the street echoes with busy tread.
I open the door, and leave behind
Only a pile of ashes—dead.

HUMMING-BIRD HILL.

[CONCLUDED FROM LAST NUMBER.]

CHAPTER III.

About Christmas time Jeanie went to Oakland to make a long visit, "and shake off the shadows," she said. To Rob's disgust, and Dick's despair, they soon discovered that Mr. Dunallan had also "gone to Oakland to visit a friend."

"Rob, he's absolutely gone on her, ain't he?" groaned Dick. "I am afraid he is, Dick, and I'm afraid that she's gone, too. Oh, what consummate fools girls can be!"

"But, Rob, you don't think Jeanie's a fool for all that. You know, and I know, that she is choosing like a wise girl. There isn't a girl in the county but would jump half out of her senses to get such a match as Dunallan. No use to hate him for it, though I come mighty near it sometimes—damn him!" exploded Dick. "Why, what have I to offer her but this hole in the mountains? If I could get rid of it and try my luck elsewhere—but it's no use, I'll never light on another such fool as Dick Stevens," and he gave the logs a desperate poke that sent a shower of sparks flying up the chimney.

Through the great glowing arch Rob looked far away into infinity.

"Seems to me," said he, slowly, "the first thing a girl ought to think of, is whether she can love a fellow for himself, and then be willing to take up with any fortune that falls to him, and fight it out on that line."

"But if a girl finds a rich man lovable, I don't suppose his money ought to be an objection. You ain't fair, Rob; Dunallan is a million times more worthy and more pleasing than I, rich or poor. O Rob, I'm nothing but a scrub, anyway. I've knocked about, rough and tumble, ever since I was knee high to a grasshopper."

"You're pretty soft hearted, old boy; but if you had a heart of stone I could make it ache by telling you some of the experiences I've passed through, especially in my young days. A man don't mind hard times so much; but to see a little chap—a child—that ought to be saying his prayers at his mother's knee, and kissed, and cared for, and kept from evil—to see him fighting for his little standing place on this old foot-stool, blue and pinched with cold and hunger, hustled and thrust about here and there by great hulking brutes, I tell you it's pretty tough!"

"But Dunallan—blast him!—has had nothing to do but take the good and the beautiful things that life has thrust in his way—learning, culture, elegance, all that many and many a poor devil has grubbed out, at the cost of life maybe, for such as he. And he'll give Jeanie a beautiful life, God bless her! And so—God bless him!"

"Dick, how good you are!" said Rob, looking at him proudly. "To be so just and generous in spite of the natural bitterness of your heart—that is, I mean anybody's heart under the circumstances, Mr. Biffin—it's what I call manliness, and religion, too. I'm afraid I shouldn't be equal to it if any one should come between Rose and me like that."

"Hello, boys!" shouted Jerry at the door. It was Christmas eve, and he had been to Calistoga for the mail. The boys sprang to the door. "Ef you'll take these yer passels for the mare in the stable. Ve orter seen her a comin' 'round hills; ef she didn't jest put. Durn it all," he cried, "away at the packages, 'my pockets is plumb full. 'Rob's stuff in here, 'n there's a box fer him tied on 'saddle; I reck'n it's some Christmas fixin' from his gal."

"Oh, confound you, Jerry, hand 'em over; don't keep a fellow waiting so long," cried impatient Rob.

"Go slow, youngster; plenty o' time; termorrer's a holiday. There ye hev 'em—now, pitch in!"

Talk about female curiosity. No school girls ever went at a box from home more eagerly than the two boys set about opening Rob's box.

"It's from Jeanie, anyway," said Rob; "that's her fist."

Dick sat down. But he furtively possessed himself of the bit of paper that bore the address—it seemed almost as if he were touching the hand that wrote it.

"There's cotton enough here for a bed quilt," said Rob, unrolling the folds of pink and white, till he at last disclosed two china cups and saucers, most beautifully decorated. One cup bore a scarlet California thistle and a spray of wild oats; in the bottom was a single cherry on its stem; the saucer had grasses and butterflies. The other cup had humming-birds, and a spray of forget-me-not on the coral handle; on the saucer some tiny butterflies hovered over blue nemophila.

"Don't they make a fellow's hands feel like bear's paws?" said Rob, carefully putting down the dainty things.

"I reckon coffee'd taste pooty good out o' them," said Jerry; "but I shouldn't dast to wash no such jimcracks."

"Well, here goes for the letter," said Rob.

"DEAR ROBBIE!"

"M-m-m-m-m-m-m-m-m!" mumbled Rob. "Oh, yes; here—"

"I've been learning to decorate China, and send you the first cups that I did, as a Xmas gift. You can give one to your friend, Dick, if you want to; I suppose you won't have any difficulty in finding out which is most appropriate for you! I thought you'd like to make him a present, and I knew you couldn't find anything decent in Calistoga."

"Ruling passion, etc.," laughed Rob; "but, to continue:"

"I am having a lively, pleasant time, and getting my soul brimming full of music, Robbie; I always think of you when I am listening to it—of you and your Dick, sitting together before the fireplace, Jerry at the corner, and that little antiquated cat fast asleep on the hearth, and the old black tea-kettle humming away at one side. Sometimes I feel kind of homesick, and wish I could sit there with you and hear Dick sing his sweet old songs, and laugh at one of Jerry's yarns, and at your saucy slang, you dear old scallawag! And oh, Robbie, I'm just dying to get hold of my violin; do go and say something to it for me. I have just written to mother, inclosing Hugh's letter from Thunders Bay. Who knows! We may all be rich yet; I say 'we,' for I know that if any good fortune comes to dear old Hugh he will take us all in. But there, I haven't another minute to waste on you. Give my love to Rose, and remember me to all Humming-Bird Hill, with merry Xmas to you all!"

"Yours, JEANIE."

"P.S.—Mr. D. is in town. I see him quite often. You needn't be surprised at any news I have to tell you about him."

Rob and Dick looked at each other; the red waves rushed over Dick's face, and receded, leaving it white and despairing as a sullen sea. He folded his arms upon the table and leaned his head upon them. Rob looked at him with a rueful face, in speechless pity.

"Boys, that gal don't marry no Mister D.," said Jerry, whom they had forgotten; "that is, if y'll excuse me fer puttin' in my yawn; but I can't help seein' which way the land lays. I've had a little experience in observin' this yer sort o' thing, an' I tell you love'll go whar it's sent; 'n' little Jane ain't headed toward no Mister D.; now, you mind what I tell ye."

"I'm afraid you're wrong this time, Jerry," said Rob.

"Well, now, what'll ye bet?"

"I don't think it's much of a job for bettin' on, Jerry; but, seen' its you, I'll bet you a box of cigars to a gallon of Clotz's wine."

"Tain't much of a bet, but it'll do for me," said Jerry, calmly.

"Why, hello! What's this?" said Rob, as he drew from the box a white silk handkerchief, with Jerry's initials embroidered in scarlet and gold in one corner, and his name in full on a bit of paper pinned to it.

Jerry rose up, red and bashful, to receive it, first rubbing his great hands on his overalls. "Wall, naow, ef she ain't the gawdurndest gal! By thunder, Rob, I'll go ye two gallons on her!"

Dick jammed his hat over his eyes and went out; he had never, in all his orphaned, homeless life, felt so desolate; up and down in the moonlight he walked, and listened to the first,

"In most familiar cadence with the howl,
The thunder, and the hiss of homeless streams,
Mingling their solemn song."

Dick always went to Nature with his troubles; she soothed and comforted him by first sympathizing with him; she never tried, with finely-drawn logic, to show him how unreasonable he was; but, like a tender mother, took him to her heart, and listened to his plaint. There, feeling himself enfolded by her love, he was calmed and strengthened. It was late that night when he entered the house—Rob and Jerry had been long asleep.

After that, Rob and Dick seldom spoke together of Jeanie; it was a sort of funereal topic that Rob didn't know how to manage; but he had a hundred mute ways of showing his sympathy for Dick, who understood him and was grateful. Mother Dalkeith, too, understood how matters were; and her heart yearned with pity for the poor fellow, but she was too wise to interfere. And so, like the manly fellow that he was, Dick struggled on in silence with his bitterest disappointment.

"It's just like death," thought he; "you get over it after a while—that is, you get to feel calmly about it, and feel resigned, and all that; but there's always the grave. 'Disappointment in love'—People laugh at that, yet it has sent to the devil more men, and women, too, than anything else in the world, I guess, except whisky, and maybe politics. But I don't mean to go the devil for any woman; I'll brace up and show the girl that I am worth her respect anyway. She shan't laugh at me. She wouldn't feel like doing that, though—she's far too tender-hearted. Oh, my little Jeanie, the sweetest girl God ever made!" he exclaimed, in a transport of love and pain. "If only she had been meant for me! and it does seem as though she was. God bless her, anyway!"

So the winter slipped by, with alternating rain and sunshine; the land was tropical in its verdure. Pale, venture-some wild flowers peered out here and there from tangles of fern and briar; the bees were in crowds about the manzanitas—but Jeanie did not come. How long it seemed!

There was good news from Thunders Bay about that time: Hugh was coming home. "The mine is sold," he wrote, "and my share is enough to set us all a spinning! Put on your best cap and gown, mother, and give your old clothes to the poor!"

"An' ye shall walk in silk attire,
An' gold an' siller hae to spare."

"And my bonnie Jeanie shall live wherever she likes; and when she gets married she shall have a dower that will make her sweet eyes shine."

"As to Rob, the rascal! tell him to pick out his ranch."

"And ye'll all be gay when Johnny comes marchin' home."

CHAPTER IV.

And forth the cockow gan proceede anon,
With "Benedictus" thanking God in haste,
That in this May would visit them echon,
And gladden them all while the feast shal last.
And therewithal a laughter out he brast,
"I thank it God that I should end the song,
And all the service that hath been so long."—Chaucer.

April had set the hills and meadows thick with blossoms, and, her fairy task performed, was giving place to May.

And Jeanie had come! Oh, how glad they were to have her, and how happy she was to be at home again! She whirled through the house like a spring breeze; she danced a mad jig with Rob; she caught the mother's face in her two little hands, and looked deep down into her smiling, tender eyes.

"Oh, my minnie!" she cried, "you are the blessedest, sweetest auld mither that ever I had; how could I stay away so long! Robbie, reach me down my voice, till I find if she's glad to see me or no;" and Jeanie lifted her violin from its case. She drew the bow caressingly across the strings; out sprang the voice, and trembled and wept for very gladness.

"By George!" exclaimed Bob, jumping up and cutting a pigeon wing, "let's give old Dick a surprise to-morrow night. We were all going over to the picnic at the Geysers, only Dick wouldn't go, and now, darn the Geysers, I say! I can switch off boys and girls enough to make a jolly party, and we'll go and dance under Dick's trees."

"But, Rob, you know that I set my face, like a flint, against surprise parties; they are altogether abominable."

"Oh, psha! sis; this is different; it'll be all right over there, and it'll cheer Dick up a little." Jeanie blushed, and played a bar or two on her violin; she knew it was a thrust at her.

"I'll tell you what, Jean, I'll give Jerry the wink, and he'll see that everything is straight; and anyway, Dick's the best housekeeper I ever saw—for a man."

"Well," said Jeanie, slowly, "if you'll tell Jerry, we'll go. It will be fun, that's a fact. Now be off to Rose, and the rest of 'em."

The next evening, after a little "May-day picnic" at the Petrified Forest, by way of a "blind," and at which Jeanie did not appear, and just as the moon and the shadows were taking things into their own hands, the gay little company were on their way to Dick's. At a certain place in the road, which was through a tangle of blossom and bough, Jeanie and Rob slipped away from their companions, and ran down a "short cut" between the orchard and vineyard—a path well worn by Dick and Rob in their visits to each other. Going quietly up the hill to the house, Rob marched boldly up to the "big window" and looked in, then he motioned for Jeanie to come and look. Dick sat alone by the hearth, where a cheery little fire was blazing; his guitar was in his hands, but he seemed to have forgotten all about it; after a moment he began an accompaniment to that sweetest of sad, yearning songs:

"Bonnie Charlie's far awa,
Safely o'er the stormy main;
Many a heart will brak in twa
Should he ne'er come back again.

"Will ye no come back again,
Will ye no come back again!
Better lo'ed ye'll never be,
Will ye no come back again!

"Sweet the laverock's note and lang,
Lilting wildly up the glen,
But aye to me she sings ae sang:
Will he no come back again!"

It was sweet as music heard in dreams. Rob turned away with tearful eyes; but Jeanie just smiled. Rob was disgusted.

"It seems to me that you women glory in a man's anguish. Look at that! I should think it would break your heart, but you look as if you were glad of it."

"Perhaps I am; we women like a new scalp-lock to hang at our girdles occasionally; and besides, he'll get over it—they all do," said Jeanie, carelessly, and added: "As Hugh says: 'Time is a great assuager of woe.'"

"Confound you all for a heartless set," muttered Rob, "but I didn't think it of Jeanie. No, I can't make 'em out."

By that time the rest of the company had arrived, and silently grouping themselves under the trees performed their serenade, Rob leading off in a solo of his own "invention," as he said.

"Wake, laddie, wake, the bean is mooming,
The flowery stars are in the sky;
The owl-birds in the grove are blooming,
The wild cat warbles merry-ly.
Chorus.—"Wake, laddie, wake, the bean is mooming,
The wild cat warbles merry-ly."

"Wake, laddie, waken from thy slumber,
Come with thy heart so full of glee,
Come forth to join our festive number,
And dance beneath the oaken tree.
Chorus.—"Wake, laddie, waken from thy slumber,
And dance beneath the oaken tree."

By the time this characteristic song was over, Dick was with them, laughing and welcoming them right heartily. But when he came to Jeanie his hand trembled, and his heart beat so fast and loud, it seemed to him that every one must see and hear it.

Ah, well, what a time it was! It seemed as if the fairies must turn a deeper green for envy of those glad young mortals; only, on second thought, there can't be many of those old spiteful fairies left; they must have worn themselves out long ago.

Jerry pranced around like a rejuvenated elephant, the Christmas handkerchief adorning his neck, and the embroidered corner waving out conspicuously. Jeanie, little winsome sprite, was sparkling with merriment—they watched her in amazement.

"Girls," said Rose Cherry, "did you ever dream that Jeanie had so much fun in her! And isn't she pretty? I should think the boys would all go mad in love with her."

"Oh, yes, Rose, you wouldn't care if they did, since her brother is the only one you're concerned about."

"Before I'd be jealous!" said pretty Rose, tossing her head and running away.

Dick and Rob, too, were watching Jeanie, both with pride, and one with an aching heart.

"Dick, I didn't know the little scamp was so pretty. What ails her, any way? I never saw her so gay; and hasn't she styled up? I tell you, Dick, I'm awfully proud of her."

"Hush, Rob."

Jeanie had taken her violin, and was beginning to play:

"Charlie is my darling, my darling, my darling,

Charlie is my darling, the young chevalier.

'Twas on a Monday morning, right early in the year,

When Charlie came to our house, the young chevalier!"

More plainly than lips could utter them, the "voice" gave forth the tender words. How it sang! now slowly, sweet, and caressing, now full of bewildering mischief, or low and plaintive as if for some lost love; then with a sound like laughter, the rapturous, delicious abandonment of joy:

"Oh, Charlie is my darling, my darling, my darling,

Charlie is my darling, the young chevalier."

Dick turned away with a groan; but he went to her, he couldn't help it; she drew him on, her helpless, hopeless worshiper. He found himself standing apart with her, where they could watch the dancers, and hear their laughing voices mingling with the music of harp and violin.

Just beyond the dancers blazed a great fire of logs and brush. Around Jeanie and Dick was a little silken rustling of leaves; at their feet, in the depths of the cañon, the stream sped on with a laughter that changed to moaning, as it passed among the fir saddened hills. Dick was reckless, mad with the pain of losing her and the joy of being near her.

"Jeanie, if life could end here, and now!"

"Why!" exclaimed Jeanie in slow wonder, lifting her great eyes like pansies moist with dew, "aren't you happy?"

"Never so happy in my life—nor so broken-hearted."

Jeanie dropped her gaze from his, as he continued:

"I believe I shall throw myself in the creek after you're gone," laughing nervously. "Hear what a moaning it makes down there. And the firs are rehearsing a dirge; they seem to expect me."

"Mercy! how ghastly! You make me shudder," said Jeanie. "I declare I don't care to leave you here to-night; you'd better come home with Robbie and me."

"Home—with you! Jeanie—O, my God!" and he leaned his head against a tree and sobbed.

Jeanie had never before seen a man weep.

"Oh, hush!" she implored, frightened at the outburst.

"Ob, Dick, hush! Are you so foolish as to sit and break your heart for what is waiting for you, in reach of your hand, Dick?"

"Jeanie—you—don't mean it!"

"Look in my eyes and see," she murmured.

"Charlie is my darling, my darling, my darling,"

She sang in under breath.

"Jeanie, was that for me?"

"All for you, oh, you stu—!"

"Rosie, come home with us," Jeanie said, at the turning of the road, when they were saying "good morning," on their way home. Rose gave a shy glance up at Rob, and suffered herself to be led along.

"The second day of May," said Dick, when they were out of hearing of the others; "let that date be graven on our marbles, and say that heaven began then."

When they had entered the little house, that seemed to be fast asleep in the gray light, and Rob and Dick had gone to their room, Jeanie whispered something to Rose, who blushed and drew shyly back, then put her hand in Jeanie's, and the two girls went softly into the mother's room.

"Mother, dear, here is Rose. She came home with—me, and Dick came home with—Robbie, and we all came home together; and kiss your girls, mother, darling!"

"Jeanie, what's the news about Dunallan?" said Rob, the next day.

"Why, didn't you know?" said Jeanie, with the most innocent surprise; "he's going to marry Kate Dalrymple. I lured him on to Oakland expressly to make the match, and they fell into the snare as naturally as two turtle doves. She's a regal girl. They seem to have been ordained for each other."

"Innocent as a serpent and wise as a dove, sure as you live!" said Rob.

"Wall, naow, ye couldn't fool me," said Jerry. "Lord, didn't I know haow 'twas comin' aout? Love'll go whar its sent; didn't I tell ye so, Rob? 'n you can't change the course on't no more'n you turn a streak o' greased lightning!"

"Fact, Jerry," said Rob; "and you're going to have a box of the best cigars in Frisco."

Humming-Bird Hill! It seems to lie in the smile of heaven from January to December. Its little meadows are tilled like gardens; its orchard trees are full freighted with dainty bloom or glowing fruit; its vineyards bear treasures of Flaming Tokay, and Hamburg, and Muscat, and Malvoisie; its hills are dotted with herds of Angora goats, and the cheerful tinkling of their bells is heard among the firs. The deer come down to feed upon the sunny slopes, and the does lead their young down to the spring to drink in safety. The humming-birds build in the branches around the house, and the quail have their nests in the meadow near by. All around is tender, brooding life. The cottage is embowered in blossoming vines, and Jeanie stands under their shadow with bonny wee Robbie in her arms; she is holding him up to clap his dimpled hands at Dick, who is working on the hill across the creek. Jerry, too, is there, looking as proud and happy as if he owned them all.

"Oh, how blind I was," Jeanie cries, "to see no beauty in God's glorious places among His hills and mountains."

The grandmother, sitting on the porch, closes her old, yellow-leaved Psalms-Book, and takes her spectacles from her eyes, and, with her sunset smile, repeats:

"Beinn Shioin's breagh! a suidheachadh aobhness gach talmhainu i."

ASSORTED SENTIMENT.

A Plea for Its Preservation.

"'Twas nothing but a rose I gave her,
Nothing but a rose
Any wind might rob of half its savor,
Any wind that blows."

The other day I heard Portia humming the fragment I have just quoted. Everything Portia sings, or trills, or hums, or even whistles, she makes her very own; not merely because she is the wisest of women—barring her laziness—but because she is Portia, which is a profounder reason than it seems to be.

"'Twas nothing but a rose I gave her,"

I say to myself, taking from my Japanese cabinet a little sandal-wood box, wherein are the garnered flotsam of my salad days, labeled, "Assorted sentiment."

"I wonder why I have kept these things," I said, talking aloud, after the fashion of egoists, who are always sure of an appreciative audience—of one.

"Because you are a sentimentalist." The voice comes from behind a cloud of dubiously fragrant smoke, rising from the big leathern chair near the window. It is the voice of Roger, my room-mate. I have quite forgotten Roger, so wrapt am I in the delightfulness of active reverie.

A sentimental room-mate is not an unmixed good in one's life, but Roger enables me to live in a twenty-five dollar room at one-half the otherwise inevitable outlay, and his companionship is full of other compensations.

"Because you are a sentimentalist," says Roger.

"You are mistaken," say I. "One ought always to be very nice in the choice and use of words, especially in the treatment of nice distinctions. Sentiment and sentimentality are very near of kin. In fact, one may be fairly considered the double of the other, and which is 'the other' it is often difficult to determine. You think I am sentimental, you misanthropic vaporer of inexpensive tobacco. I am not sentimental. I am merely overcharged with sentiment. Hold on a jiffy and I'll give you some."

"Heaven forbid," says Roger, solemnly, and he is gone.

I am alone with my treasures. I tumble them out upon the table. Their totality is inconsiderable. There are nineteen red rosebuds, and six pale yellow ones.

There is one little kid glove. It must have belonged to a little girl, for no grown-up young woman had ever so small a hand. It is scarcely possible to be sentimental over that, for I never lost any little sister and I never had any little girl of my own.

There is a lot of other stuff in the box which have little or no meaning, but the nineteen red rosebuds fill me with unspeakable yearning. I don't know what for, and I don't very much care. It is sufficient that I yearn.

One can yearn over a very little when one is tuned to the proper yearning pitch. The trouble is that I can not for the life of me remember what particular who gave me any particular red rosebud. They bear each to each the most exasperating sort of family likeness, as faithful to the generic type as the faces of my landlady's various Chinese servants.

The unkind interruption from Roger has left me out of poise with my normal self, and vaguely satirical at my own expense. I have been thinking, while assorting my buds and other trifles, very much in the burlesque, Victor Hugo fashion. But that sort of mood seldom lasts long with me. I can not keep back the memories which play pitch and toss with the withered and yellowed mementoes before me.

More than one of those crumbling buds were gathered by taper fingers, when I was a mere urchin of a school-boy fifteen years ago. Mary, who married the doctor, sent me one of them, sent it with the first love-letter I ever had, sending them by her brother as too precious to be trusted to the post or to the scant carefulness of an ordinary messenger.

I remember with a queer little spasm of regret that my matter-of-fact mother burned the letter, which I had foolishly left on the bureau. Doubtless I should not think it worth the saving if I had it now, but it is nice to imagine something delightful in its vanished pages and unremembered sentences. Mary, who married the doctor, had grown up to be a practical, contented, admirable woman and wife and mother. Doubtless she has forgotten; I can scarcely say why I have remembered. Another of those shrunken rosebuds was given me almost as long ago by Mary, who became a nun. I can't remember whether it is among the nineteen red ones or the six yellow ones. Mary, who is now a nun, was extremely pretty, with a pink and white complexion, and just such lips as Erasmus wrote that the English girls had. It was religious excitement, or rather religious lack of excitement, which sent pretty little Mary into a convent. I am glad of that because I think she never liked any one else so well as she liked me. I can't remember who gave me the baker's dozen of the twenty-three remaining rosebuds. Some of the happenings which gave me the twelve I do remember about were anything but pleasant. I had to fight because of two of them. I came near being shot because of another. The acceptance of a fourth from the most finished flirt of my limited acquaintance led to a fatal misunderstanding by which I lost a charming friend.

But there is something pleasant to remember about each of the remaining eight, only I can't tell which are the remaining eight. One—two were given me without a thought of sentiment by my best friend, my wisest counselor; but she has explicitly forbidden me to be sentimental about them, and I dare not disobey her. And the others were given by other true friends: the wife of the good Ira Merry, the sister of my most boon companion who has gone to Oregon, the oddly fascinating midget of a schoolma'am I met last winter in the Sonoma County redwoods, my adopted mother who lives in Oakland.

There are other withered rosebuds and other faded flowers in the heap before me. I know who gave me some of these, because they are in a sense individual. There are half a dozen pinks. Enid placed one in my button-hole on each of a dozen memorable mornings. There is one boutonniere, with its stems in silver foil and a cruel pin thrust through the heart of a fragile tuberose. Jeppetha brought it for me through the crush of a crowded carriage and the hurly-burly of the Author's Carnival, making me momentarily vain by the concession. There are some sprigs of fern which Isoude gave me, and as I look at them, I remember that I have owed her a letter for almost a month, and reproach myself for my neglect. There is a bit of wild brier which Ote plucked for me under Tamalpais; I told her then about my assorted sentiment, and she did not laugh. There are some pansies which Esther gathered at Lone Mountain, and gave me because I asked for them. And there are two tea-roses which Doris wore at her girle in the Carnival, and which I caught ere they fell to the floor, as she passed in the grand march.

The roses of Doris are the one glint of real sunshine in this memory-fog. They are unmistakable. The fragrance of life is still in them, and the tints of life have not yet faded from their crumpled leaves. I am glad to have found a clue which may lead me out of this bewildering past. The partly shaped personalities which have begun to cluster around and strive for the nineteen red rosebuds and their yellow sisters, fade, vanish, and leave the helpless souvenirs without a name. I turn them over with my finger tips, and every moment adds to their ruin. It seems profanation thus to bring them into the light of day. How foolish it was to keep them, anyhow! Neither sentiment nor the sentimental has any business in this workaday world. They belong to mediæval romances. They have lost their identity in the common mind under the crude classification, "gush." Everybody is ashamed to own the hybrid, even Enid and Esther, whose youth entitles them to all the silver-lined fancies they choose to indulge in. Enid scorns the imputation of being sentimental; and as for sentiment, that is more intangible still, and she knows it not. We like to be thought world-wise and cynical. We want to have sense, or the reputation of sense, but we repudiate sensibility. Clearly, then, to be in the path with my fellows, I must burn my treasure trove, and turn my back upon assorted sentiment.

While I hesitated a breath of December wind comes in at the door—which Roger has left open—and flutters some of the stray, sunken leaflets to the floor. I pick them up tenderly, despite my philosophy, humming the while another morsel of Portia's melody:

"When she took it from my trembling fingers,
With a touch as chill—
Ah! her hand upon mine fingers,
Stays and thrills me still."

I sweep the dead things back into the little sandal-wood box, their faint, deathly odor floating out to me like a far-off voice.

My egoism reasserts itself. I will keep them and add to them hereafter if I please. To be a brave sentimentalist, or even sentimentalist, is not in its essence ignoble. I reflect that the world is too full of Gradgrinds already; and if I can carry some of the tender grace of the past along with me as I go, it may do me good, even if I can not tell where it came from.

In fact, so many pretty sermons lie folded with stems and stamens in my perfumed box that I dare not follow them where they beckon me. But, before I put Doris's roses away with all the others, I twist a scroll of tissue paper about their fragile stalks, for mile-stone, and head-stone, and sweet reminder; that they may be to me a visible sign, for "Withered, faded, pressed between Life's pages,

Crumpled, fold on fold,
Once they lay upon her breast, and ages
Can not make them old."

ALFRED HARDIE.

A True Story About Animals.

One damp afternoon the turtle came waddling out into the big room to borrow a little sand to lay his eggs in.

"My friend," the elephant said, "yours is a very hard case."

"Yes," the turtle replied, "but while there's life there's soup."

The elephant was greatly astonished, for he didn't know the turtle was given to that sort of thing at all; and all the other animals grinned, because, you see, it wasn't often the elephant met anybody in the menagerie who could talk to him.

"Well," said he, after a pause, "it's a good thing your back is so broad."

"Yes, it is," replied the turtle, "because there's no telling what make comb of it."

The animals cheered softly, and the elephant looked amazed.

"Well, old go-as-you-please," he said, presently, "you pay as you go, don't you?"

"Oh, yes," the turtle said; "I have to shell out every once in a while. How's hides?" he asked, cheerfully.

"Oh, they're easy," the elephant said; "a little loose, maybe, but nothing to worry over. House moving business keeps up, I reckon?"

"Yes, yes," the turtle said; "nothing rushing particularly, but I'm in and out all day. Nothing unusual in shawl straps, is there?"

The animals cheered at this delicate allusion to the trunk business, and for the first time in his life the elephant looked as though he were going to lose his temper, but he rallied, and said:

"Oh, no; much the same as usual; just a kind of hand to mouth business. By the way, didn't I see your father's old overcoat up in front of the restaurant yesterday?"

"I guess you did," said the turtle; "he wasn't the kind of a man to die and make no sign. Going down into the billiard room pretty soon?"

The elephant said no, they'd have to excuse him; but if they'd "wait till the hyena came along, he'd have some native whine with them." And then the turtle said, "all right, he'd drop in about tusk." And the menagerie went to supper that night with the greatest enthusiasm. But the elephant was very quiet, and only spoke once, and that was to ask the ostrich where he supposed the turtle grew to be so cute? And the foolish bird of the desert tossed an iron bolt-head down his throat and replied:

"Picked it up, I reckon."

And then, children, the elephant grinned. I said there seemed to be an epidemic in the menagerie. I turned up against the centre-pole and went to sleep on Hawkye.

GANYMEDE'S CUP.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 2, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—In the midst of some thousand most confounding perplexities, I seize my pen and attempt to chronicle a few interesting (or otherwise) facts regarding the manner in which we have launched upon the new leap year; in consideration of which I suppose the gentlemen should have precedence. It's their day out, and the custom of calling is a pleasant one, though I suppose our friend "A. B." will censure it, since he prefers a "drunk" to an American Christmas—a luxury he has a right to indulge in, if he has neither wife, mother, nor sister to be made wretched by his little eccentricity. But don't take from our too practical American youths the few illusions they have; let them believe in Santa Claus, and sing hallelujahs as long as they can, and possibly they may be less inclined to get "drunk" when they grow old. For my part, I like the pleasant interchange of compliments and wishes for a happy New Year. I like all pleasant words, and Americans are so chary in their use, indulging in them only on rare occasions. But, after all, I think we are better, franker, warmer friends than we know, or have the courage to show. But I must hasten to fulfill my promise.

I went first to Mrs. Shillaber's, who was majestic in an imported costume, and received with that bonne grâce that makes her home so inviting. By her side was the accomplished and beautiful Miss Nopie McDougal. I found the atmosphere so pleasant that I remained much longer than politeness justified; so did Mr. E. LeB., and a few others, much to the disgust of L. T., who was waiting in another part of the city. What a pity there is not some way of dividing up some of these fascinating fellows that there might be enough to "go round." Our friend who resembles Lord Byron, except in lameness, paid his respects; so did Mr. McF. and Mr. A., who said his name was Smith. Messieurs G. L. and S. were there, and during the day and evening the cards numbered three hundred. I stopped a few moments at Mrs. Swift's, whom I found beautiful and refreshing as ever. At Mrs. John L. Love's, Mrs. Ben Brooks's, and Mrs. McCoppin's, those I had met before repeated themselves. At Mrs. Gwin's, D. L. B. was making himself at home. The Britishers were out in full force, trying to reconcile themselves to American customs. What apt scholars they are! Mr. E. C. L., with F. M. P. and ex-Mayor B., favored a few friends with kindly words, wit, and smiles.

I took another long rest at Mrs. B. B. Cutter's, who always has something to hear worth hearing, and makes her friends so welcome that they want to stay, and never go away. Miss Cutter, her daughter—graceful, bright, and original—was entertaining a host of gentlemen, among them Gov. Perkins, who is the most genial public man we have ever had. In the recesses of the windows were melancholy youths, with hair carefully curled, who had hestowed the most serious meditation upon the knots of their cravats; I could not help thinking how nice, perfect, and irreproachable they were; of what ideal exquisiteness, with their perfumed hair and their elegant coats! What more could exacting and romantic fancy desire? As I walked along up Van Ness Avenue to ex-Senator Cole's, I was passed by Robert G.'s stunning turnout, Robert and his friend looking provokingly comfortable and complacent. At Mrs. Graves's was T. P. M., who is as unsocial and barbarous in his nature as his friend, J. M. Qu-y-, is cultivated and elegant, and judge —, overflowing with lines from an old madrigal which savored of courtly days. In an easy-chair, by the side of Miss S., sat W. S. L., the uncatchable, indifferent, and happy. Well, Billy, put up Yellow Jacket, or something else, and give some other fellow a chance to get rich, and you may be less harassed by anxious mammas.

Mrs. George M. Blake opened her spacious house. I wonder why it is that no one ever speaks of her toilets—they are faultless, at home and abroad, from the neatly dressed little foot to the becomingly dressed hair or hat. At hospitable Mrs. Henry Scott's I met a troupe of old friends—W. H. P., he of the rueful countenance, with his friend the festive Major (militia) C. W., and E. F. G., with H. R., and Fred. C. I was disappointed at not finding Mrs. George Prescott here, and had to trot over to the other end of the city, as the day would not have been complete without a chat with her and her beautiful sister, Mrs. H. J. Booth; and there I met J. M. P., who, like myself, is only half satisfied with this Western civilization.

Did you know that Mrs. Prescott's sister, Mrs. Scheidel, was married on Christmas day to a gentleman in Ohio? We all want to see her, and extended our heartfelt congratulations. Mrs. P. B. Cornwall was happy in having her daughter, Mrs. Bertha Fisher (who is home on a visit from China), and Mrs. Florence Moore, with Dr. Bronson's daughters, Cora and Mabel, with her. The same ladies received together six years ago. Here I met C. C.—g, looking the same as of yore; but bachelors never change. I waited until evening to pay my respects to Mrs. J. L. Fry and the ladies who received with her—Miss Kate Bishop (Mrs. F.'s cousin), Miss Maggie McClure, Mrs. Edgerton, Miss Mamie Coghill, Miss Sedgwick, and Miss Tompkins. Later in the evening Mr. and Mrs. Castle, with the charming and beautifully dressed Misses Corbett, came in, and about a hundred and fifty ladies and gentlemen, to whom the entertainer, Mrs. Fry, had extended an informal invitation to come and spend a social evening. Mrs. Fry received her guests with that exquisite appreciation of what was due to each one, and with such perfect "graciousness" that all were satisfied, and each considered himself especially honored. What pleases me most in the luxury of Mrs. Fry's house is that nothing seems conspicuously new. The pictures, the gilding, the satins, are subdued, and do not tire the eye with loud gaudiness of novelty. There is a feeling of repose and comfort in every room; a feeling that things have always been there. The drawing-room is of such dimensions, that it makes a pleasant hall-room. The floors are inlaid with many colored woods, so smooth as to almost reflect the frescoed walls, where garlands of flowers are tastefully twined. Notwithstanding the multitude of lights, the rooms are so spacious that there was plenty of air, and one could breathe with perfect ease. Ballenberg was never in better luck than "perfected perfection" in rendering the scene. You can imagine how happy we all were.

Ada Ven finds society so "dull," and doubly so H. and Mrs. T. have ceased to entertain; but for all that it seems to me there has been about as much going on as we could well attend to, and that we have had some very passable parties and entertainments, with a prospect of more to come, even though the above named doors are closed.

How things get mixed up in a letter, don't they? The shadow of one word has impended over me since I read: "DIED, in New York, December 27th, Nellie M., daughter of the late Hon. E. B. Crocker, of Sacramento, aged 21 years." What a sad ending of the happy winter she had anticipated with her sister, Mrs. Walker! All who knew Nellie loved her. She was generous and noble to all, a loving daughter and sister, a thoughtful friend. To those who loved her best, we extend a tender clasp of the hand, which is about all one can give the afflicted.

P. S.—Please read in my last letter, 27th December, for "society girl," "society gip"—spelled forward or backward to suit the mood you may be in. G.

BOOK-COVER REVIEWS.

Sadalpha is the title of a little book of grotesquely bad verses, published by the author, J. Bradford Cox, M. D., of San José, this State. In his preface, the author says of the work that, "with the hope that it may be the means of exciting a desire for a more perfect life than many people now live, and that it may afford pleasure during its perusal, indulgence is craved for its imperfections." It seems our duty to tell Mr. Cox that in literature—with which he is evidently not familiar—indulgence is not, and should not be, accorded; for every plea that an author can make for it is simply a reason for not publishing. We do not think Sadalpha is likely to "afford pleasure during its perusal"—except in the sense that it will certainly make the reader laugh—and are quite sure that it will provoke remorse for misspent time after perusal. That it will be "the means of exciting a desire for a more perfect life" is probably true, for the reader will rise from it with a chastened and humble spirit, as of one who has endured a penitential scourging, or worn a hair shirt, or made a pilgrimage with unboiled peas in the shoes of him; and these are the means of grace commended by reason and approved by experience. If its writing has excited "a desire for a more perfect life" in the author, we venture to hope that he will not again put forth a book of crude and commonplace fancies in prosy diction, and dignify it with the name of poetry—of which there is not between the covers of this volume a single line, nor part of a line.

A book of quite different character is the little volume, by Mary Mapes Dodge, called Along the Way, published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Most of the poems in this booklet have appeared in St. Nicholas and the various Eastern magazines, a few in a former volume of poems for children. Mary Mapes Dodge is a name too well known to require serious criticism on the poems whose merit it authenticates. Those in this volume are nearly all good—we reprint one of them in another column. In saying good we do not mean great or admirable; none of them, probably, will be read five years hence; certainly none of them "will live as long as the language." They are good in the way that a wine is good over which we gently smack our lips with a sense of satisfied desire, but with never a thought of inquiring as to the vintage, or an after memory of its quality. But this is exceptional excellence, as poems go. It is much, indeed, to be "not bad," and that Mrs. Dodge always is. She never strikes a jarring note, never offends against any of the innumerable laws of the poetic art, never is out of taste. Her volume, with reference to both its exterior dress and interior merit, may not inaptly be called a canvas-back duck.

Mr. W. C. Bartlett has printed (not published) a number of his out-of-door sketches, under the title of A Breeze from the Woods. These sketches first appeared in the Overland Monthly, the initial one now giving its name to the present collection. As the book is printed only for presentation to the author's personal friends, we do not feel called upon, nor indeed at liberty, to express any opinion of its merits or demerits, and the object of this notice is merely to show how the Bulletin, in violating this wholesome observance of silence regarding what was not legitimate matter of comment, has, as might have been expected, committed a breach of good taste in the manner of its impertinence as well. "The author, William C. Bartlett, has, we think," says the Bulletin, "done a wise and graceful thing in gathering them within the covers of a book, and sending them to his friends with the 'compliments of the season.'" If it is always "wise and graceful" to please oneself this is true enough; but for our part we have not light enough—not working alongside Mr. Bartlett—to say if this act is either the one or the other. In itself it has no perceptible wisdom or grace—no more of the former than making a collection of postage stamps or jackknives; not so much of the latter as presenting one's friends with hooks by another author. The Bulletin continues: "The hungry multitude, on the keen scent for good things, will look in vain for it on the counters of the book stores." This a particularly interesting tableau—the people clamoring for a hook (which the publishers evidently did not clamor for) and the hard-hearted author, from sheer unprovoked malice, stubbornly denying them their consuming desire. In this picturesque attitude, as placed by his brother editor, we leave Mr. Bartlett, with the simple question: How does he like it?

In the month of June, this year, the census will be taken, and when the figures are published there will be the usual protest in all the large cities that the figures lie. It will be discovered that San Francisco has not seven hundred thousand inhabitants, and that Oakland has less than half of that. Mr. Langley, the Directory man, will be appealed to to disprove the totals of the census marshals, and the task could not be confided to a more competent hand. The philosopher who can point out that in our nature which makes a man proud of the number of noses that can be counted round about him would do a real service to mankind; for those in whom the offending peculiarity is conspicuous might be put to death, and the cost of taking the census would be almost nothing.

The Mormons are giving trouble, the Utes are giving trouble. How would it do to remove the Mormons and the Utes to the same reservation, pensioning the survivors?

PARISIAN BONBONS.

Charles-Eutrope de Laurencie happened to be visiting one of the Queen's favorites, when a new comer announced the sudden death of the Bishop of Nantes.

"I will wager a hundred thousand livres," he said, significantly, "that I am not made his successor."

"Do you mean that?" asked the Queen's favorite.

"Certainly, madame."

Three days afterward he received a note from the lady, addressed to him as Bishop of Nantes, and containing only these words: "Your lordship owes me 100,000 livres that we wagered."

Complaisant theologians subsequently decided that this was not simony.

Prince Talleyrand once upon a time summoned his cook, who was none other than the great Carême, and said to him severely:

"I am greatly displeased with you. You served me at eight o'clock yesterday a salmis which should have been ready at seven, and thus my evening's appointments were all interfered with and grave matters of state were left unconsidered or only half considered."

"Will your Excellency deign to inform me if the salimis was good?"

"It was delicious, sir."

"That, your Excellency, was the important point." And with a profound bow the artist retired.

The Abbé Prince von Salm-Kyrburg, who was absurdly, tragically deformed, was one day crossing the royal antechamber at Versailles, where a number of nobles were warming themselves, when one observed, "Ah, there's Æsop at court."

"That is a flattering comparison—for me," said the Abbé; "Æsop, you will remember, made the beasts speak."

A Marquis, but not a gentleman, observed one day to M. de Pils, the well-known author, that his last production was abominable—execrable.

The poet asked the harsh critic wherein consisted the inferiority of his piece.

"It is detestable—abominable," returned the Marquis, "and that was the opinion unanimously expressed at a supper I attended last night at which ten people of quality were present."

"Ten people of quality?"

"Yes, ten people of quality; what do you think of that?"

"Why, I think that it wasn't a family gathering."

Baudelaire, the poet, died of a nervous malady, which began by very curious stomachic troubles; for instance, for a long time he could eat nothing but pork in one form or another.

One day one of his friends said to him in surprise: "How on earth do you manage to be able to eat pork, pork, nothing but pork? I'd get sick and tired of it in less than a week."

"Oh!" replied Baudelaire, "I cultivate a taste for it by pretending that I oughtn't to eat it—for instance, I shut my eyes and imagine that I'm Moses or Mahomet."

"I say, old fellow, you haven't got a five franc piece about you that you don't know what to do with, have you?"

"There's one."

"Thanks—but, hello, I say, you know, it's had?"

"You asked me for one I didn't know what to do with!"

The newest thing in the line of training for the stage is to employ naturalism to bring down one's author to the level of his audience. For instance, an actor who has to play "Ruy Blas," knowing that the spectators will not half understand the irony, scorn, and indignation contained in his superb apostrophe to the banqueting lords, "Bon appetit, messieurs!" thus elaborates it: "Pitch in, ye sons o' sea cooks! Go it! Stuff yourselves up to the ears while you're at it! Wouldn't you like somebody to help you?" and so on, until the audience is thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the author and the situation.

"Hi, cabby, have you a hot hrick in your hack?"

"Yes, boss." (Enter fare.)

"I say, cabby, this hack is as cold as Greenland—I thought you said you had some hot hricks."

"So I have—they're under my feet out here. G'lang?"

After the opera's over:

"What a splendid orchestra that is, isn't it?"

"Ye-es, very enjoyable music, I dessay; but when they play you only seem to hear one instrument—the musicians seem to me to lack individuality."

At a gathering of French savants of the last century at the house of M. Duclos, everybody hymned the praises of that universal and encyclopædic genius, Voltaire.

"Wonderful, many-sided man," exclaimed an eminent juriconsult; "a walking authority upon poetry, history, physics, literature, mathematics, medicine, natural history—everything; it's a pity, though, that he wasn't a little better up in jurisprudence. That's where he is weak—wretchedly weak. But he is a universal genius, and the ornament of the age."

Then a mathematician showed that Voltaire's ideas of mathematics were enough to make an equilateral triangle split its sides laughing; and a doctor proved that his pretended medical knowledge was the supremest bosh; and a theologian that he knew less of theology than the D. D. unborn, and so on along the line, and yet all declared that he was a universal genius. "Finally," says the chronicle, "all looked at each other and burst out laughing, and M. Duclos said perhaps they had better say nothing about it to any one."

The Chronicle tabulates 320 divorces during the past year, and gives the names of 207 persons who have come to their death by violence, of which number 88 committed suicide. This is not an agreeable showing for either our social, or moral, or material condition.

AT A CAMP-MEETING.

I have attended a number of camp-meetings, and have seen all phases of character represented there, much to admire, and many things to condemn. At one in the northern part of this State occurred an incident that I can not recall without laughter. The meeting had been going on for some days, and on Sunday I went out to hear a sermon from a minister of some note, who was to preach that day. I arrived early, and found a seat in the shadow of the arbor, for the day was very warm. An "experience meeting" was going on, and the brethren and sisters were telling each other of the burdens they bore in the heat of the day, of their trials, temptations, and weakness; of their joys and hope through the promises, and the flagging zeal that was being spurred to new exertion. I sat and listened to quaint, old-fashioned speech, and the experiences of homely, simple lives, that had yet found it hard to live up to their ideal of the pure and good. The birds flew from tree to tree about us; occasionally a squirrel, bolder than his fellows, flitted his bushy tail along the neighboring fence; and blue and yellow butterflies rose and fell through the autumn air. The fields were dry and brown, and glimpses of the hills and mountains showed blue through the distance. Taking in all this, and much more, I was yet conscious of a familiar figure sitting well up in front.

Old man Scrub was known for miles around, and no one was much surprised at anything he did. Many misfortunes had stricken his family, of which he was not considered entirely innocent, as his mode of family government was, to say the least, unusual. It was a peculiarity of the Scrub family that they felt themselves able to arrange all the small weaknesses and flaws of the universe, and the incorrect workings of civil and religious society. Some were so ignorant as to say their actions were the result of a disordered brain, but we know what a weak argument this was. Let a man display the peculiarities of genius, and some common mind, not able to understand the workings of such complicated and extraordinary machinery, tries to prove that the possessor is mad, and, as there is no proposition without its supporters, there are those who accept and believe even this.

Religion and politics were the two subjects upon which the old man Scrub was for ever talking, and through which he soared into the illimitable or dived into the unfathomable. He always voted for General Jackson, and turned from the polls to enlighten the by-standers on the subject of eternal damnation. No matter where you saw him, General Jackson and everlasting fire were so mixed in his speech that the listener wondered if there were not some secret relation between the subjects hitherto unsuspected by him. Now, I knew by the old man's look that he was bappy as he kept nodding his head above his stick, while sympathetic rills of tobacco juice crept from the corners of his mouth and wandered downward with placid uncertainty. Soon, a man who in other days had been called a preacher, and who had broken the bread of life to simple hearers, but who had since taken to more worldly employment where the money was more plentiful, rose to explain the ups and downs on the highway of humanity. Possessed of some eloquence and a shrewd notion of the fitness of things, he spoke feelingly and well.

Old man Scrub listened and nodded as usual, but the flow of the speaker's language pierced his mind and brought some new sensations there, for he suddenly lifted his head, and his eyes flashed with brighter light as he looked earnestly at the speaker, who, with downward gazing eyes and clenched hands seemed not to see anything that was passing around him. I knew Scrub so well that I felt something rich was coming, and whispered to my companion to look closely. As the good brother warmed under his emotions old man Scrub grew more excited, and suddenly, to the astonishment of those who did not know him, he rose to his feet, faced the speaker a moment with gleaming eyes, thrust out his long, skinny arm, and said, in indescribable tones: "That's so; that's the idee. Give us your bone, old man; give us your bone."

Imagine the effect upon the congregation, and, more than all, upon the speaker. As for myself I just sat down in the straw, concealed by my companion, and quietly laughed till I cried. The meeting soon came to a close, and I have no doubt that many a tent that day concealed much laughter as the young folks passed in and out, saying: "Give us your bone, old man; give us your bone." The Towers of Silence.

The highest hill in Bombay, on the Chopati side of it, is selected by the Parsees as the site of these towers—the last resting-place of their fellow-religionists, the top of the hill being surrounded by a wall, within the precincts of which none but the Parsees have free access. Occasionally a European is permitted to enter the gate, but he is not allowed to proceed further than a certain distance, and the view he obtains is a very indistinct one. To facilitate the ascent of funeral processions a flight of countless stone steps is built from the bottom of the hill to the very gate of the wall which gives admission to the ground. As one enters the gate he is bewildered by the magnificence and the grandeur of the scene that bursts upon his sight. The whole of Bombay lies at his feet, and the most beautiful gardens imaginable lie in front of him. The distant view of the sea adds to the enchanting spectacle. The first thing that engages the attention is the "Sagari," a small stone building where the sacred fire is kept and where Parsees often go to say prayers for the souls of their deceased friends or relatives. In the distance are visible the white walls of the seven different towers erected at irregular but considerable distances from each other. After the towers are once consecrated, none but the "nassasalars" are allowed to enter; but when a new one is built it is open to the Parsees for inspection, and the ceremony of consecration is performed in the presence of all those of the community who choose to attend.

On the top of the wall of the tower which is being used for the time being may be seen huge vultures, to the number of from forty to fifty. Inside the iron door—which is on a level with the surface of the top of the hill—is a flight of a few steps downward. The arrangement in the interior of the tower is perfectly simple. There are stone slabs arranged—a little distance from each other—in three concentric circles; the slabs of the innermost circle, which are exclusively used for the bodies of females; the outermost circle, having the largest slabs, being intended for the remains of males. In the centre is a well of immense depth; and the surface is built so as to slope gently from all directions toward the well.

When the funeral procession arrives at the summit it proceeds straight to one of the seven towers that is on use at the time. After a short halt, for the purpose of allowing the relatives to take a last look at the deceased, two nassasalars proceed slowly with the bier toward the iron door. One of them opens the door with a key, and they disappear with the earthly remains, and close the door after them. They then deposit the dead body on one of the stone slabs, tear the garments in which it is enveloped with a hook, and, issuing out of the same door with the empty bier, proceed to a place where they themselves change their clothes, and undergo a purificatory ceremony. Directly the nassasalars emerge from the iron door, the vultures on the top of the wall descend, and after about ten minutes reappear. Then everybody knows that nothing but the skeleton is left of the lifeless remains deposited within the walls only a few minutes ago. When the nassasalars enter again with another funeral, they drag the skeleton and everything, with a hook, to the well in the centre; and so the bones of the members of this united and unique community mingle together in death. Of course the height of the hill, combined with the height of the tower walls, renders it impossible for any one else to obtain even the faintest glimpse of the inside of these towers. The nassasalars alone witness what must sometimes be a horrid and revolting sight inside this awe-inspiring place.

How to Eat Oysters.

An oyster has to be taken as a whole, and respected as such. It refuses to be dealt with in detail, and he who attempts it makes a gastronomic failure of no small magnitude. There is only one way in which an oyster can be eaten. There it lies on the shell, hard, white, and plump, its convoluted edges matching the rim of the shell. You pass the thin blade of your knife carefully under it, and release the fibrous heart from its pearly connection. Then you lay your knife down, take the frontal edge of the oyster firmly between your thumb and finger, bring it up in front of your face in close connection with your lips, look at it an instant, lay your head back, shut your eyes, open your mouth, place the delicious morsel on your tongue, so as to sense its fine saltiness, then let go your hold on it, and—away it goes, as slowly and as easily as a ship glides from the ways into a welcoming sea. Whoever has done this deed once, and felt the full physical rapture of it, has one memory, at least, that will never die while the senses of the palate remain. Not only is there a proper way to eat an oyster, but there is also a proper way to prepare an oyster to be eaten. And, as regards roasting, this is the way: First and foremost among the requisites is a good old-fashioned fireplace, with its stone hearth, its stout brazen andirons, its white ashes, its glowing bed of coals, and its bright roaring flame. Now draw up your low chairs and your stools, a tiny tray, a coarse towel, and a short, thin-bladed knife on every lap, and a plate of bread and butter on the floor at your side. Set a bushel-basket full of oysters, large as the palm of your hand, shaped like a scallop, at the corner of the fireplace, and a pitcher of sweet cider on the sideboard. Now we are ready. The host stands, tongs in hands, and with nimble motions, places twenty of the big fellows on the carefully-laid blazing sticks. The silence of expectation falls upon the group. Every eye is fastened on the bivalves. Whiz, buzz, sputter, bang! Now the sport begins. How the jokes fly! How the laughter bursts out and peals through the old home! How the chimney roars! How the bread and butter and cider vanish! Ah me! we must stop, or we shall not write anything sober to-night. But what memories come out of the quiet past, from the far years when we children, with father and mother, were all together in the old home, and we had so much less than we have now, as men count having, and yet had enough for love to thrive on, and such laughter that started tears. And the jokes cracked around that old hearthstone—well, who can ever tell them again as they were told then? "Then was our mouth filled with laughter and our tongues with singing."

The authentic history of the failure of the attempt to get Germany into another bi-metallic conference is, that Bismarck was so disgusted and annoyed by the account which Mr. W. D. Kelley gave of his interview with him, that he refused absolutely to see Mr. George Walker, who came as an accredited American negotiator, but turned him over to Count Bülow, his assistant, who paid Mr. Walker in phrases. We presume Mr. Walker is now satisfied that there never was any good ground for the story that Germany was ready to go back to the double standard or silver standard, industriously as it has been circulated here. Kelley's narrative came just in time for the Maine election. We knew it was a poetic narrative, but did not know whether it had any basis in fact; but we believe Bismarck does not even credit him with poetry.—New York Nation.

Hard times in Berlin have led to dog-stealing and dog-eating by the hungry poor. Plump terriers have mysteriously disappeared in considerable numbers. The fate reserved for these domestic pets was unsuspected by the general public until a distressing incident, which happened to Prince Henry XXII. of Reuss, revealed the ghastly truth. His highness had lost a poodle of extraordinary talent, which, alas! was as partly of body as it was intelligent in mind. He offered a handsome reward to any one who would restore his favorite, and "no questions asked," but in vain. Day after day passed away in sorrow, unbroken by any hopeful tidings, until one fatal morning the Prince received a post card, unsigned, but bearing the following heartless inscription: "Serenity! The poodle sends his respects, and begs to inform your highness that he has been eaten."

ADA VEN'S LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 2, 1880.

MY DEAR HELEN:—We have passed the portals of the New Year, and I do not doubt that you, in common with myself and countless others, have made many a good resolution for the term of 1880. My annual promises of amendment are always made in good faith, but the exigencies of fashionable society soon cause many of them to be broken; for truth and politeness, you know, are often sadly at variance.

Mrs. Chris. Reis gave a party on Tuesday evening, at which there were some sweet singing and very lovely girls. The all-engrossing topic of conversation during the early part of the week was in regard to New Year's day—what ladies would receive calls, when, and where. Among the gentlemen of my acquaintance, many that visited last year did not make their accustomed rounds on Thursday; and perhaps it was as well, for the reaction after the strain upon the intellectual faculties, necessitated by the utterances of the usual bons mots and pungent witticisms, must be painful in the extreme, when taken in connection with the polite litanies of the day. On all sides the startling and novel remarks of previous years were again made in regard to the weather; its vast possibilities and varied probabilities seem to present an ever ready theme, which, though "flat and unprofitable," will never grow stale.

Mrs. Shillaber received calls between the hours of three and eleven, and sent cards to that effect to her acquaintance. Miss McDougal, Miss Gordon, Miss Lucy Randolph, and others were with her. More than ordinary interest attaches just now to the first named young lady, on account of the rumor that is so generally circulated, and implicitly believed by many, that she is engaged to be married to Mr. Le Breton, and I do not doubt the air will soon be filled with a touching threnody from the ranks of her disconsolate admirers. Her lovely face and sparkling conversation have naturally made her a much-admired favorite, and should the report prove true, it will be some consolation to know that her choice has fallen upon one in every way congenial, there existing between them a degree of unity, as to taste and accomplishments, seldom found. In regard to Miss Randolph, I have lately come to the surprising conclusion that underneath her calm and gentle exterior there must lurk a spice of coquetry, since she has stranded the hopes of more than one fond youth.

Mrs. Hooker, of California Street, had her friends, Mrs. Barroilhet, Mrs. Smith, and Miss Van Clief to receive with her. More attractive ladies than these I am sure could not be named. Mrs. Hooker, conspicuous for her blooming youth, has always been a favorite. Mrs. Barroilhet, prior to her residence at Menlo Park, was a recognized ornament at all fashionable gatherings. Mrs. Smith, as you remember, is charmingly piquant and stylish. Miss Van Clief, with her bright conversation and interesting face, has, I hear, stormed the hearts of several of our army officers. Mrs. Toland and Mrs. McMullin seem to have vied with each other as to who would present the most bewildering array of heauty, embracing in its numbers every known type, from the gorgeous, black-eyed hour to that of the orthodox angel, with her orbs of heavenly blue. Which matron will carry of the palm, is a question fraught with too many perplexities for me. Miss Minnie Glassell, even pretty as she is, will find it no easy task to fill the void occasioned by the defection of her lovely sister.

Miss Sweetapple—how suggestive her name, though I do have to skip over several thousand years to the "fall of man"—is soon to give a large party, at the Occidental. Last week there were several small entertainments, but the number of guests attending was too small to render them interesting to any but those invited. The death of Miss Nellie Crocker, niece of Mr. Charles Crocker, will for the present put an end to their brilliant Tuesday evening receptions. On New Year's day quite a number of my acquaintance invited guests enough to return in the evening to have a dance; but, as a general thing, all were too fatigued with the exertions of the day to enter into anything with much zest. At one of Mrs. Shillaber's receptions I met Miss Sawyer, a young lady recently returned from Europe, where she has been educated. I hear she sings exquisitely, and I wonder if her's is the charming new voice we are soon to bear in opéra bouffe.

Yours, affectionately, ADA VEN.

For many years the farmers in the interior of Maine have devoted themselves to bear-growing. The State pays a large premium for every bear-scap that is delivered to the authorities, and thus powerfully fosters the bear industry. There is no more beautiful rural spectacle than that which is afforded by a flourishing bear-farm. In the morning, at early dawn, is heard the cheerful song of the farmer's boy as he drives his father's bears to pasture. At noon the pasture, with its flock of bears grazing in the sun, or drowsily stretched in the shade, would fill an animal painter with delight; and when winter comes, and the women of the farm try out the bears' grease in vast iron pots, while the young bears gambol about the yard, the scene rivals in picturesqueness the sugar-boiling festivals in the maple groves of Vermont. Bears increase rapidly, and a good milch bear is estimated to yield from ten to twelve pounds of excellent butter, besides a couple of small cheeses, daily. It is not unusual for a bear-farmer to rear annually twenty or thirty young bears, and, as the profit made by the sale of butter and cheese pays the cost of keeping the bear-flock, the premiums paid for the scalps, together with the receipts for bears' grease and bears' meat, yield large profits.

Sioux City has a grocer named Damhim. "Where did you get this butter?" "From the grocer, Damhim," responds the gentle wife; and the husband looks as if he had been anticipated.

EARLY SHOOTING DAYS.

Reminiscences of the Battle-Field and the Jungle.

My earliest experience in fire-arms was acquired as senior partner in a cannon foundry, which did a brisk but limited business. The other member of the firm was a youngster of about my own age, who unfortunately blew himself up during one of our many experiments, thereby ruining his best Sunday trousers and scorching such portions of cuticle as the powder could conveniently get at. This disaster resulted in a dissolution of our copartnership, but I do not remember experiencing any grief in the matter, as our entire stock, consisting of three lead cannons and a large brass key, became my sole property, the transfer of this wealth being figuratively "clinched" by a sound spanking administered by my late partner's mother.

Such little episodes as this were, however, much too common to check my genius, which impelled me to melt the three small cannons into one colossal Columbiad of nearly four inches in length. This monster piece of ordnance became at once the envy of our school, and I received many advantageous offers to dispose of it, one principal capitalist even tempting me with a muskrat skin, two slate pencils, and a "Barlow" knife. This large offer being refused, Jake then tendered me his "other knife" for the privilege of firing it off. Now Jake's other knife was an old acquaintance, which had been at different times owned by every boy in school, and was usually traded "sight unseen," being long past its limits of usefulness. This, however, did not deter me from making the arrangement, which, with the remembrance of my partner's disaster, was somewhat of a relief to me. I do not remember that any one of the nine lives, common to boys and cats, was sacrificed upon this particular occasion, and am therefore inclined to think my invention withstood the explosion, and probably in due time became a peaceful sinker to an "out-line," that being the ultimate destination of all stray pieces of lead falling into our hands.

After this cannon stage, the next fire-arm I can clearly remember was a brass-barreled pistol of four inches in length, and of a shape now happily extinct—the barrel being octagonal, and the muzzle finished something like an old-fashioned cannon, with a kind of swelling like a boil at the end. This weapon was always in great demand for Indian fights (which usually took place in a willow swamp back of the school-house), although it could not be relied upon for going off more than once in ten snaps. In fact, I have seen the chief of the Blackfeet, in full poke-berry war paint, snap at an early settler until the e. s. became disgusted, and summarily ran the chief through with a corn-stalk spear much to the latter's disgust, as he had invested two green apples and a slate pencil for the privilege of firing off the weapon, which, owing to his defeat and sudden death, he was then not allowed to do.

I think that this particular pistol must have had from the first a weak constitution, and certainly it had a most demoniacal disposition—its peculiar idiosyncrasy being to hang fire for eight or nine snaps, and when you naturally attempted to look into the barrel, it almost invariably went off, removing such overhanging portions of a palm-leaf hat or eye-brows, as interfered with the proper combustion of the powder with which we were alone permitted to load it. From this pistol experience I graduated into the ownership of a long and very slim single-barreled gun, labeled "London fine twist," in gilt letters. Doubts have since arisen in my mind as to the genuineness of that "twist," also as to whether a first-class gun could be made for three dollars; but such disloyal misgivings never troubled me then, and no other gun has ever been so thoroughly satisfactory as that flimsy pot-metal weapon, and such little knowledge of gun mechanism as I now possess, I have principally acquired by directing and putting together every part of that gun, which had been unscrewed until it was in danger of tumbling to pieces like Dr. Holmes's "one-horse shay." With it I have hunted buffalo, Indians, elephants, and such other large game as a constant perusal of Gordon Cummings' adventures in Africa could suggest to my imagination. Not that elephants or Indians were very plentiful near the quiet little village in which I spent my boyhood, but that made but little difference. In truth the scarcity of the game made the hunting more pleasant. A passing menagerie, however, finally did afford us an opportunity for a real tiger hunt, which I think will always be remembered with a smile by the participants. And as a piece of genius upon the part of the enterprising Yankee who managed the affair, I have never seen it surpassed.

The menagerie in question had in its collection a very old tiger, far gone in paralysis of the hind-quarters, and evidently only a few doors from tiger heaven. Of this state of the case the public were, of course, unaware, as paralyzed and seedy tigers do not generally have much attraction for average audiences. We, therefore, only knew him from the graphic pictures of his tigership plentifully adorning the fences, in which illustrations he was depicted as carrying off a very blue-faced and measly child. Owing to a very low stage of the money market whilst the menagerie was in town, I was unable to compare the original tiger with his pictures, and therefore had but little expectation of ever seeing him in the flesh when I watched the caravan slowly toil up the long dusty hill as it left town. Imagine, then, my astonishment, when my former partner in the cannon business, breathlessly imparted the astounding news that the tiger had not gone with the menagerie—had, indeed been bought by Jim Green, the tanner, who proposed instituting a grand tiger hunt upon the following Saturday. That is, if forty boys could be found willing to pay half a dollar each for the privilege of joining in the hunt. Green was a keen, red-headed Yankee, who knew boy-nature thoroughly, and especially the boys of that town, and whatever hesitation was manifested by us in raising the money was instantly settled by his careless remark, "that he guessed if that was goin' to be any trouble about the matter he'd best not be any tiger hunt, and send the animile back to the menagerie." That settled it.

What difficulty the other boys experienced in raising the necessary half dollars I but dimly remember; but for myself, I vibrated all the afternoon between the family axe and my mother's copper kettle, undecided which to sacrifice. Finally, after taking a long, bracing look at a convenient poster, I settled upon the axe and "raised the wind."

This being done, and having duly enrolled myself upon Jim Green's list, I prepared myself for the combat by loading up my "London fine twist" with an extra large charge of powder and a round iron slug.

As I look back at this tiger hunt, I remember with surprise that I made these direful preparations without any fear of the danger I was possibly venturing into—a state of mind which was probably shared by the rest of the company, as Saturday morning found every boy ready with his half dollar, and prepared for battle. Such an armament, and such a gang of mongrel dogs, as we had collected I never expect to see again, and assuredly another tiger hunt equal to the one in question I never shall see. Green's tannery was some distance from town, and the point at which the tiger was to be turned out some two miles further down the road, and near a small chestnut grove, which, as Green prudently remarked would be "handy for any feller who might want to climb a tree." This suggestion was universally scouted as an insult, and we started in a body for the grove, to which the tiger had been carted before our arrival.

Up to this time, as I have already said, danger was the last thing occurring to our minds; but, as we neared the grove, visions of the tiger carrying off that blue and measly child would obtrude themselves; and if the projector of the hunt had then offered to return any boy his initiation fee, that boy would have fallen out of the ranks without further delay. Such an idea, however, never entered Green's red head; and although the regiment dropped from a brisk trot into a slow walk, our pride still kept us going, the grove becoming apparently larger and more sanguinary at every step, with the reminiscence of those posters correspondingly vivid. A glimpse of the cart with Green's man Bill standing very composedly beside it, however, reassured us, and we again broke into a brisk trot, being satisfied he would not stand there so quietly if there was any danger, although the tiger had evidently been turned out, and was without doubt now roaming through the woods in his normal and savage condition. We felt we were "in for it," though, and nervously asked Bill where the man-eater had gone. Bill shut one eye rather quizzically, braced himself for a speech, but finally cut the matter short by jerking his thumb toward a blackberry bush, under which, to our amazement, "The Royal Bengal Tiger," "Error of the Forest," etc., was energetically twirling his tail in the last stages of dissolution; and before the various phases of astonishment had faded from the faces of the badly swindled tiger hunters, the "Error" quietly passed in his checks, his countenance brightening into a fixed but seraphic smile, which bore no resemblance to his expression on the child-devouring posters, believed by us to be his customary aspect.

At first we did not know whether to laugh or cry, the situation was so ridiculous, and yet so mortifying; but relief at finding the danger past was very evidently the prominent sentiment. Still, it was a case where the less that was said the sooner it would be forgotten; we therefore meekly sneaked home to explain, with various degrees of success, the disappearance of such collaterals as we had found necessary with which to raise Jim Green's tiger-hunt money—a specimen of financiering which I keenly remember to have, for a time, cast a cloud upon my early shooting days.

SANFORD BENNETT.

SAN FRANCISCO, December 28, 1879.

San Francisco does not seem to tire of exhibitions of physical vigor. The past few months have been marked by frequent exhibitions of this class. Sometimes the Mechanics' Pavilion, sometimes Platt's Hall, has been the scene of action. Our citizens have been ready to come forward with vast quantities of half-dollars, which have been divided between managers and contestants in a manner which shows that the acuteness of the former in pandering to the public tastes is far more pecuniarily profitable than the mere brute force which the populace come to see. Platt's Hall was last week the theatre of a stubborn wrestling match, in which a number of youths pulled each other about the stage for prize money and for fame. We are a sport-loving people. Spectacles of physical prowess command the attention and respect of the Anglo-Saxon races. They have ever done so with great and flourishing peoples. Greece poured forth her manhood to witness the feats of strength and endurance exhibited at the Olympian and other games. Wrestling and running held an important place in these contests. The Greeks were too æsthetic to delight in sensational contests for the sensation alone. Rome, under the Empire, on the other hand, could not be appeased without death and bloodshed. These were necessary elements in her spectacles. On the occasion of Trajan's triumph over the Dacians 10,000 gladiators fought in the arena of the Circus Maximus, which, according to Vitruvius, was capable of containing 600,000 spectators. Tiberius and Claudius inaugurated naval contests on Lake Fæcinus, in the Pontine marshes, which were battles as grim and stern as any fought with Carthage, for the contestants in these battles were slaves who fought for life and liberty. Their manumission depended upon the slaughter of their antagonists. They were, as Byron puts it, "butchered to make a Roman holiday." Honor, an olive garland, and a very small sum of money were the incentives of the Greek youth in their athletic games. The Roman gladiator fought for life and liberty. His watchword was most really and practically, liberty or death. There was no room there for "bilkings" or "giving the thing away," and "dividing the gate money." It is this insincerity on the part of contestants which has caused the San Francisco public so often to doubt whether they are really witnessing those genuine efforts of strength and skill which they paid their money to see. It is a sound and healthy people that manifest sympathy with feats of pluck and strength, and it is disgraceful to abuse this sympathy by the manufacture of illegitimate results.

Mr. Ruskin remains impatient. "My dear Furnivall," he writes, "not one man in 15,000 in the nineteenth century knows, or ever can know, what any line, or any word means used by a great writer. For most words stand for things that are seen, or things that are thought of; and in the nineteenth century there is certainly not one in 15,000 capable of a thought." We do not quarrel with Mr. Ruskin's figures; we only ask him to do himself justice by confessing, without false modesty, that in the 15,000,000 he is himself the exceptional "not one."

SOME PENSÉES OF PASCAL.

[There was a man who at twelve years old, with bars and rounds, created mathematics; who at sixteen composed the most learned treatise on conic sections since the ancients; who at nineteen reduced to mechanism a science which is entirely mental; who at twenty-three demonstrated the weight of the air, and exploded one of the greatest errors of the old physics; who at an age when other men are scarcely beginning to be born, having achieved his course round the circle of human sciences, perceived their nothingness, and turned to religion; who, although from that moment till his death, and which took place in his thirty-ninth year, he was always feeble and in pain, fixed the language which Bossuet and Racine spoke, and furnished a model of the most perfect wit as well as of the closest reasoning; lastly, who in the brief intervals of his pain solved by abstraction the highest problems of geometry, and threw on paper thoughts which breathe as much of God as of man—this astonishing genius was named Blaise Pascal.—Chateaubriand.]

The pleasure of loving without venturing to speak of one's love has its pains, but also its sweetesses. . . . When we are absent from the beloved object, we resolve to do or say many things; but when present with her we are irresolute. Why is this? It is because in absence the reason is not so much disturbed; but it is strangely so in the presence of the object, and to be resolute needs a firmness which the disturbance dispels. . . . When we love deeply, it is always a new sensation to see the beloved one; after a moment of absence, we feel her wanting in our heart. What joy to find her again! We instantly experience a cessation of inquietude.

One sees scarcely anything, whether of right or wrong, which does not change its quality as the climate changes. Three degrees of elevation of the pole upset the whole of jurisprudence. A meridian decides what is truth; after being in force a few years, the fundamental laws change: right has its epochs. The entrance of Saturn into Leo marks the time when such or such a thing began to be a crime. A queer sort of justice of which a river is the boundary! True on this side of the Pyrenees, false on the other.

Man is nothing but a disguise, a falsehood, an hypocrisy, toward both himself and others. Human life is nothing else than a perpetual illusion.

Nature confounds the skeptics, and reason confounds the dogmatists.

We arrive at truth, not by reason alone, but still more by the heart. It is thus that we obtain first principles, and it is vain that reasoning, which has no hand in this, endeavors to combat them.

Either there is a God, or there is not; to which side shall we incline? Reason can give us no assistance, yet we must take one side or the other; we must stake on the question. Heads, then, that there is a God! If you gain, you gain everything; if you lose, you lose nothing. And thus, since you are forced to stake it, it would be contrary to all reason to cling to this life, rather than to stake it for an infinite gain, of which there is an even chance; while the loss, even if it should happen, would, after all, be the loss of nothing.

Man is neither angel nor beast; the bad luck of those who wish to play the angel is that they play the beast.

When I consider the brevity of my life, swallowed up in the eternity before and after it, the littleness of the space that I occupy and even perceive, engulfed in the infinite immensity of the spaces which I am ignorant of, and which are ignorant of me, I am terrified, and astonished to see myself here rather than there; for there is no reason why here rather than there, why now rather than then. Who has put me here? By whose order or arrangement have this time and place been assigned to me? How many kingdoms of being have no knowledge of us? The eternal silence of these infinite spaces terrifies me.

A man no longer loves the woman he loved ten years ago. Very likely. She is no longer the same, nor is he. He was young, and she too; she is quite different now. Perhaps he would love her still, were she what she was then.

What a chimera, then, is man! What a novelty, a monster, a chaos, a contradiction, a prodigy! A judge of all things, yet an imbecile worm of the earth; a depository of truth, yet a sink of doubt and error; at once the glory and the refuse of the universe.

Cleopatra's nose—if it had been shorter, the whole face of the world would have changed.

The last act is bloody, however fine the comedy may be in all the rest. They throw the earth on one's head at last, and there it is for ever.

Nothing is stable for us. We burn with desire to discover a firm platform and enduring basis on which to build a tower that may rise to the infinite; but our whole foundation cracks, and the earth opens beneath us down to the deep.

Man is only a subject full of error, which is natural to him and ineffaceable without grace. Nothing shows him the truth; everything deludes him.

We desire truth, and find nothing but uncertainty in ourselves. We seek happiness, and find only misery and death.

There are only two kinds of men; the righteous who believe themselves sinners, and the sinners who believe themselves righteous.

Are you the less a slave for being liked and caressed by your master? You are fortunate, slave; your master caresses you. He will beat you presently.

This dog is mine, say these poor children; that is my place in the sunshine. There is the beginning and picture of the usurpation of the whole world.

When we love without equality of rank, ambition may accompany the commencement of love, but in a little time love becomes the master. He is a tyrant who does not suffer a companion; he wills to be alone; all passions must yield to him and obey him.

Recognize, O proud man, what a paradox you are to yourself! Humble yourself, impotent reason; be silent, imbecile nature; understand that man is infinitely beyond men, and learn from your Master what your true condition is. Listen to God!

THE PARD'S EPISTLE.

He Addresses the Widow Without the Knowledge of His Wife.

ANGEL TOWN, Dec. 30, 1879.

DEAR OLD FRIEND:—I'm writin' to ye unbeknown to the ol' woman—that's Maud, ye know. We've bin two souls 'ith but a single thought, two hearts thet beat ez one, fur five days, an' I don't reckon it's agin the dictates o' married life to speak o' yer wile ez the ol' woman, is it? The reason I'm writin' to ye is because I thought ye might feel a little sore ef I didn't let ye know how married life was agreein' 'ith me. An' the reason I hev'n't chipped to Maud is because she's queer, an' might think it wasn't 'zac'ly proper, ye understan'. Ye know w'at wimmen is, Mrs. Jones, an' ye know how little it takes to make one o' them jealous o' the man she dotes on. But I'm squar. Serciety hezn't changed me a bit, an' I stick to my friends like a poor man's plaster to the back of a beggar. I've learned a hull raft o' things sence I got to goin' into serciety. It's like the fust lessons I tuk in fero; it's a game I didn't understan' w'en I fust tackled it—or it tackled me—but I put up my coin to larn, an' I don't find it no trick at all now to pull the cards or keep cases. One o' the things I noticed partickler was w'en I landed in this yer town, an' fell up agin the red-headed duck thet stan's ahind the bar in this yer tavern, 'ith a big pen stuck over his ear, playin' the smart Aleck over the people thet want to put up in the shebang. O' course, arter I'd slid Maud up into the sittin' room, Bill an' me moseys round into the saloon to git a cocktail afore grub, an' the barkeeper, seein' we was tenderfeet, wanted to know ef we'd registered.

"What's thet?" says I.

"Yer an' it," says Bill. "Don't ye know enough to keep yer mouth shet, an' not show yer ign'rance afore strangers?"

"Well," says I, "you're the pilot on this yer trip, an' I'll leave this registerin' bizness in your hands." So we hed our cocktail, an' I follered Bill into the place whar the red-headed galoot was superintendin' a nigger shovlin' coal into the stove, an' Bill slides up to the bar an' says:

"My friend, we're goin' to lay over here a day or two."

"Ye air, air ye?" says the tavern duck, kinder careless like, an' throwin' his nose up ez ef he'd jes' sniffed a cargo o' Albany beef three months on the road, an' the thermometer risin' a hundred an' twenty-five in the shade an' no shade to speak of.

"Ain't objectin', air ye?" says Bill.

"Nary time," says the tavern rooster.

"Well, thet's all right," says Bill; "perdooce."

"What?" says the rooster.

"The register," says Bill.

"Yer leanin' on it," says the rooster. An' so he was. An' the smile o' thet clerk was jes' beautiful to look at, it was so high-toned, an' made Bill so mad.

"I'd a knowed it ef it was anythin' like the kind they hev in fust-class taverns. An' ef it ain't too much trouble to yer r'yal highness, I'd like to hev a pen an' a drop or two o' ink." Bill tried his level best to be sarcastic, but it didn't hev no effect on Mr. Bugeater.

"Pen's on the rack an' ink's in the bottle on the register desk," says he, kinder sharp like. This riled Bill more'n ever, an' he could'n't hardly hold the pen, he was so wrathful. I was lookin' over his shoulder w'ile he was writin' down the names o' the weddin' party, an' this is the way he put us down:

"Miss Minnie Oglethorpe, from Saucelito."

"Mr. William Belcher, Esq., from Rawhide, Tuolumne County."

"Col. Hannibal Tarbox, from Temescal."

"Miss Evangeline Snooks, from Sacramento."

"Mr. James Snaggleby, Esq., and wife, from Rooshen Hill."

Thet las' remark settled the hull bizness. The clerk took a squint at the book, an' grinned like a coyote swoopin' down on a dead horse. He took another squint at a bulletin board 'ith a lot o' little long keers onto it, an' grinned wus'n ever, showed his teeth ez fur back ez Los Angeles gas light 'll flicker into the mouth of a tavern clerk. Then he marked down some numbers, rung a bell, an' w'en a boy loafed in from a back room, give him a bunch o' keys, an' said, "Show 'em up," grinnin' like a monkey's corpse all the time. An' we was showed up an' no mistake, clear up to the top story, right under the roof.

"W'at 've we done?" says Bill to the little feller.

"How d'ye mean?" says the boy.

"Didn't know but the las' judgment was close on hand, an' we was goin' up to the Cap'n's office fur our checks. Thought we'd git posted on w'at kind o' records was goin' to be pulled on us."

"Oh, thet's nothin'," says the young un; "elevator's busted. Besides, this is high toned; best rooms on top; fust floor under the roof; Palace Hotel style."

Thet's the word, Mrs. Jones; style's the rulin' passion on the top floor o' this yer shanty. Two cheers an' a three-quarter bed in the bridal chamber, an' the Lord knows w'at in the other chambers. Talk 'bout mad wimmen? Ef Maud an' Miss Snooks wasn't mad then I don't want a cent. Miss Snooks is a peaked instootion thet don't like Bill. She's Maud's aunt, an' she took advantage o' thet circumstance to go fur me an' my ol' pard fur makin' her sleep in a garret, ez she called it. Then she pranced down into the office to hev it out 'ith thet red headed duck. W'en she came back she was sneerin' like an alligator.

"Who registered this party?" says she.

"Me," says Bill, kinder sheepish.

"Hev ye ever registered at fust class hotels afore," says she.

"Oh, yes, sevr'al," says Bill, tryin' to face it out.

"Then I've got nothin' to say," says she. "But my experience in sich matters is, thet w'en bridal parties is on ther towers the bride and groom's name comes fust on the list, an' the rest o' 'em follers. But thet ain't w'at's the snagger here. Ye registered Maud an' Mr. Snaggleby ez James Snaggleby an' wife."

"Well, w'at's the matter 'ith thet," says Bill, lookin' round fur a knot hole to crawl through.

"Nothin' pertick'ler," says Maud's aunt; "only in the best serciety ther ain't no sich things ez wives."

"W'at air they then?" whispers Bill, gittin' weaker 'n weaker ev'ry clatter.

"Ladies, sir," says she, "no wonder the clerk didn't give us better accommodations. Plebeians register ez 'Snaggleby an' wife,' the aristocracy write it 'Snaggleby an' lady.' I thought Bill 'd drop on the spot; but he braced up long enough to reach the bar, and he didn't let up revivin' his droopin' sperrits 'til me an' the nigger thet cleans the dishes kerried him to bed that night. Thet's one thing I learned. The serciety woman who gits married ain't a wife—she's a lady. Ef you copper the queen, an' the queen loses, ye win; ef she wins, ye lose. But I haven't told ye how I'm makin' out 'ith my 'lady.' We're jest like—well, to tell ye the truth, we're only jest like brother an' sister, or father an' daughter, so fur; but, ez the honeymoon rolls along, Maud says mebbe her respec' 'll climb up to my passion, ez she calls it, or my passion 'll slide down to her respec', so thet we ken clinch on some kind of a proposition, like two jockeys hagglin' over a hoss trade. She says red-hot love ain't aristocratic or respectable, an' I say it's human nacher. W'at do you think about it? We're hangin' fire like a damp fuse in the blaze of a flarin' candle, an' thet's the principal reason why I'm writin' to ye 'ithout lettin' my lady know about it. I can't git nuthin' out o' Bill, 'cause he played himself out on the register bizness, an' 's bin drunk all the time sence. 'Twouldn't do to tackle o' Tarbox on the question, 'cause he'd side in 'ith Maud. I'd sooner ask advice o' the devil 'n I would o' Miss Snooks; an' ez fust Miss Oglethorpe, she's too flighty. I don't like to ask Frisbie, or Ned Rodgers, or Ike Potter, or Hi Forschner, 'cause I'm afear'd they might laugh at me. An', besides, it takes a woman to copper a woman. So I want ye to give me a few p'int on this yer high-pressure an' low-pressure love racket. W'en ye write, send yer letter to Bill, 'cause Maud's aristocratic aunt 's got into the habit o' openin' my letters by mistake; ye understan'. Maud 'n me 's gittin' along fust rate ez fur ez likin' each other 's concerned, an' I don't want ye to think we're goin' to hev a flare-up, but w'at I want to know 's how soon we'll git to lovin' each other like birds o' the same breed. I've deeded our roost up on Rooshen Hill to Maud, and made over all my government bonds to her, an' I've loaned o' Tarbox all the loose cash I hed to make a deal fur us both in the Bodies, which he says 's goin' to boom clean over the Comstock in the spring. Maud 's hintin' round about givin' her aunt a bank account, but Bill says he'll never hev nothin' to do 'ith me ef I do, an' thar I am agin between two fires. Ye might untangle thet little snare, too, ef ye want to. I'm thinkin' there'll be another weddin' purty soon ef Bill an' Miss Oglethorpe keep up the gait they've struck lately. Wenever Bill 's sober enough he an' she go moonin' off out under the trees, settin' round on out-o'-the-way benches, a lookin' ez ef they'd bin called fur an' couldn't go. I know it's all right ez fur ez the gal's concerned, fur Bill, you know, 's too sharp to be ketched in any soft snaps. Besides, w'en he makes the ruffle I'll put up a little sack to help 'em along. Gi' my regards to ev'rybody I know 'round Jackass, an' don't furt to write to Yer ol' friend, JIM SNAGGLEBY.

N. B.—W'en ye write don't furt to send the letter to Bill, on account of the heptagon, w'ich is Maud's aunt.

JIM.

The Charming Woman.

We must not confound the charming woman with the fascinating woman. They are different types, and belong to a different genus. The charming woman is not a deep nature. She is not always patient; she is not, as a rule, a good family woman. She must have the little element, vanity, to sustain her through the necessary schooling. She has a good deal of knowledge of human nature, and has entirely pruned down the egotism that makes a woman utterly unfit for society. She is naturally of quick sympathies, and has an amazing power of withstanding ennui. In point of fact, she is more trained and disciplined than many a higher nature. She has a genius for making the best of everything and of everybody, and would put the world in good temper with itself. She has a deal of good nature and consideration for others and a talent for investing trifles with an attractive form, like a skillful cuisiniere who can make a souffle out of any small materials. The term may be most applicable to an accomplished hostess. The flock of delicious little inconsistencies about her make the day go by, harmonize conflicting natures, and animate the household. She has an excellent tact, toning into harmony the sympathies and antipathies of those around her. She need not necessarily be gifted, but she lends herself to the gift of others—by turns elicits and suppresses them, and keeps a table in perfect tune. She can deftly turn a subject that is disagreeable, and lead us to a subject that can gratify. She has the eyes of Argus, watching over her guests' comfort, yet always appears at ease. The charming woman is not what is understood by the term a good listener, although she can give the intelligent smile and the responsive glance that are occasionally more eloquent than words; but long stories and conversational essays are against her creed. She loves to make the conversation ripple; she is attracted by the discussion of the smaller aspects of life—those that lend themselves to epigrammatic maxims and witty sayings; she knows how to make much of the brighter nothings that are said; and she also excels in the art of kindly taking down a bore. She never offends in dress; she lags behind somewhat in adopting the newest fashions; she is never at the height, but she is never out of fashion. There is a flavor of individuality in her costume, for she is well aware of the strong points in her personal appearance; and, with a subtle coquetry, she makes the most of them. She enhances them, but does it without emphasis. It is one of the tenets of the charming woman never to be emphatic. She never offends in taste, and holds it as the greatest sin to hurt the feelings. She never drives one into a corner; never asks one a direct question; never pays a direct compliment; she has a delightful fashion of insinuating that she is pleased and interested; and always displays a genial appreciation of her kind. She does not, however, belong to the tragedy of life, and you must not exact from her enduring sympathy. Her eyes will grow dim and her voice soft when she hears a tale of woe; but she will not weight her life with any emotion beyond that of the passing moment. She cannot carry a burden. You must not put a high-bred racer to draw a wagon. She has nothing of the heroine about her; yet there is a certain pluck and determination in the way she carries out her philosophy of life, for it requires both to remain bright and light-hearted as years go on, without showing any trace of hardness, and the charming woman is always essentially feminine.

THE OTHER POETS.

An Aspiration.

[Helen Doty Compton sends to a Chicago journal the following verses, which in manuscript have been in her possession, she says, for ten years. We reprint them as our humble contribution of data to the discussion concerning their author's alleged insanity.]

God! what a pitiful mockery

Seems this poor human speech,

To paint the marvelous majesty

Which my life designs to teach.

God! how much less than very death

Is this out-poken tongue,

To grasp the glorious hymn of faith

Which my soul and I have sung.

Oh, but for living lips of fire

To utter out my heart,

And flash the tones from my spirit lyre

In the voice with which they start!

Oh, but for language that should scorch

The innermost heart of hell,

And gleam and glare like a flaming torch

Through the depths where devils dwell!

Oh, for an utterance that should sweep

Like the red-hot-tipped simoom,

And wither the damning things that keep

This beautiful world in gloom!

Oh, for a voice whose tone should fall,

Like the touch of a mother's prayer,

On the sick and sorrowing souls of all

Who pine for a holier air!

Oh, if my passionate scorn of wrong,

My prodigal love of right,

And the beautiful hopes that thrill and throng

My soul like the stars of night—

Oh, if but these could pass my lips

In the night with which they rise,

How I'd tear and trample the black eclipse

That shroudeeth my brothers' eyes!

O Christ! for a boundless pentecost

To rest on my heaving soul,

And give it speech of the Holy Ghost

Instead of this stammering dote.

Then, Jesu! the lofty hymn sublime

I'd ring on life's panting sea

Should ring on the farthest shore of time,

And grapple eternity.

—Richard Realf.

Rondeau.

A rose fell from her hair last night.

When dawn undid the frail lamplight,

And the waltz went more languidly,

I brought it her. She looked on me,

Half turned to set her wreath aright.

I wonder was the dawn's delight

Lovelier or more infinite

When Cypris o'er the roseate sea

Arose.

A rose.

Red flower of flowers, 'tis yours by right

To touch her long throat's rose and white,

And fall for love. Tell her for me

How hard sometimes it is to be

So near a rose, alas! not quite

In the Canon.

Intent the conscious mountains stood,

The friendly blossoms nodded,

As through the cañon's lonely wood

We two in silence plodded.

A something owned our presence good;

The very breeze that stirred our hair

Whispered a gentle greeting;

A grand, free courtesy was there,

A welcome, from the summit bare

Down to the brook's entreating.

Stray warblers in the branches dark

Shot through the leafy passes,

While the long note of meadow-lark

Rose from the neighboring grasses;

The yellow lupines, spark on spark,

From the more open woodland way,

Flashed through the sunlight faintly;

A wind-blown little flower, once gay,

Looked up between its petals gray

And smiled a message saintly.

The giant ledges, red and seamed,

The clear, blue sky, tree-fretted;

The mottled light that round us streamed,

The brooklet, vexed and petted;

The bees that buzzed, the gnats that dreamed,

The fitting, gauzy things of June;

The plain, far-off, like misty ocean,

Or cloud-land bound, a fair lagoon—

They sang within us like a tune,

They swayed us like a dream of motion.

The hour went loitering to the west,

The shadows lengthened slowly;

The radiant snow on mountain crest

Made all the distance holy.

Near by, the earth lay full of rest,

The sleepy foot-hills, one by one,

Dimpled their way to twilight;

And ere the perfect day was done

There came long gleams of tinted sun,

Through heaven's crimson sky-light.

Slowly crept on the listening night,

The sinking moon shone pale and slender;

We bailed the cotton-woods, in sight,

The home-roof gleaming near and tender,

Guiding our quickened steps aright.

Soon darkened all the mighty hills,

The gods were sitting there in shadow;

Lulled were the noisy woodland rills,

Silent the silvery woodland trills—

'Twas starlight over Colorado!

—Mary Mapes Dodge.

The Bath.

With rosy palms against her bosom pressed,

To stay the shudder that she dreads of old,

Lysidice glides down till silver-cold

The water girdles half her glowing breast;

A yellow butterfly in flowery quest

Rifles the roses that her tresses hold;

A breeze comes wandering through the fold on fold

Of draperies curtaining her shrine of rest.

Soft beauty, like her kindred petals strewed

Along the crystal coolness, there she lies.

What vision gratifies these gentle eyes?

She dreams she stands where yesterday she stood—

Where, while the whole arena shrieks to see,

Hot in the sand a gladiator dies.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1880.

We thought, and had good reason to think, that General Grant was not, and would not become, a candidate for reelection. He had proclaimed his desire to retire from public life; he left the Presidential office with loud expressions of weariness of its duties, and widely proclaimed his delight at being relieved from its responsibilities. When abroad, and to a magistrate in China, he declared his intention not again to seek or accept political honors. His friends, right and left, claiming to express the sentiments communicated to them in private correspondence, announced that he did not wish to be, and would not be, a candidate. With this understanding, upon his return from foreign journeying and making his first landing upon American soil in California, there was a non-partisan expression toward General Grant that had never before been accorded to an American citizen—that never ought to be accorded to any human being till he has laid aside the ambition of office, and that never would have been accorded to General Grant except upon the conviction that he would not again become a party leader or look to political and partisan support for further personal advancement. If, at the time when Democrats, "Greeley" Republicans, and Southern men—men who differed from General Grant's political views, who differed with him honestly, and who yet were honorable enough not to permit any consideration of past political feelings to come between them and him in doing him honor as a private citizen—were rivaling each other to give him the honors of public receptions, splendid pageants, sumptuous banquets, in recognition of his past military service and his distinguished executive position; if, we say, at that time he knew himself to be under the manipulation of a secret political junta, who were bippodroming him through the country for a political purpose, with a view to make him the Republican nominee for President, then be lent his great name to a disonorable purpose, and allowed himself to be used in a most questionable manner. The fact that his manipulators are unknown, and that it is necessary to work this machine in secret, is enough to condemn the whole movement in the opinion of honest men who do not want office. Opposed as we are to the election of a third-term candidate, we should be disarmed from the kind of criticism we are now making if this were a frank, open, and manly candidacy. It is not. General Grant knows whether he desires to be nominated by the Republican National Convention, and he knows whether his political friends are plotting in that direction. General Grant owes it to the nation that he should make his politics an open book, and he owes it to his own good name that he should not permit machine politicians to engage in secret and subtle plottings for his advancement. It is not honest; and every gentleman, when he shall find that all this "Grant reception" business of which has been a part has been inaugurated to advance ambitious schemes and the personal interests of those who have pulled the wires behind the scenes, will have a right to feel justly indignant. No one cares to be used as the unconscious capper of a game that he does not approve; no one is willing to be made the puppet of a programme that he does not wish to succeed. To drop figures, no man, having any pride of character, is willing to be used in a Grant "whoop up," or a Grant "boom," who does not desire to see General Grant for the third time a President of the United States. The politician who has been thus "played" may hide his wounds for motives of policy or in mortification; but those members of the Republican party, who have intelligence enough to detect the fraud or pride enough to resent it, will have the courage to revenge it when the opportunity presents itself at the electoral urn.

For General Grant the nation has a proper respect, for his military service a proper gratitude, and for his executive achievements a discriminating appreciation. There is a tendency in all communities to hero-worship; but when the war, reason resumes its sway. General Grant is an uncommon man, and has had an uncommon history. It does not do to say that he is the accident of our war, and that he has drifted upon the wave of success without directing it. General Grant is a great man to those who have been near to him; but it must be remembered that it was God, and not General Grant, who spake creation into existence, and fashioned the universe for his purpose. It was Christ who died for the redemption of mankind, and through whose atonement salvation was made possible, and not General Grant. It was Washington, around whose standard the revolting provinces gathered and achieved national independence, and who became the Father of his Country; it was not General Grant. It was not General Grant alone who, by the accident of his military chieftainship, saved the national life from destruction, and the American Union from dismemberment; it was the millions of soldiers and sailors who fought for it; it was the $4,000,000,000 of money expended for it; it was the gallant blood poured out for it on bloody battle-fields. It was Lincoln and Seward, and Stanton and Bates, and Sumner and Morton, and Thomas, McPherson, and Lyons, and a host of other renowned American statesmen and soldiers who rescued our nation from the engulfment of civil war; and while all accord to the distinguished soldier who carried off the honors that were possible at the close of a struggle, where numbers, wealth and valor overcame valor, we are not willing to keep him in office at the expense of principles, the value of which is greater than the lives of men and the wealth of nations. A third term is a dangerous and indefensible innovation, in comparison with which the lives of all the surviving heroes of the war are not to be estimated. It is a change of the constitution and a violation of the unwritten common law of the American Republic. It is the beginning of imperialism and military government, of force and centralization, and it is the beginning of the end of republicanism and democracy.

The Chronicle's Washington correspondent, having owned himself a Grant man, his statements must be taken with some grains of allowance. When his personal and political character is considered, and his and his associates' former connection with the Grant administration, the necessity for not believing anything he says becomes more apparent. A correspondent, writing from Washington to the New York Herald, says various reports of general agreement among Republican leaders in favor of the renomination of Grant for a third term are ridiculed by well informed people there, as evident fabrications of Grant people, who find themselves so much weaker than they hoped that they attempt to impose on the credulity of the country by false news. Mr. Charles Nordhoff, writing to the New York Tribune from Washington, says Secretary Sherman has always been opposed to a third term, and is now as strongly opposed to it as ever. He does not and will not support the movement to make General Grant the Republican Presidential candidate; and he believes that Grant would be a weak candidate for the party, and that his nomination would make defeat highly probable, if not certain. Mr. Sherman is a Presidential candidate himself, and he will not in any case give up his candidacy, or give his strength and influence to General Grant. Any pretense that Sherman or his friends have surrendered, or mean to, or will surrender, to the Grant movement, is a falsehood put forward by those pushing the Grant movement, in order to delude the public into the belief that they are strong, when, in fact, they are weak. The recently developed weakness of the Grant movement in the Northwest has alarmed the Grant men, and they see with an open appeal to party support they will make no show. Hence, various misrepresentations concerning Sherman and Blaine's willingness to withdraw in favor of Grant. Mr. Blaine is himself a Presidential candidate, and has no intention of withdrawing. His friends, among whom are many of the shrewdest and most active politicians of the Republican party, find that Mr. Blaine is very strong in the West and Northwest, and neither he nor they have the least intention of making their submission to the Grant movement. The report that President Hayes favors or prefers the renomination of Grant, or sympathizes with the Grant movement, is equally and entirely false. The pretense of the Grant men that the choice of Mr. Cameron to be Chairman of the National Committee was a success of theirs is also false. The Grant men wished to make Mr. Thomas C. Platt, of New York, chairman, as their first choice. Since the recent meeting of the National Committee it is admitted that the sentiment for Grant is weak in all parts of the country, more especially in the West and Northwest. It is regarded as certain that with Grant as a candidate the Republicans would lose Ohio, and his nomination would make Illinois and Wisconsin uncertain States, and Indiana sure for the Democrats. Among the prudent and earnest Republicans, the attempt to nominate General Grant for a third term is, therefore, looked upon as a grave blunder. These Republicans believe that with some other man than Grant they can win, and that either Sherman, Blaine, or Washburne would make a successful candidate. They note as dangerous to the party the possible attempt of the Grant men to go into the convention and nominate their man by a rush and hurrah; but they say they will be forewarned of this; that precautions will be taken to make the Convention a deliberative and not a mere yelling body, and that, while the Grant men may propose their candidate, he will be met by equally zealous and enthusiastic presentations of the names of Blaine, Sherman, and Washburne. It is admitted in all intelligent political circles that General Grant and his political friends are plotting for his nomination; that his Southern trip is a movement in this direction, and a coalition is hinted at between the stalwart Grant Republicans and the Bourbons of the South; that the nomination is to be forced by party trick, and, that being accomplished, party machinery in the North can be depended on. The promoters of the Grant movement confess that, unless they can nominate the General by a hurrah, without a struggle, or unless they can cause a deadlock in the Convention, and then bring in Grant's name as a solvent, they can not expect success. One of these two plans will be tried, and they found their chief hopes, not upon the withdrawal of other candidates, as is alleged, but, upon the friends of others making so stubborn a fight as to weary the Convention and incline it to accept Grant as the speediest way of completing their work. The Springfield Republican notices a decline of the Grant hoo over all the country, and says: "The number of public men who have openly advocated Grant's nomination is not large, and is not growing. We shall very likely see billows of Grant sentiment occasionally hereafter, but the nearer we come to the Presidential struggle, the more availability will be studied, and mere glory will not disguise the radical objections, first, to the election of any man to a third term of the Presidency, second, to the choice of General Grant for so unprecedented a commission in a period of general prosperity and peace." Two or three facts this week place Mr. Blaine very clearly in the race and confirm the opinion of this journal, expressed after his New York speech, that there was more danger of his nomination than of Grant's. The theory that the friends of all other candidates will back out in favor of Grant, if he wants to run, is thus thoroughly exploded.

The Hon. George C. Perkins, Governor elect, goes to the capital this evening, to be prepared to enter upon his official duties on Monday. We expect from Governor Perkins an honorable and successful execution of his executive duties. His antecedents justify this expectation. His intellectual qualities are of a character that will authorize us to demand from him a superior administration. Our knowledge of the new Governor authorizes us to say that his one leading purpose is to reap the honors of the executive position, rather than its emoluments, by faithful service. His appointments are, to a degree, an open secret. The Governor's mode of treating applicants for official position is admirable, and the more to be noticed and commended because not common. He treats every person asking for himself or friend a place with frankness. If he knows he can not appoint them, he says so. If he can hold out no inducement, he says so. If he is balancing his mind between one or more candidates, he says so. His appointments will all be Republican, although in one instance, at least, it is believed he would like to have conferred an honorable appointment, one without compensation, upon Governor Irwin. If Governor Irwin had not appointed William F. White to be Bank Commissioner, there is no honor that we would not most willingly have accorded him. We are not such bigoted Republicans that we would not gladly see a competent and honorable Democrat in the service of the State; but when Governor Irwin swallowed the sand-lot—well, let that pass; we remember that the angels fell, that Lord Bacon took bribes, that one of the Apostles blundered, that Arnold turned traitor, that Wehster made a mistake. Governor Irwin will not be on the Prison Commission.

The ARGONAUT has not lived in vain. It has achieved a great social triumph; it is proud of it. It departs from its usual modest rule and boasts. Good society no longer feeds with its feet in the trough. Young men, and middle-aged men, and old men no longer get drunk on champagne at social gatherings; they do not appropriate cigars and carry them away by the pocketful; they do not transport victuals from the banqueting-room to the drawing-room; they do not crowd around the supper-table and gorge themselves. They wait upon the ladies first; they give the elder guests precedence; they are becoming polite, and remembering that they are gentlemen. They are again recognizing the fact that elegant parties are not given for the single purpose of eating and drinking. The ladies are grateful to us because they are not crushed, nor starved, nor do they have the elegant dresses ruined by careless, eager and half-drunk gentlemen. Thanks to the ARGONAUT, it is becoming fashionable to abolish champagne, thus dispensing with drunkenness, and its attendant disorder; a wine and cigar room provided in some quiet place, where young gentlemen: not expected to spend their evening. The entertainment of New Year's day, thanks again to the ARGONAUT, was decorously conducted, and men acted like gentlemen. It ought not to have been necessary for us to "make fight," and we hope it will not be again.

AFTERMATH.

Gov. Perkins's appointments have become an open secret, which anybody can guess. For Private Secretary, Albert Hart, formerly in the office of Gov. Booth, and more lately librarian in San Francisco—a good appointment. Mr. Hart is thoroughly competent and always courteous. For Executive Clerk, W. S. Safford, formerly and for twelve years County Judge of Butte County. For Harbor Commissioner, first appointment, in place of Frank McCoppin, who we wish might have retained the place, George Evans, of Stockton. Mr. Evans was Mr. Perkins's opponent in convention for the nomination for Governor. This appointment is not a bargain, but a generous recognition on the part of Gov. Perkins of political service. Capt. W. A. Philips, an experienced sea captain, will succeed Mr. Bruce Lee. For Port Wardens, Capt. George Bromley, Archibald Harlowe, and Julius Green. Capt. Bromley everybody knows, and Archy Harlowe everybody ought to know. Mr. Green was the defeated Republican candidate for Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco. A very great contest has been made for Prison Commissioners. An intrigue has been going on in the interest of the Warden to be appointed by the Commission. We know some of the applicants, and their name is legion—Hammond, Catlin, Gaskill, Mason, Jo Eldridge, Anderson of Marin, Niles of Los Angeles, James Eastman, Rev. Albert Williams, Pinney, Shattuck of Oakland, Stillwell of San Rafael, Smith Brown of Napa, Conger of Los Angeles, Highton, and so on ad infinitum. Wallace Emerson of Alameda, Dr. W. F. McNutt of San Francisco, A. P. Whitney of Petaluma, N. D. Rideout of Yuba, and William H. Mills of Sacramento will take the cup in this "go-as-you-please" political sweepstake, open to all ages and conditions, without reference to former party servitude.

Everything that is salt, everybody who ever smelt bilge water, or ever had a barnacle on any part of his person, who ever went down to the sea in ships, or who ever commanded scow, schooner or canal-boat, asked for the position of Pilot Commissioner. Captains Eldridge, Williston, Morton, Travers, and Knowles will be appointed. Those who do not get it are commended not to drown themselves. For Superintendent of State Printing, J. D. Young of Sacramento; for his assistant, Mr. Jefferis, of the Sacramento Union. For Adjutant-General, Samuel W. Backus—a good appointment. For private staff, we are not quite certain. If we were Governor, and thought war was imminent, we should appoint as body-guard to our sacred executive person old war-worn veterans like Gen. John McComb, Col. W. H. L. Barnes, Col. Grannis, Archibald Wasson, W. W. Dodge, and others who have never come away wounded from any battle-field; but, if we thought ours was to be a reign of peace, we would appoint none of those fat fellows, but would select a nice lot of trim young heroes, who would dress well and have good horses; and who knew how to dance, and ride, and flirt, and do the social of our administration in good style. We would select Col. Grannis and Col. Dodge for their past experience and because their present regimentals will fit no one else; Fred Crocker, James C. Flood, Jr., young Spreckels, and McLennan, so that when we paraded the streets the balconies should be crowded with dimity and luminous with smiles, and we would fancy it was in honor of our executive person, and not of the young fellows we had about us. If we have guessed at all correctly, Gov. Perkins is drawing to his administration and to his councils good citizens, honest men, and deserving Republicans. We wish him success, and four complete happy years of administration.

After writing the above, we observe in the newspapers the following names as constituting the Governor's staff: Col. G. W. Grannis, Chief Engineer; Col. William Harney, Paymaster General; Judge S. C. Denson, of Sacramento, Judge Advocate; Dr. E. A. Stockton, of Stockton, Surgeon General; W. W. Dodge, Frank P. McLennan (son of Donald McLennan, of this city), J. C. Flood, Jr., C. F. Crocker (son of Charles Crocker), J. C. Logan of Butte, and J. D. Spreckels (son of Claus Spreckels), Aids.

A few nights ago another six days' walking match was begun at the Mechanics' Pavilion, and preceded by a two-hours' go-as-you-please race between women. There were some eight or ten females on the sawdust track, and the vast building engulfed several thousands of spectators. The countenances of the women as they tramped, walked, or ran, according to which method they considered best for husbanding their strength, afforded a good study of feminine character. Here, you had your thoroughly American girl, with tightly compressed lips and do-or-die resolution in her form and energetic tread; there, a girl whose red face and sanguine temperament betokened Celtic or Saxon parentage; another with Israelite written in bold nasal characters upon her face; and one, who was the most purely American of all, in the person of a reasonably ugly Indian squaw. At it they went for two hours, until the only females left in the running were a girl of fourteen from San Mateo County and the Indian squaw. In spite of heroic efforts on the part of the fourteen-year-old, the solidity, weight, muscle, and practical training of the aboriginal, brought her at least a lap to the front when time was called, much to the disgust of the lookers-on. All of which goes to prove that city girls are inferior to country girls in athletics, and the latter to female human animals nurtured in barbarism. Q. E. D. Verbum sap.

On the principle that every little helps, the friends of General Grant are leaving no stone unturned for whatever will assist the boom. On Monday last they telegraphed across the continent the particulars of an interview between the great man and a small street beggar, who was eventually made happy by a benefaction of nickels. A telegram also came blazing and thundering along the wires relating how that Mrs. Grant, getting out of her carriage to call on Mrs. Hayes, espied Jerry Smith, formerly her footman, and exclaimed: "Why, there's Smith!" Really, in the face of such evidence as this of Grant's fitness for the Presidency, opposition appears ungracious, and not entirely free from an element of disloyalty. It ought to be mentioned here that Mr. Smith's height is given in the dispatch as six feet and two inches.

There is in every large city a criminal and semi-criminal element—men directly and indirectly interested in having bad and badly administered laws—strong enough to hold the balance of power between the political parties, and make the municipal government whatever they please that it shall be. They do not always exercise this power, it is true; sometimes (though rarely) because respectable people have the good sense in municipal elections not to divide on "party lines;" more frequently because these dangerous classes have not that good sense themselves—do not work in concert for their own vicious interests. Commonly, however, and in the long run, this class of malefactors and abettors of malefaction vote against good government with a tolerably intelligent instinct for selecting the worst men. They ought all to be disfranchised. Is a felon a worse citizen than an habitual misdemeanant? Usually he is a better. The law should deny the privilege of voting to a man who has been, say, three times convicted of a misdemeanor.

That would not rid the polls of the bulk of those who have an interest in bad government. To get rid of the remainder—the men who rent houses for immoral purposes, keep whisky mills frequented by thieves and gamblers, etc.—would be a more difficult matter, but having altered the law in the manner suggested, it would be an experiment worth trying to make the pursuit of several sorts of business misdemeanors.

We are impressed with the idea that Gov. Garcelon, of Maine, has done nothing more than his duty in endeavoring to reform the electoral abuses of that State. The executive who holds the guardians of the ballot box to a rigid and even technical observance of the law has our approval. To be lax, or indifferent, or careless in receiving and returning votes, is a crime against good government. Mistakes and errors around the electoral urn always enure to the benefit of political and party rascals. We have seen the effect of such things in this State. We have legislated in the direction of reform; we guard our polling places for a hundred feet from electioneering vagabonds; we close our saloons; we demand a ballot upon peculiar paper of regulated length and width and in specified type; we disfranchise all not knowing how to vote intelligently, and we throw out the vote of the precinct not returned according to law. This is right; and it is all stuff to blame Democrats in Maine for taking advantage of the mistakes, blunders, or crimes of Republicans. There should be no mistakes around the ballot box.

The Chronicle having settled the South American war in favor of Chile, steps should at once be taken to prevent further "useless effusion of blood." Perhaps the most practical plan would be to put Mayor Killoch in command of one army, and Charles de Young in command of the other. It has recently been observed that these gentlemen, by some happy accident, never meet.

The Secretary of War, not apprehending any trouble from the Indians—at least while he remains a thousand miles away from them—does not think of any reason for refusing Gen. Sheridan permission to go to Cuba with Grant. Of course not; and he is so sick, you know. He began to be sick in the dispatches about the time that Grant wanted him to go, and now he begins to be sick in the letters of press correspondents. He will soon be sick in "the halls of legislation," and sick all over the "national domain." We have had enough sick Sheridan—the woods are full of him. Let him go.

Dr. Stebbins told the teachers last Monday evening that the step of a little child on a carpet vibrates to the limits of the universe. He seems to have made an argument out of it against punishing children in the schools. Well, we think the universe is tough enough to stand the mild concussion of a female on a bad boy's gnarly cabeza, and the jar of a schoolma'am's palm temperately applied elsewhere. When the writer was a school-boy, and got an occasional desultory whack on the knowledge-box, he did observe that most of the heavenly bodies—and all were visible—shot madly from their spheres, but they appear to have settled down to business again. Oh, no; corporeal punishment does not materially disturb the order in which it is appointed that the universe shall have its being. Palman qui meruit ferat—let the little rascal who deserves it endure spanking.

We hope Mr. Edison has been struck with that kind of lightning that will illuminate the world. We hope he has found something that will make a clear, cold, cheap light, that we may use in our library without being compelled to curse Peter Donahue for the dearest, meanest, weakest light that ever anybody fired his brains, blinded his eyes, and endangered his soul with. But we have not that confidence in Edison that makes it prudent to break altogether with Peter Donahue, lest the lightning should fail to strike in the right place, and lest our friend Peter should take that thieving gasometer out of our cellar, and leave us in total darkness. We remember that Mr. Edison, of Menlo Park, has fooled us once before, and in our trustful confidence in his promises we came near quarreling with the San Francisco Gaslight Company, and telling the truth about it. Edison gets into the newspapers too much; and we always distrust that science that has to call in the aid of the newspapers to support it. However, we hope he has succeeded; and if he has not, we hope he will succeed, and that the gas company's stock will be as weak in the market as the pressure is while we are writing this article—corner of Fillmore and Union—where a gas-holder has been a long time promised, and a long time withheld.

Grant's speech to the Universal Peace Society has delighted the impracticables of two continents.

"Let us have peace!" said Grant as he lower'd
The streaming point of his bloody sword.
And lo! there was peace, for in tranquil rows
The turbulent rested with up-turned toes.
Now, "Let us have peace!"—and the men in the tomb
Bless God they are out of the way of his boom!

We observe that a person named F. H. Hackett is getting himself talked about in the daily newspapers rather more than is good for him. May we ask if this Hackett person is the reporter who wrote, in the Chronicle, that brilliant account of our "interview" with the enraged fiddler commonly known as Mister Katy Mayhew—first pledging Mr. Mayhew to assume the responsibility and take the consequences! We are anxious also to learn if that arrangement is still in force, and to what extent it is considered binding on us.

New Year receptions are experiencing a change of programme. They are becoming more formal. Ladies receive in more gorgeous toilet than formerly. Some on Thursday, sent out cards; others had fixed hours. Many received in groups, a matron surrounding herself with a bevy of young ladies. Young gentlemen called in evening costume. Mrs. Col. Fry, Mrs. John McMullin, and Mrs. Theodore Shillaker filled their houses with evening guests. Many others kept open houses till a late hour. The day was an unusually agreeable one, and large numbers engaged in New Year's day calling.

The press, we observe, is not greatly disturbed by the destruction of property in the Boston fire, the insurance being heavy enough to pretty nearly cover the loss—except the loss to the underwriters. The newspapers which uplift a dolorous wail over the woes of a man who is burnt out without insurance never have any sympathy to waste upon the companies when they suffer. Impartially unsympathetic in any case, we are in a position to protest that this is not a fair deal.

The Board of Ward Presidents of the Workingmen's party are considering the question of recognizing the Board of Supervisors. Now, if the members of the Board of Supervisors, in their anxiety to be recognized, should fall dead with congestion of the brain, could the members of the Board of Ward Presidents be held for murder?

"A San Francisco man who has been deaf for thirty years now hears as well as anybody."—N. Y. Sun. And what he hears is pretty much the same kind of talk that he used to hear as a little boy in the East—mostly nonsense tempered with malice, a good deal of hard lying, and a considerable amount of profanity. There has not been any change to speak of outside the man's ears, and that he thinks is no improvement.

A Colusa Chinaman, attacked by a deer, ran into a house exclaiming in terror: "Cesus Clist!—wat you call him!" We call him a most intelligent animal, having a tolerably accurate appreciation of the relative positions of deer and Chinamen in this country.

It is the opinion of an "esteemed contemporary" that a cane which once belonged to Daniel Webster is no better to club a dog with than an old broomstick. Yet it have some value peculiar to itself; will somebody husband?

THE SHEPHERD.

[From the German of Uhland.]

A handsome shepherd had passed by
A proud king's stately palace gate;
A maid, who looked from turret high,
Was filled with longing great.

She called to him in sweetest prayer:
"Oh, dared I but go down to thee!
How gleaming white the lamkins there,
How red the blossoms free!"

The lad, with answering longing said:
"Oh, couldst thou but come down to me!
How glowing are thy cheeks so red,
How white thy fair arms be!"

And when he now, with secret pain,
On each day's morning passes by,
He loiters till the maid again
Looks down from turret high.

Then upward joyously he cries:
"Oh, welcome, thou king's daughter fine!"
Her answer sweet far downward flies:
"Fair thanks, O shepherd mine!"

The winter fled, the Lent appeared,
The blossoms reddened, as before;
The shepherd to the castle neared,
The maid looked down no more.

His voice rang up in tones so sad:
"A welcome, thou king's daughter fine!"
A spirit whispered to the lad:
"Farewell, O shepherd mine!"

Under the Snow.

[The name appended to the following stanzas will be recognized as that of one who has done some of the daintiest work in our literature.]

Under the snow, under the snow,
Biding the sun, the flower-roots grow
Brown and rough, like the souls of those
That bear, in the hush, the perfect rose.

By and by, by and by,
The snow will melt where the brown roots lie,
The leaves will climb to the light of the sun,
And the work of the tender seed be done.

NEW YORK, December, 1879.

MARIE LE BARON.

GOD'S ALTO.

From the French of A. de Portmartin.

Chrétien Urhan was an eccentric artist, who held the position of first alto at the Opera, who always turned his back upon the stage, and who kept his fasts regularly the year round. I had been away from Paris for five or six years when I returned there in 1842, accidentally arriving at the beginning of holy week.

For such as wish to observe the precepts of the Church, that which is most questionable at a Parisian restaurant is the soup. Almost always one finds grease spots on it whose orthodoxy appears ambiguous. Remembering, however, on one holy Wednesday the delicious potages au lait d'amandes of the Café Anglais, at six o'clock I was seated by Dominique, the maître d'hôtel, at a small table near the one reserved for Chrétien Urhan; and a few moments later that artist came in. It did not seem to me that he had much changed since I had last seen him. His costume was about the same. He wore a broad-brimmed hat, a black frock coat, or rather l'évite, which came down to his heels, a white cravat tied negligently about his neck, laced shoes and long hair, covering the collar of his coat. His face was both romantic and ascetic in expression, and bore a slight resemblance to that of Paganini, relieved, however, by looks in which it was not difficult to discover a sort of heavenly homesickness—the ideal type, in fact, of a priest torn from his vocation to buffet the storms of the world and the sceptre of Habeneck.

Our tables touched, and I made use of the innocent affection of ordering the same dinner that he did. Potage au lait d'amandes—salmon trout, salade Russe and parfait au chocolat. These details attracted his attention. Two or three times our eyes met, and at last, overcoming his timidity, he said:

"It seems to me, sir—"

"That I have had the honor of meeting you before. Yes, sir, it is a never to be forgotten souvenir for me. It was on the evening before the first representation of Robert le Diable," and then I went on speaking to him about Professor Poncelot, and our dear and illustrious Meyerbeer.

The ice was broken, and from that day forward our topics of conversation seemed inexhaustible. Living as he had done in absolute solitude, he seemed happy to have some one who would talk with him without laughing, as his comrades in the orchestra did, at his mysticism, and one who could sympathize with him in his ardent love of music. We used to dine together every day at an early hour, and afterward walk about the Boulevards on opera nights, and to the Champs Elysées on others.

It would have taken a Hoffman, and a Catholic Hoffman at that, to have described this singular man who had succeeded in mingling fervent piety with love of art into sentiments which were truly unique.

Not an atom of worldly alloy could get into his soul or his imagination. He seemed to be living in a dream, and to be constantly visited by a guardian angel. When he spoke to me about the old masters; about Marcello, Palestrina and Pergolèse, his enthusiasm rose to the condition of true genius. Though I gained more and more of his confidence each day, I always thought there was a mystery connected with his life, and that it was an enigma which, in all probability, I should never be able to solve.

At the end of April a remarkable change took place in the appearance and manners of Chrétien Urhan. Calm and collected as he ordinarily was he could not conceal from me his anxiety and agitation. His temper became uneven, and he was absent-minded. Sometimes a beatific smile would wander about his lips, and then again he would scowl and go away as though trying to drive off some disturbing thought. In our walks he would squeeze my arm with affectionate violence; then he would ask to be left alone, and would walk away slowly with his head bent down, and when he returned his eyes would be filled with tears. At last one evening, when there was no opera, he took me by the hand and said somewhat indistinctly:

"Are you worthy of her?"

"Whom do you mean by her?"

"You shall soon know. Come with me."

And, crossing the sombre gallery which led from the Passage de l'Horloge to the Rue Grange-Batelière, where the actors' door of admission was, he guided me through all that labyrinth over the stage of the opera, through which an outsider has such trouble to find his way; and then seated me in one of the orchestra chairs.

"Is it for a rehearsal, then?" said I, in an undertone.

"No; for a hearing," replied he, so low—so low, and with such emotion, that I divined rather than heard his words.

The lights were reduced to what was absolutely necessary—the footlights, here and there a few gas jets, and nothing more. For he who is unaccustomed to them, those vast, silent, empty walls, with their great spaces steeped in shade, have something peculiarly sinister; and it is one of the characteristic traits of the rendezvous of pleasure that, as soon as they are at rest, are quiet, or have died out, they never fail to become lugubrious. On the other hand, a church, with closed doors, and which keeps only a little lamp watching in its sanctuary, is still the house of God. Its solitude, its obscurity, and its silence, are to imagination and to the soul all that the words of the priest, the canticles of the faithful, and our holy ceremonies have said they would be. A theatre in which there are no plays saddens the whole neighborhood, and soon becomes of little significance. And this is because man, in spite of all his efforts to the contrary, can never efface from his being the impress of his origin. If he is interrupted in his joys, he falls to the unfathomable depths of sadness and vacuity. If the most delicate thread draws him toward his immortal destiny, he has only to look within to find language for those sacred vaulted arches.

A month of such intimate talks with Chrétien Urhan had predisposed me toward all the hallucinations of the fantastic world. So I invoked in turn, as I sat there, the spirits of Cornélie Falcon, Henriette Sontag, and Madame Malibran; and I imagined that I could hear in the distance the horn of "Freyschütz," or of "Oberon," the lamentation of "Donna Anna," "Marguerite's" spinning wheel, the chorus of "Fidelio," the air in the "Nuns Dance," and the tender song of "Agathe," while waiting for her betrothed amid the peaceful harmonies of a summer night. The orchestra soon arrived—they were all there, Chrétien Urhan at his place, as pale as death. Some of the subscribers, four or five influential members of the Jockey Club, were at the side-scenes. In the director's box were Director M. L. P., whom I do not wish to designate otherwise than by his initials, Halévy, Veron, Nestor Roqueplan, Duponchel, and, away back, half hidden behind these gentlemen, that most absolute, alas! most suspicious and most exclusive of sovereigns, Rosine Stolz.

A quarter of an hour afterward there was a slight murmur in the orchestra and at the side-scenes, which was succeeded by a profound silence; and then I saw a young woman led on by Ferdinand Prévost. Her appearance at first sight was certainly not striking. Rather under-sized, she was neither handsome nor pretty in the ordinary acceptance of the words; but upon her pure brow, and in her limpid look, I saw the reflection of those mysterious lights which reveal to the eternal world the world invisible. Upon me she produced the same effect that a wanderer from the country of my dreams would have done; and, afterward, I had only to remember this evening, without a morrow, to understand the words which Meyerbeer applied to this same woman: "She is the most delicate expression of the most virginal art."

She sang the air of "Alceste," "Divinités du Styx;" the ballad of "Alice," "Vas dit elle," that air of "Agathe" in Freyschütz, "Le calme se répand;" then, together with Revasseur, already getting a little old, the duo in the Huguenots—"Pour sauver une tête si chère!" and the duo of the Vestale with Duprez.

As she continued I experienced a singular feeling. It seemed as if I was receiving an angelic caress, which was free from all earthly voluptuousness, and even from all the pleasures of the ear, which little by little penetrated my being, and gave a new meaning to the common saying: "They must sing like that in Paradise!" Music became as immaterial as prayer in the voice of this unknown singer, and it seemed to me that an irresistible magnetism strongly influenced me to draw nearer to her. I looked at Chrétien Urhan, whose thin face could be seen lighted by the candle on his stand, and I thought that a Spanish painter would have sought for no other model for the expression of the ecstasy of a saint.

It did not take long for me to perceive, unfortunately, that his impression and my own were not shared by the others. On the contrary, the few hearers scattered about the hall heard the young artist with an icy coldness of manner. Evidently they were obeying an order, or their sensual and worldly (I will not say boulevardières) habits rendered them inaccessible to an emotion which was so pure. Soon the contrast became so painful to me that I went off without waiting for the end of the examination.

The next day, at about eight in the morning, Chrétien Urhan came to my room. He had grown ten years older during the night.

"Ah! the miserable, unfortunate people, they do not want her! they do not deserve her!" said he in a tone which was more like a sob than anything else. "That first hearing will also be the last; I have sent in my resignation. I can, I ought to, no longer belong to any other than to God. Paris and its opera give me the horrors. But I could not leave it without shaking hands with you!"

I was almost as much overcome as he.

"Then you have a little friendship for me?" said I.

"Much; for you were worthy of her—you alone understood her."

"Well, then, before leaving me, will you not give me the solution of this enigma?"

"Oh, very willingly. I am the son of a poor herdsman of the environs of Ensiedeln, and used to carry the milk of our cows and goats to the convent. I had attained my twelfth year without knowing any other music than our mountain songs. For some days I had remarked that one of the monks, Father Anthelme, looked at me most benevolently. One morning he stopped me as I passed, kindly questioned me, made me sing one of my rustic airs to him, and, learning that I was the sixth child in a numerous family, said: 'Would you like to become a choir boy? I will teach you the music and the catechism.' It was the height of my ambition, and I accepted the offer with enthusiasm. A new life was opened to me. I served mass for Father Anthelme; I sang on great fête days; I read good books. Religion and music at the same time took possession of my soul, and I have never separated them. I was happy, very happy! My dear and holy protector, exaggerating, perhaps, my musical abilities, wanted to initiate me into all the secrets of harmony and counterpoint. Before entering a convent he had been the best pupil of the celebrated abbé, Georges Joseph Vogler, and played marvelously well on most musical instruments. By his advice I chose the alto, and my progress was rapid.

"One night—I was then eighteen years old, and it was Christmas eve—I was kneeling at the altar. All the priests were in their seats, Father Anthelme was singing the mass, and I was also going to sing an Agnus Dei of Palestrina. I had made up my mind for several days past to tell my benefactor before this holy day was over that I had but one wish on earth, which was to enter the holy order, dress in the holy garb, and by them bound all my horizon, all my life.

"I prayed with much fervor, invoking my guardian angel. I believe that he answered me, for at the same time our organ gave forth a prelude with magnificent gushes of harmony and a voice. Oh, my friend, I could say nothing which would enable you to understand the lightning flash. It was heaven, it was a divine messenger, causing me to realize at once all those adolescent dreams wherein music and religion had so often appeared as two sisters. How shall I express the ecstasies of that strange hour. I thought I should go mad. And if there is anything eccentric in my physiognomy or in my manners, it dates from that night.

"The next day I went to Father Anthelme, confessed everything to him, and said that I should die of grief were I condemned nevermore to hear that voice. He told me that it belonged to a young girl of barely sixteen, who was born in a far-off land. On the previous evening an old man of venerable appearance rang at the convent gate, spoke to the superior, and entreated that his daughter might be allowed to sing at midnight mass.

"Come, let us see, my child," added the good Father. "Is what you have told me serious?"

"Oh, very serious. I shall die if I do not hear her again."

"Well, then, take a fortnight to reflect upon it, and after that we will see."

"A fortnight after, seeing that I was wasting away, he said with increasing kindness:

"Dear child, you are passing through a crisis which will render you incapable of serving God, or even of living as an honest man or a reasonable creature should. Pure as a passion may be, it has power to change our convent into a cage, and our robe into the tunic of Nessus. You have sufficient talent to get along, but here are fifty louis which will help you while waiting; I have the right to give them to you, for they are really my own. I have not told you everything, for, before being a monk, I was a man of the world and an accomplished artist. While at my dear master the Abbé Vogler's, I knew the greater part of the musicians who have a name in Europe, and here are letters which will not be useless to you. As a return, I ask only one promise of you—continue as you are, while waiting for something better. Music may be a heavenly virgin, or a dangerous siren. If your art brings you in contact with the stage, beware of the siren and be faithful to the virgin. Think now and then of the Convent of Ensiedeln, which sheltered you in your youth, and of Father Anthelme, who loves you."

"Overwhelmed with pious gratitude, I seized his hands, saying as I wept: 'Not only will I be faithful, but, however far away, I will observe the convent rules; will give up my name of Guillaume, and call myself Chrétien, so that I may have always present in mind my promise and my resolution.'

"I have kept my word.

"But how," replied Father Anthelme, 'will you ever find your ideal singer if you do not know her name?'

"I was dumb, for I had not thought of that.

"I know it," pursued he, smiling. 'Her father told our Superior. Here it is,' and he put a card into my hand.

"I left two days afterward. One of the musicians whose address Father Anthelme had given me was the leader of the Carlsruhe theatre. He received me in so cordial a manner that I confided my perplexities to him—my dream—my folly.

"If I were in your place," said he, 'I well know what I should do. Instead of wandering from city to city, I would proceed straightway to Paris and try to be engaged in the orchestra of the opera. Sooner or later that young singer will go there to be heard, for it is an irresistible lodestone, and artists are never sure of their talents or success until the Parisian public has ratified the opinion of Europe.'

"I followed his advice. Received by Habeneck, I did not have to wait more than six months for the position of first alto. Alas! I had to wait eight years to hear the ineffable voice which had taken possession of my soul and which had changed my destiny. And to-day I am more unhappy than if I had lost her for ever!"

"Why?"

"Have you not guessed? Because it was she who sang last night, and who, very naturally wounded by her incredible reception, leaves this morning, declaring that she will never return to Paris, even were millions offered her."

"And you?"

"Me? I return to the convent which I ought never to have left. The world is too corrupt, its pretended connoisseurs too completely dominated by bad passions and vulgar interests, its theatre queens too jealous. Only in the sanctuary is there anything left for me. Before the year is out Chrétien Urhan, God's alto, as those miscreants call me, will be only Brother Guillaume again. So, one more shake of the hands, and then, farewell!"

He was going, when I stopped him. "And the name of your singer?" said I.

"Here it is. Don't forget it; for the Parisian dilettanti it will soon become the synonym of regret, of shame, and of remorse. Her name is Jenny Lind."

SAN FRANCISCO, December 10, 1879.

ABOUT WOMEN.

A ladies' football club has been established in England. This is said to be a kick above anything we have yet attempted in America.

"Is that a new dress or an old one made over?" is the awful query every lady asks herself when she sees another woman walking along in a change of costume.

A foreign letter writer says of the new Queen of Spain: "In the different sketches made of her the teeth are left out." A toothless queen! Or does she wear false teeth and take 'em out when she sits for a picture?

Men have expended a deal of ink and sarcasm on the subject of women's friendship. Nevertheless, the thing does really exist. A woman's great mistake is that she often thinks she is looking for a friend, when it is merely a confidante she is seeking—one who will listen to her small miseries and smaller joys, and never say "that is not right" to her disclosures, but will merely betray her the first time they have a petty misunderstanding.

A benevolent Bostonian, now living in England, has given $100 to each of two old ladies in Scituate, Mass., who, when girls in the war of 1812, frightened a British man-of-war away from the coast by beating a drum and playing a fife, as if a detachment of American troops were at hand. Says the Chicago Tribune: "If there had only been one of the present generation of Chicago girls on hand with a piano, we venture to say that the man-of-war would have struck her colors at once."

If a girl chooses to throw herself at a young man she can generally hit him.

"I smile," says an acute observer, "when I hear a young man speak of choosing a wife; my information is much more complete as to his probable future when I hear that a young lady has selected him."

One must love women very much to love a woman thoroughly. Every worthy woman is a representative of the worth of her sex, that suffers loss or increase of repute as she adds to or diminishes its fair fame. And this general worth-being recognized, she shines by its reflected light, as well as by her own proper brilliancy.

Simplicity in women! Ah, a sweet simplicity! Yes, but it is much greater in men—when they are taken in by it. "Simple, natural, and unaffected!" was my first thought of the sweetest woman I have known. And, as she appeared, so she was—not.

A woman's hand does not attain perfection before six or seven and twenty. It may, before nineteen, be delicate, but it is seldom white or dimpled. Its touch is not a caress; sinews have relief.

Miss Augusta de Grasse Stevens, a young American lady, is making a pleasant reputation in London literary and art circles. She has taken a diploma for porcelain painting, and her representations of American autumnal foliage have secured orders from the Duke of Connaught and other notabilities. She has also written a striking story in the September Argosy, entitled "The Magic of a Face," and is, furthermore, a newspaper correspondent.

A young married woman from England, who had remained long enough in this country to feel perfectly at home, told a friend that her English timidity so clung to her that she could hardly go into Boston, five miles, to do her shopping, without having her husband or brother to escort her on the railway. The difference between her and the American woman—who, at a call of duty or even pleasure, would take her traveling bag and set off for Colorado without fear of harm—is hardly greater than the difference between the tongued women of fifteen years ago, in reform meetings, and the voting women of to-day.

At the Millais wedding all the noted beauties of London were to be seen, "none in rags and none in bags, but all in silk attire." The bridesmaids were all pretty and young, and their red "toques" became them well, though the general effect was rather theatrical. The dresses of the guests were decidedly monotonous, being all, with perhaps half a dozen exceptions, composed of some shade of red velvet. Mrs. Langtry looked well, and not a little conspicuous, in her scarlet, tight-fitting costume. One could not, however, help being forcibly reminded of a certain character in Faust, when she allowed her long black mantle to descend and display her scarlet form.

Felicia was gliding down Tremont Street in Boston the other afternoon, with a Derby hat on and carrying her hands in the pockets of her long ulster, when a small boy ran up and said, "Say, miss, if yer had a cigar now, you'd be all right, wouldn't you?"

The following are some of the curious habits indulged in by distinguished singers in order to retain or strengthen themselves in their moments of rest, during the exercise of the voice: Mme. Sonntag ate sardines; Mlle. Desparre drinks warm water; Adelina Patti takes seltzer; Christine Nilsson, beer; Mme. Malibran, in opposition to all the customs of singers, ate supper half an hour before the performance; Miss Kellogg takes beef tea, and Miss Cary takes "Tom and Jerry" sometimes, and sometimes porter.

English brides are photographed immediately after the wedding ceremony, before starting on their journey. A bright idea—they never look so pleasant and happy after their return.

The wife who utilizes her husband's shoe-brush on the cooking-stove opens the door to the divorce court.

Blondes are out of fashion in Paris, and dark brunettes are the rage.

A very ugly gentleman was requested by a beautiful woman to accompany her to a painter's studio, where, having whispered a few words to the artist, she left him with a promise of presently coming back. The gentleman asked the artist what he was wanted for. "I thought you knew, sir," replied the painter, "that I am taking that lady's portrait in the character of a saint being tempted by the devil, and that she wishes you to be good enough to sit for the tempter."

HOW THE LIONS FED.

There would seem to be very little connection between eating and the proposed establishment of a vice-regal court in Canada; yet the Ottawa correspondent of a New York journal makes a text of the latter for a sermon on the former. As the historical part of his discourse is well digested—to use the expression which the topic naturally suggests—and the subject one of universal interest, we reprint it here with pleasure:

"In those days" (when Canada had a court) "the science of gourmandise was the popular science at Versailles, and the dishes invented by Vatel—that master mechanic of the kitchen, who stabbed himself through the heart because the supply of fish was insufficient for a feast—and by the Duchesse de Berri, Mme. de Pompadour, Mme. de Maintenon, the Duchesse de Villeroi, and other ladies, who held sway at Court as much through their skill in gourmandise as through their personal attractions, were cherished as the most important of state secrets. At Quebec they imitated Versailles in this, and even surpassed it in many things, for the waters of the St. Lawrence and the land of New France supplied them with many a delicacy not dreamed of in the cooking philosophy of the Old World. The Duchesse of Orleans declares in her Memoires that she often saw Louis Quatorze eat four platefuls of different soups, a whole pheasant, a partridge, a salad, mutton basted with garlic, two slices of ham and a dish of pastry, besides sweetmeats and fruits; and, if the old chroniclers are to be believed, the Governors at Quebec were trenchermen worthy of their royal master. Of one of them, M. Beauharnais, weird tales of gluttony are told. It was Handel who used to order dinner for five or six, and who, when the waiter announced that it was ready and inquired for the company, would draw up his chair to the table, and, exclaiming, "Oh, de company is here; I am de company," would fall singlehanded upon the feast. Beauharnais had a similar weakness. On one occasion he stowed away so many lobsters—Tadousac, at the mouth of the Saguenay, was, as the Indian word implies, the lobster headquarters at that period—while on a visit to a seignior in one of the southern parishes, that he had to be carried to the Castle St. Louis on a stretcher, and kept his viceregal bed for two months. Taffanel, Barrin, Vaudremé, Frontenac, and other Governors were noted eaters, and the State dinners resembled those of Claudius, or Vitellus, or Tiberius. The ancient gourmands of Greece and Rome prided themselves on whiting from Megara, eels from Lake Copais, kids from Sicyon, oysters from Britain, and pigs from the Arcadian valleys; but their bill of fare would have looked famine-stricken beside the salmon from the Saguenay, the oysters from Percé, the moose from the Upper River, the snipe, woodcock, wild duck, and geese of Silery, the bears of Beaufort, and the ravishing grapes and blueberries from the banks of the St. Charles, that graced the tables of the Castle St. Louis. At state dinners of the present day the guests dine; then they fed. It was quantitas non qualitas—a square meal, not a dinner. Even the ladies gorged themselves. In the days of Henry III. of England, the daily allowance to a maid of honor was a gallon of ale and a chine of beef for breakfast, a piece of beef and a gallon of ale for dinner, in the afternoon a gallon of ale and a maniple of bread, for supper a mess of porridge, a piece of mutton, and a gallon of ale, and after supper—by way of something to sleep on—bread and half a gallon of wine. The ladies of the suite and the wives of the seigniors who frequented the Castle St. Louis had no stated allowance; they appear to have followed the primitive custom attributed in the ballad to Martin Halligan's aunt:

'Who ate when she was hungry,
And drank when she was dry.'

"Early in the morning, before they were out of bed, a servant brought them the coup d'appetit, a stiff horn of brandy to brace them up before breakfast, which consisted of chickens and chicken broth, fish, fruit, and cakes. At one they had luncheon, at four dinner, at seven demi-souper, and at nine supper, each meal being superseded by the coup d'appetit and accompanied with brandy, Hollands, and wine, chiefly Canary. Beside this, they ate promiscuously and without regard to schedule time between meals, and thus it is easy to believe the historian, Ferland, when, in one of his lighter sketches, he says: 'It was quite noticeable that the air of Quebec, and the breezes from the pleasant waters, of the Gulf agreed amazingly with the ladies from Old France.' Tea was seldom used; it was known as a China drink, good, as old Pepys says, 'for colds and defluxions,' but not as a beverage.

"There was no 'bill of fare' the dishes, like the seasons, came in their due course, and the guests attacked each in its turn. Each guest brought his own knife; the French Canadian habitant to this day eats his meals with his jack-knife, and flavors them, too. Capt. Knox, in his journal, gives an account of a dinner party he attended at Quebec in 1759. 'Each person,' he says, 'produced an ordinary clasp-knife from his pocket, which served him for every use; when they had dined or supped, they wiped it and returned it to their pockets; the one I had was lent me by a Frenchman, and it gave my meat a strong taste of tobacco.' If some of the usages of the dinner-table were rough and democratic, the manners were courtly in the extreme; and when the Duke of Kent, the Princess Louise's grandfather, visited Quebec, years after the old régime had passed away, he was forced to admit that the court of George III. could show no such grace as he found among the guests at Haldimand House."

A story comes from Tenbury, England, where a menagerie has been paying a visit, which illustrates the well-known character of the elephant for humane feelings in a remarkable degree. Among the animals was a very fine female elephant, called "Lizzie," which was attacked with a violent fit of colic, and suffered intensely. A local chemist, whose success as an animal doctor is well known, treated "Lizzie" and saved her life. Visiting the exhibition at night, and met with an unexpected reception from his patient. Seizing the "doctor" with her trunk, the elephant encircled him with it, to the terror of the audience, who expected to see him crushed to death; but "Lizzie" had no such intention, and, after having thus demonstrated her gratitude by acts more eloquent than words, she released the doctor from her embrace and proceeded with her appointed task. The elephant seems to possess a holier sense of gratitude than some people do.

Maud—And now you've shown me all your favors, dear, do tell me who was there—the men, of course, I mean.
Alice—Oh, let me see! There were lots of Harvard men, of course—yes, and some real men.

He did not talk much, and would have got through dinner well enough but for one unlucky slip into which the kindness of his hostess betrayed him. He ate but little, and refused one dish after another; and the hostess, after trying in vain to tempt his appetite, said she believed she must give him up. "Wal, yes, ma'am, I believe you'd best," said the banker. "You know I'd trust you with my purse and my topcoat; but I guess I'll be boss of my own stummock."

When two young people, with singleness of purpose, sit up with each other, and when the clock strikes twelve, he says: "Is it possible?" and she says: "Why, I didn't know it was so late," you may draw your conclusions that, if the business boom continues, a unified couple will be hunting a house to rent in the spring.

"Do animals have fun?" asks some unobserving individual. Of course they do. When a cow switches her tail across the face of the man who is milking her, steps along just two yards, and turns to see him pick up his stool and follow, she has the most amused expression on her face possible, and if she can kick over the milk-pail she grows positively hilarious.

A bold, bad burglar recently broke into the house of a man in the watches of the night. The man awakened and questioned: "What do you want here? What look you for?" Said the burglar, gruffly: "Money." "Hold on a minute," quoth the man, "and I will help you. I've been looking myself for ten years; but perhaps the two of us may have better luck."

The following is part of a conversation between an intoxicated man and a crockery dealer, as reported by the Lewiston (Me.) Gazette: "Shay, partner (hic), do you keep olkinds (hic) crockery?" "Yes, sir; what would you like?" "Genuine 'ntoxicatin' cup." "You had better go on, sir; you are drunk." "Beg 'er pard'n (hic); lemme she flowin' bowl (hic), ole man." "Do you see that door, sir?" "Genuine (hic) cup 'at sheers but don't 'nebrate." "I shall call the police unless you leave at once." "Lesh look (hic) at your fesh pots of (hic) Egipt, an' 'l go way." A policeman then interfered.

A tan-colored mouse.

Talking about warm hair, a lady in Milwaukee, whose hair very nicely matches the brick in the Wisconsin building, and who has been joked about her red hair until she goes around and shoots the last few thousand who made ancient remarks about it, says she heard a new thing on red hair the other day. A friend from the East said to her: "Mrs. —, I rather like this Skeneatales hair of yours." She didn't like to ask any questions, but finally curiosity got the best of her, and she asked: "Well, what in the name of the thirteen apostles is Skeneatales hair?" "Oh," says he, as he got on the other side of the table, and held his elbow over his head so the press board wouldn't hurt, "Skeneatales is about forty miles beyond Auburn, you know." He is now carried in a sling, and his friends have to get a pass from the matron of the hospital to see him.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 1, 1880.

The New Babylon! The latest London sensation! So say the bills; but, this time, out of simple justice to the Londoners, who are the victims of much American maligning, let us at least assume that their sensation was one of unutterable dismay to find that, familiar as all their kaleidoscopic varieties of life have become, they had not yet discovered anything like the extraordinary phases presented in The New Babylon. You have seen it, of course, by this time. You went to see Roseri and the Big Four—not the big four, or, rather, the four big, coryphées—but those boneless, burnt cork will-o'-the-wisps, and the extraordinary Davene Family. These are what you went to see, but they threw The New Babylon in, and you were compelled to accept the extra. Saw you ever such a mixture before? There was Louis Morrison, who played an impossible Irishman; and Barrows, who played a still more impossible Spaniard; and Jennings, who played the minstrel type of Jew, which he did in a sort of impish, Quilpish way, as absurd as it was unnatural. Oddly enough, the time-honored gag of the stage Jew, "S'help me, Moses!"—one which, it may be remarked en passant, no real Jew ever employs—Mr. Jennings contracted to "S'help me!" which gave him a thickness of utterance not altogether Hebraic in its character. Then there was "Mr. Maltby," who was simply a blundering old goose, a part which Mr. Bradley succeeded in rendering very effectively. The impossible Spaniard looked like a Kamschatkan, and the impossible Irishman was tricked out like a monkey on a hand-organ. To a pair of large plaided, curiously constructed nether garments, he added a brilliant plaid waistcoat, a high colored velvet jacket, an emerald green necktie, a vermilion wig, and a white tile. Fancy the wildest Irishman that ever spread at Donnybrook arrayed in such toggery, and think how it would look on a sane man accustomed to a daily appearance in Pall Mall. The list of dramatis personæ further boasts an extremely intelligent Chinaman, who is valet to the English gentleman—a Chinese valet!—also, a drunken female tramp. Miss Jean Clara Walters is not very English in her style, but she plays this part with most horrible and revolting naturalness. If it is good to do these things well, she does well; but in all of New Babylon there is nothing else worth seeing, excepting the tableau of the wreck. Of course, it goes without saying that there is no fault to be found with Mr. Bishop, Miss Carey, and the others in their not exigent parts. Miss Ravel gives us a bit of not unpleasant pertness; and there is a statuesque Miss Virginia Thorne, who, like all the Thornes, is handsome, and, like all the Thornes, not overweighed with talent. For the rest, it was Roseri we all went to see, and one is obliged to submit to a large amount of The New Babylon before she comes. When she does come, she is heralded by the most unpromising flock of coryphées surely that ever wrung an anatomist's heart. Of the four imported dancers—secundas, as they say, and a word just harsh and hard enough it is to properly express them—there is one much banged young woman so handicapped with avoirdupois that she simply can not incline her toes skyward, while the others are as attenuated as a full set of Walpurgis-night phantoms. But when Roseri herself dawns upon the suffering audience, she is like the young hero in Bluebeard, "se-lim and se-lender." She is a dainty, graceful dancer, and combines something of the airy lightness of Bonfanti with the more muscular grace of Rita Sangalli, without being as great an artist as either. If she were as handsome as either, or as pretty as little Palladino, her naïve enjoyment of her own performances would be something charming; but it sets ill upon her, because it lacks piquancy. However, why should one quarrel with a dancer's face, when all her art lies in her heels?

If one wants to see pretty faces, it is only necessary to walk down street to Locke's Bric-à-Brac theatre, where they abound. They have made a Grand Turk of "Bluebeard" this time, but there is nothing very Oriental looking about the place, excepting pretty Ada Lee, who has inducted herself into Turkish petticoats for the occasion, and they, as all the world knows, are of such sensible brevity as not to impede the ordinary action of the opéra bouffe. She has several speaking lines as well, as she has had indeed in every one of the burlesques in their long répertoire; and if no one has ever yet had the faintest idea what she was trying to say, it has not borne upon the depths of the plot to any extent. It is impossible not to make a dim guess at the language she employs, for, though the words are unintelligible, the accent is unmistakably Cockney. In fact, this "English accent," modified, quite pervades the troupe. Miss Everleigh has it in the soft liquid form which is charming until she sings; then, as she has no voice, it is lost in the struggle with notes. Miss Wright, who is the best actress in the troupe, proclaims herself a subject of Queen Victoria whenever she opens her lips. Maffin has come from across the big pond, and Forrester never learned to speak under the stars and stripes. The handsome, automatic Miss Deacon is another, and Miss Rosa Leighton, who makes a very pretty "Fatima," and who would look twice as well shorn of two-thirds of her blonde locks, has a thoroughly English voice. The Britannic line ends here, for Miss Roseau's accent has nothing distinctive. What it was in the beginning no one can say. The very pitch of her voice is false, unnatural; its gurgle is an affectation; in singing it is badly used, though, truth to tell, she sings the "Trumpet Song" more acceptably than anything she has yet submitted. How much there is in a voice to prepossess or prejudice! Miss Roseau is a superb looking woman in that last costume, all white and a-glitter, but the ring of her voice has prevented her becoming a favorite even though she here is less heavy in her style. Then there is little Chpaman's voice, which sounds as shrilly as a child's through all the choruses, and Carrie McHenry's, which is both flat and shrill. Graham's is thin and weak, and fittingly accompanies his gaunt, sharp-cut face, and Chapman's is as hopelessly uninteresting as he is himself in any rôle. As for Roland Reed, he will never be called the silver-voiced comedian, but he has an intelligible and intelligent way of speaking which are both refreshing. As for the intonation of his voice, it is western; and as to the quality, it harmonizes oddly enough with the stage elocution which he has so carefully engrafted upon it, but even that shows study—and you do not often see a better comedian than Roland Reed, do you? He did not satisfy in the Magic Slipper, which is really an awfully poor burlesque, with nothing in the world to redeem it but "Cinderella's" sisters. How natural they look! Really they might almost have walked out of one's nursery and one's old, old picture-books—wedding head-dresses, high colors, huge feet, and all. But Oxygen, and Piff-Paff, and Robinson Crusoe were all better, and Roland Reed was better with them, and so were the little actresses who had greatness thrust upon them for lack of leading—what do you call the girl in a burlesque troupe who does not figure in this one? By the way, is it not strange sometimes to read the cast of a play in the Colville-Folly Troupe? How absurd to cast Ella Chapman, for example, for a "bad man" in Robinson Crusoe, when she was so thoroughly delightful as "Sally," or whatever the youngster's name may be, who wears a white pinafore and half length socks. While Miss Wood, who would really have made a very good bad man, paradoxical as it may sound, played the ingénue when there is nothing ingenuous about her. Then Roland Reed, who would have made a character of "Friday," is relegated to something, while Graham, who is acceptable enough, but makes nothing in particular of anything, plays "Friday." What is rotten in Denmark?

Over the way from the burlesquers, Hermann, and Mlle. Addie, and necromancy, are delighting the superstitious, and drawing crowds of the curious. Do you remember a dark browed, much dyed magician, who set the town in a whirlwind of amaze some years ago by standing a young woman, with so peculiar a name that it can not be forgotten—a Miss Angelique Schott—upon her elbow, and making tableaux vivants of her ad libitum? Angelique Schott—what a name for a visiting card!—was a handsomer woman than Mlle. Addie, but Herrmann is a more deft magician than Sylvester, and even in the mesmeric act, where the first principles of gravitation are incontinently upset, more interesting. It is a pretty act, and so much nicer than decapitation; but try to stand upon the funny bone of your elbow for five minutes, and you will find yourself extending a yearning sympathy for Mlle. Addie. However, she may like it better than being shot out of a cannon. A queer life, is it not, to be decapitated one week, shot out like a bullet the next, poised in mid-air the next?—and heaven knows what comes after in Herrmann's répertoire. How thankful we every-day people should be who have no trapeze, no boneless contortion acts, no mesmerism, nothing of the striking and the unnatural, nothing to do but to walk abroad and bask in this frosty holiday sunshine, nothing but to eat, drink, and be merry after candle-light, while these poor creatures peril life and limb for the meaningless clap of applauding hands, and a weekly stipend almost as paltry as a school-teacher's under the new law!

BETSY B.

Preludes—In Divers Keys.

The fifth Quintet Recital—last of the series—which fell upon last Tuesday, had very much the air of a Lenten feast, designed as a corrective for the musical stomach that had been over indulged at the four banquets that preceded it; the menu was of the simplest—the condiments were an accident and afterthought—and everything was served rare, with the blood in it. The indisposition of Mr. Linn, who was announced as pianist in place of Miss Schmidt (also ill), compelled the dropping out of the programme of any piano-forte ensemble; Mr. Espinosa, who kindly stepped in at the last moment, had nothing ready and had to depend on solo numbers. Of these the Etude of Alkan was most interesting—hardly beautiful—and admirably played. The solo from Ries's concerto in C sharp minor was a strange selection; it was never intended to be played without the orchestral accompaniment, and is very incomplete when given by itself. Of the residue of this programme it may be said to have been without idea, taste, or judgment. The stringing together of a number of separate movements of Mozart and Haydn, without any reference to the character of the works, is a simple absurdity, and the interpolation between them of such peurileties as the Scarlatti canzonetta and the Martini gavotte for 'cello, is equally absurd. The Spohr violin duet might have also been reserved for home study; it has a beautiful andante between two very long and dry movements that it is a pure waste of time to listen to. Few audiences have been treated to violin duets for the past twenty-five or thirty years, and I think that the time has come when this sort of thing might be permanently shelved. The G minor string quintet of Mozart—first movement—with which the concert ended, was the redeeming point of the entire programme; it seems too bad, however, to be content only with scraps, and I trust that in future series Mr. Schmidt will pluck up sufficient courage and confidence in his audience to make his programmes a little more consistent, and occasionally give entire works as the composers designed them.

There reached me this week intelligence of the death—at Cassel, in Germany—of Miss Frederike Hoffman—who will undoubtedly be pleasantly remembered by many of my readers as the pianiste of the Musical Institute concerts of seven and eight years ago. Miss Hoffman, than who no artist could be more modest and unassuming, was a delightful pianiste of the classical school; her technique was complete within its limits, her touch very delicate and refined, and her style pure, chaste, and noble. Such, also, was her life. Both at home—at Cassel—and in this State, where she spent several years visiting her family, she was beloved and respected by all who knew her.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

By the Sad Sea Waves.

Gay beauty smiles with lavish wiles,
And mad are the songs we sing;
But the reckless laugh
And the wine we quaff
To me no pleasures bring.
Sick of the noise and blinding light,
I rise and steal out in the night.

'Tis early June. The pale, cold moon
Lights up the sea and sky;
And falling there,
With a wild despair,
Prone on the sands I lie;
While, wakened by the moaning waves,
Dread memories rise from out their graves.

They come in hosts, like haunting ghosts,
They come and they won't be gone;
And I dig my hands
Deep down in the sands,
And laugh them all to scorn;
For a deadly hate in my heart hath sunk,
And I'm always dismal whenever I'm drunk.

Who Excuses Accuses.

Says Mrs. A. to Mrs. B.:
"You must excuse me, dear!
But then I know you can not see
The soot in your left ear."

"Oh, thank you, dear!" says Mrs. B.;
"You're very kind to speak.
How could it get there? Let me see—
Oh, yes! the cars—last week!"

The Serenade.

Only a maid at the window,
Waiting her lover's call;
Only an old spring bonnet
Made over for use this fall.

Only a blue-eyed bulldog
Facing the garden path;
Only a pair of cat-tails
Bear witness to his wrath.

Only the maiden's fellow
Sitting within his room—
Only some seatless trousers
To tell of the bulldog's boom.

Whistle the Old-Time Tunes.

Whistle us something old, you know!
Pucker your mouth with the old-time twist,
And whistle the jigs of the long ago,
Or the old hornpipes that you used to whist;
Some old, old tune that we oft averred
Was a little the oldest thing we'd heard
Since "the bob-tailed nag was a frisky colt,"
In the babbling days of old "Ben Bolt."

Whistle to us something old and gray,
Some toothless tune of the bygone years,
Some bald old song that limps to-day,
With a walking-stick, in this vale of tears.
Whistle a stave of the good old days,
Ere the fur stood up in a thousand ways
On the listener's pelt as he ripped and tore,
And diddle-dee-blank-blanked Pinafore.

Better this Way.

Maud Muller, on a winter's day,
Went up town, a call to pay;

Beneath her Derby gleamed her locks
Of red banded hair—and her crimson socks!

Of all the sights that make us smile,
The saddest is Maud Muller's "style."

Failure.

Marion Davis, he set out
To drive a pig to town,
And sell the same and buy his wife
A brand-new Sunday gown.

Those who have tried to drive a pig
Will understand the drive;
And will predict (and it is true)
That he did not arrive.

"Gone to Meet —."

Now is the time when the joyous boy
Goes out on the ice-covered lake,
With a shout of glee and a laugh of joy—
But the ice begins to break.
Into the water, full twenty feet deep,
He is tumbled, and there unawares
His skate-bucked feet begin to creep
Up a flight of the golden stairs.

Language of Flowers.

White roses for a maiden's love;
Red roses, man's affections prove;
White roses all are plucked and gone—
Red roses would you linger on?
N. B.—You gather from the yellow
My feelings for the other fellow.

The Bardess.

The poetess sat in her easy chair,
Ink-smear'd was her face and unkempt her hair,
And untrimm'd were the nails on her fingers.
Her round, red heel it peeped out through
A hole in her father's cast-off shoe,
As she sang, "Ah! the soul still lingers!"

The Ewe Lambs.

Now is the time when the tender mind
Designs the slippery deed,
And the faithful fair of their pastor make
A sort of centipede.

CALCRAFT, THE HANGMAN.

A cable dispatch announces that the noted executioner, Calcrafft, who for forty-six years held the high office of hangman in London, is dead. Calcrafft's real name was Thomson, and, unlike William Marwood, of Horncastle—his successor and the present Yeoman of the Halter—he was particularly reticent as to his history, his system, and his sentiments. When Henry Mayhew, in the days of London Labor and London Poor, tried to extract a "statement" from Mr. Calcrafft, the taciturn hangman would vouchsafe no other reply to the Mayhewian overtures than that "he didn't see it." Nor did Godfrey Turner, some years afterward, meet with much greater success in his attempts to interview Calcrafft. "The truth is, Mr. Turner," observed the reticent Jack Ketch, "that there didn't ought to be no newspapers." Like Bismarck and other executive minds, Calcrafft instinctively despised the "reptile press." In early life, like Marwood, he was a shoemaker. The particular characteristic of his style of hanging was the use of the short drop of two and a half or three feet, as opposed to the long drop of six or seven feet given by Marwood, who holds that death by dislocation is more speedy and painless than death by strangulation. But, according to a recent controversy still engaging scientific men in England and France, it is quite doubtful whether the older was not also the better artist. Calcrafft retired from active life a few years ago. It is known that his retirement was due to his passionate love of flowers, which he adored with such earnest, and no doubt refining, devotion that he gave up his time most grudgingly to the less congenial duties of his great office. His successor has a more temperate love of the beautiful in nature, and a better appreciation of the aesthetic side of neck-stretching, having long since renounced the vanities of the world to assist Calcrafft as a gentleman amateur.

It was only in 1878, however, that Marwood succeeded in getting himself much talked about in the papers. Private executions came into fashion, thanks to Charles Dickens, some thirty years ago, and Jack Ketch ceased to be such a popular and even fashionable hero as he was in the time of the Georges. The first important event in which Marwood figured as the executioner was a double hanging at Reading, March 12, 1877. Among the most notable executions performed by Calcrafft were those of the Mannings, of Bermondsey, in 1849, on the occasion of which it was that Charles Dickens published in the London Times that celebrated account of a London mob at a London hanging, which first stung the conscience of civilized England into a sense of the brutalizing and degrading influence of public executions. He hanged also the poisoner Palmer, of Rugeley, and the "martyrs" of Manchester, Allen, Larkin, and Gould. His name will not pass into dictionaries of daily use like that of his hanging predecessor Derrick, but as a sinister figure in the background of contemporary history he must not be suffered to quit the scene without mention.

A gentleman in Paris paid a visit the other day to a lady, in whose parlor he saw a portrait of a lovely woman of, say, five-and-twenty. Upon the entrance of the lady her visitor asked her if the portrait was a family portrait, and was told that it represented her deceased daughter. "Has it been long since you lost her?" asked the gentleman. "Alas! sir," replied the lady, "she died just immediately after her birth, and I had a portrait painted to represent her as she would have appeared if she had lived until now."

A certain young man brought his affianced down from the country to see the sights. One day, while they were passing a confectioner's, the swain noticed in the window a placard bearing the announcement: "Ice cream—one dollar per gal." "Well," said the young man, as he walked into the saloon, "that's a pretty steep price to charge for one gal, but, Maria, I'll see you through, no matter what it costs. Here's a dollar, waiter; ice cream for this gal."

M. Lafitte, of the Voltaire, says that he himself saw the late Countess Montijo and her daughter, the Empress, previous to her assumption of the imperial purple, waiting patiently in the ante-chamber of Nestor Roqueplan for gratis tickets for the opera, which they had come to solicit. The manager did not even pay the Spanish ladies the courtesy of asking them to step into an inner room.

"How long has she been dead?" inquired a be-raved husband, as he quietly stepped into the room. "About five minutes," answered a tearful bystander. "Well, it's all right; I never got a chance to see any of my folks draw their last breath. If a hundred of my friends were to die I would be just my luck to miss it every time." Grief will assert itself.

Old Father Taylor, of Boston, was a strong and far-seeing man. Standing on a bill-top which overlooked the village he noticed six little wooden boxes called meeting-houses, and, knowing that there were only as many hundred inhabitants in the place said, sententiously:—"Ah, I see you have had a religious war here."

Literary ladies had better enlarge their hose; not that their little bits of feet are to grow, oh, bless 'em! not at all; but the gift book of the season is to be the Chinese Encyclopedia, in five thousand and twenty volumes, and it will take quite a good deal of stocking to hold it.

A boy of four was sleeping with his brother, when his mother said, "Why Tommy, you are lying right in the middle of the bed. What will poor Harry do?" "Well, ma," he replied, "Harry's got both sides."

There are about four thousand one-legged and one-armed Confederate veterans in Georgia who will be able, under the recent act of the Legislature, to call upon the State to supply them with artificial limbs.

The prettiest gold piece now circulating in France is the twenty-franc piece bearing the head of Napoleon for the year 1805. It looks like the coin of an old Roman Emperor.

After a Texas jury had stood out for ninety-six hours, the judge got a verdict of them by sending them word that a circus had come to town.

Homer was a beggar. Spenser died in want. Cervantes died of hunger. Dryden lived in poverty. Joaquin Miller is doing very well.

What poets mean by "a long farewell" is the sort of farewell Ole Bull bids to the American public. It takes him thirty years to bid it, and then he returns to fiddle one night more by general request.

DON'T USE STIMULANTS.—Use nature's real brain and nerve food and nourishing tonic, Hop Bitters, that quiet the nerves, invigorates the body, cures disease and restores the vital energies without intoxicating.

THE REASON WHY.—Mr. Fellows, in his Medical Monthly, gives reason for the peculiar action of his Hypophosphites in the cure of diseases, which seem to be borne out by facts. From tonic action of the Sympathetic Nerves all the Organic Muscles are strengthened and the patient overcomes his malady simply, pleasantly, and rapidly.

IN MEMORIAM.

Up in the steeple tipped with gold
The dreary midnight bells have tolled;
And the spectre-like clouds go flitting by,
While the echoes dying say, as they die:
" 'Tis gone—'tis gone!"

" 'Tis gone, 'tis gone!" the thoughtless shout;
"The new year's in—the old year's out!"
But, ah! there are many who say, with a sigh,
With the hended head and tearful eye:
" 'Tis gone, 'tis gone!"

Gone, oh! gone; and the bells that tolled
Up in the steeple tipped with gold
Woke a broken heart from a troubled sleep,
To fold thin hands, and to whisper and weep,
" 'Tis gone, 'tis gone!"

Gone, O God! and old sexton Time,
Who rang just now the dead year's chime,
Wrote its name on our hearts with iron band,
With a vanished one in the silent land—
" 'Tis gone, 'tis gone!"

Gone—and our hearts are buried there
With that dead year; while to his heir
The cypress we bring, not the holly bough—
For a loved one then, but an angel now
With the old year gone!

MARYSVILLE, January 1, 1880.

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

THE ELF OF HOHENHEIM.

A Story of a Waif from the Old World.

On descending the Volga years and years ago, on a radiant moonlight night in midsummer, I entered into conversation with an old Russian Sectarian Patriarch whom I met on board the boat, and with whom, as it always happens with these extraordinary men, I was soon deeply engaged in a theological discussion.

"Can you tell me, Father Onufry," I asked, in the course of the conversation, "on what, besides the Scriptures, you base your faith in an eternal life of bliss beyond the grave?"

The old man raised his white head from his bosom, and, extending his hand toward the endless steppes which bordered the river, said, in a solemn voice:

"On the immensity of human misery on earth!"

Through time and space this answer rings in my ears in all its unutterable sadness, as the last and highest expression of a whole martyr-nation's misery; and the longer I live, the deeper and fuller becomes the stream of humanity running past me on the broad and rugged causeway of life, the more I learn to fathom the deepness of those simple words:

"On the immensity of human misery on earth!"

It was on a Saturday night on Montgomery Avenue. I returned on foot at a slow pace from my office, intent upon the picture of busy life and confusion which surrounded me, and which, for years, had never been so noisy and bustling as now. The "good times" have set in, and, like a huge monster stretching out his limbs after years of prostration, the great city sends out of all its thoroughfares thousands upon thousands of its population, bent on enjoying life, on putting to immediate profit the gains of the day while the rising tide lasts and before the ebb sets in again. Though the hour was late, the stores were ablaze with light and thronged with customers. On the sidewalk the hustle was so great that I had some pains in pushing my way along. Women, hending under the load of baskets and parcels, chatted, laughed, and screamed as they went; parties of men, strolling with pipes and cigars in their mouths, were enjoying the clear, mild night after a hard week's work; pairs of "our boys," swaggering along with all the imperturbable and inimitable impertinence peculiar to the promising offshoots of Young America, blocked up occasionally the whole sidewalk, spitting and brawling in the most accomplished fashion, and occasionally interchanging some choice epithet of endearment or ridicule with parties of "girls," who, as to the noise they made, were in no way inferior to the stronger sex. Italian peanut vendors, with their dark southern faces lighted by the flaring torches surrounding their stands, advertised their goods in a shrill mixture of Italian and Irish-American; peddlers blabbed out their endless stories, collecting groups of the ubiquitous loafer around them. In the midst of all this turmoil, the discordant sounds of a street organ, performing the "Wacht am Rhein," pierced through the other sounds, and an old bald-headed Frenchman, with a long white beard, hawled out the "Marseillaise" at the pitch of his voice.

Slowly I advanced amid all this bustle, admiring and in some measure fascinated by this picture, so full of a coarse but intense and robust life, and on which the lights in the store windows, the petroleum torches of the street vendors, the stained, multicolored gas-lamps of the dime museums and other places of equivocal and unequivocal amusement shed a lurid, almost fantastic glare. All of a sudden I stopped as it struck by lightning. What was this before me? A ghost? a horrible freak of my imagination? or what else?

That ashy pale face, that stooping figure, creeping along with difficulty and thrown from side to side by the busy crowd like a broken reed—where had I seen a semblance of them before?

This ghastly figure was that of a woman. By the hand she held a child, a baby of some three years of age, who seemed so exhausted that its legs refused service entirely. It did not even scream, and let itself be dragged along by the woman like a lifeless corpse. I turned round and followed this wretched pair. I soon found out that the woman's walk was not purposeless. She staggered from one ash-barrel to another; at each of these ornaments of our metropolitan thoroughfares she stooped down, plunged her bare arm into the heap of refuse and kept it there, searching till she had found some remnant of something which may have one day served as food to man or beast. This she clutched at with eager grasp; the best bits she gave to the child, the rest she in the meantime the busy, roaring wave of humanity past her as coldly and indifferently as if it were indeed of the ocean and not a living throng of men, of thousands would the very next morning worship in in proud self-complacency the Christian God, the God of mercy, charity and love!

Stepping to her side I touched the woman's shoulder. She looked around with a wild and scared expression, the light of a torch fell full on her face—"Good God! is it possible?" I screamed. "Emily!"

Her whole frame shook under the rags which half covered it; she drew back from me, and with a groan of irrepressible terror attempted to run away. I held her fast, however. "Come now," I said, "whoever you may be, think of your child, it seems to be dying. Let me give it to eat."

She bowed her head in silent obedience and suffered me to lead her to a small hotel in the neighborhood, kept by an honest old German, on whose discretion I could reckon. I engaged a room, ordered supper and a bottle of strong wine, and hiding the woman wash and dress herself and the child, I went out to purchase in one of the adjacent stores a cheap but decent outfit for them both, which, on returning to the hotel I sent up to her by the chambermaid. A quarter of an hour later supper was brought. I knocked at her door; a feeble voice answered, "Come in," and on entering I remained two or three seconds standing motionless, speechless at the door, staring at the apparition before me. The hasty toilet she had made had wrought an extraordinary change in all the young woman's appearance. She sat before me with the child in her lap in all her wondrous, delicate, bewitching beauty—the "elf of Hohenheim," as we used to call her, but no longer the wild, wayward, elf-like child, but such as I had seen her in my boyish dreams—a beautiful, fairy-like woman!

"Emily Rechberg!" I whispered, when the chambermaid had left us. "Do you know me?"

She looked up at me, and, dropping her head in both her hands, broke into a torrent of tears. After soothing and quieting her as best I could, I insisted on her and the child eating the supper I had ordered before entering upon any explanations. After the last morsel had disappeared, and the child, which had already fallen asleep while eating, had been put to bed, Emily sat down by my side, and, with many a sigh and many a tear, told me her story. It was the sad, old, old story.

I was barely seventeen, and had just entered the celebrated Agricultural Academy of Hohenheim, near Stuttgart, Wurtemberg, when I first made the acquaintance of Emily and her uncle, the famous mathematician, Dr. Aloysius Rechberg, with whom, having lost her own parents, she then lived. The old Professor's house was a favorite haunt for all of us boys. Himself childless, but yet full of energy and animal spirits, the old man liked to be surrounded by the noise and bustle of youth. On some evenings in the week, and, indeed, not infrequently during the whole days, the Professor's house looked more like a student's kneipe (tavern) than like the abode of one of the first scientific authorities of Germany. In the snug parlor on the first floor of the lovely cottage Rechberg occupied there stood a large oak table, surrounded with old-fashioned carved wooden chairs. Many a joyous, never-to-be-forgotten night of mirth and delightful entertainment have we passed there, youth and happiness in our hearts, the foaming beer glass before us, and the Professor's hearty voice and laugh cheering us to new mirth, and giving us the example of youth and joy.

Little Emily, the "Elf of Hohenheim," as we had nicknamed her, never failed at these queer assemblies. Indeed, she was the genius, the spirit of our band—and a mad, uncontrollable spirit it was, to be sure! Scarcely fifteen years of age, she was already as far advanced in her studies with her uncle as any of us.

"I don't want to make of the girl one of your insipid, hot-house flowers, which droop and shudder at everything," the old man used to say to us. "Let her see, study, and enjoy life just as it is. You are all of you a set of honest, though excessively lazy lads, at whose hands she has no harm to fear. So let her enjoy her freedom—the only thing she possesses, poor thing! I trust her to you—do not betray me, lads."

And Emily was indeed our friend, our comrade—almost our sister. She felt so secure inside the domains of her adopted brothers that she wandered, in summer and winter, all alone, through the extensive woods of Hohenheim, considering them, as it were, a sort of paradise on earth, in which no fatal tree nor wily serpent could ever tempt her. Elf-like she haunted the grounds around our academy, climbing in the trees, imitating the singing of the birds around her, making the air resound with her clear, silvery laugh, shedding on all things the fairy light of her dear, innocent presence.

Such she had lived on in my remembrance these many years since our parting. Such, as a long-lost dream of youth and light, she appeared at times to me amid the dark shadows and bitter realities of life. Who was the rascal who had darkened and polluted this bright vision of light, who had made this of my little "elf of Hohenheim?"

His name was, she told me, or at least was supposed to be, Count Ladislav Brodzinsky, and he pretended to be a Polish nobleman of immense wealth. Like all the rest of the students, he too had been received with the usual free hospitality at the professor's house, but had soon, by his manners, excited the old man's suspicions. He was forbidden the house—but the mischief was already done, Emily was madly in love with him. Interviews went on between them clandestinely, the wretch bewitched her more and more, until at length she consented to elope with him to America, whither, he said, important business matters called him. The pair fled first to Paris, thence to London, where they stayed nearly a week. While in that city Brodzinsky came home one day seemingly in prey to a terrible agitation.

"Somebody is on our track, my dearest Emily!" he exclaimed. "I have been followed the whole day. We can not start from here together. You must go to-night direct to Queenstown, and wait a day there for the boat which shall bring me from Liverpool. The people who are tracking me must see me get on board alone. Do you trust me, my love?"

Of course she did, and obeyed him guilelessly, confidently. Long before the steamer had been sighted she was standing on the Queenstown dock, waiting, straining her sight for the streak of smoke on the horizon. At length it came. The tugboat took the Queenstown passengers on board the huge ocean steamer. Emily found her cabin reserved for her, but no Ladislav Brodzinsky to meet her. Trembling, bewildered, she inquired if there was a passenger of that name on board. The steward, who had accompanied her to the cabin, thought there was one, and promised to inquire immediately.

He went, and Emily remained in her cabin trembling, fearing she knew not herself what, feeling as if each minute that passed became a century of suspense. In the meantime the steamer had heaved her anchor, the screw had been put in motion, and the ocean monster glided majestically into the open sea.

At length the steward returned with the answer:

"No, miss, there is no gentleman of that name on board."

On hearing these words Emily remained for some time like one paralyzed by terror and despair. Then, realizing all of a sudden the horror of her situation, she rushed out of the cabin with a piercing cry and ran on deck, whence, had not the captain met her and held her fast, she would have jumped into the sea.

She then began beseeching the captain in a frantic way to turn back, to put her on shore anywhere; the poor man had a good deal of trouble to explain to her the impossibility of her demand, and to quiet her so far as to lead her back into the cabin. She need but wait patiently, he said; in New York she would be sure to find a telegram explaining all.

She waited—but in vain; no message, no friendly word bade her welcome to the new world. The captain and some of the passengers took an interest in the poor girl, and accompanied her to the German Consulate. There she gave her uncle's address, and the Consul promised her to cable to him immediately. The next day she was to learn the answer. She came the next day. The Consul led her to his private office, and with a grave face invited her to take a seat.

"Have you other relatives in Germany, Miss Rechberg, besides your uncle?" he inquired.

"None," she answered.

"I regret it," rejoined the Consul, "for your uncle is dead. Here is the answer I received this morning."

And he showed her the fatal message. Emily had suffered so much during the passage that this new blow could scarcely hurt, but only stunned her. She sat there motionless, staring at the paper before her with a vacant gaze.

"Do you wish, under the circumstances," continued the German official, "to return to Europe? I could facilitate your arrangements if such should be your wish."

"What for?" she asked, dejectedly.

"Just as you please," answered the Consul.

She rose from her seat, thanked him mechanically, and went out into the street.

"Oh, do not ask me," exclaimed Emily, covering her face with her hands, "to tell you all that befel me here! It is a tale of shame and misery I will spare you and me. Four months after my landing this child—his child—was born. Some time later I received a letter from him, offering me money and explaining his treachery with perfect frankness. My love, he said, had become troublesome to him, for just then the possibility of a rich marriage with an elder and excessively jealous woman had presented itself to him—and thus he resolved to put me out of the way. How well the rascal knew me! In writing the letter he placed a deadly weapon into my hand! He knew well enough I would not use it."

The night was far advanced when Emily had told me her sad story to the end. I took leave of her, promising to come back the next morning and not to forsake her till a suitable position had presented itself for her.

I came, and returned the next day, and the next, and so on for nearly three weeks, until little by little, the intercourse with Emily became the most engrossing occupation of my day.

She became daily more beautiful, and daily I saw revived before me the fair image of the "elf of Hohenheim," of my boyish dreams, turned to a still more bewitching reality.

One day as I entered as usual the little German hotel, the fat host came to meet me with a letter in his hand.

"For you," he uttered laconically.

I tore open the envelope. It was from Emily, and contained the following lines:

"My dearest, my only friend! I leave you who have saved me, whom I have learned to love more than my life. And it is just because of my great love that I go. Your life must remain as it is, pure, and free and noble. Your path must not be soiled by a creature like me. Farewell! God bless you! May every tear which falls from my cheek while I write this bring you years and years of happiness! Do not grieve for me. I have found honest work in another city far away. Do not search for me, and do not forget quite your poor, loving

"ELF OF HOHENHEIM."

A year has passed. I have neither seen nor heard from her since.

This is M. Rénan's opinion of the Talmud: Thus, at the same time as the Christians, the Jews made a new Bible, which threw the first a little into the shade. From the Jewish book to the Christian book the distance is enormous. It is one of the phenomena, the most extraordinary in history, the simultaneous appearance in the same race of the Talmud and of the Gospel—of a little chef d'œuvre of elegance, of grace of moral refinement, and of a heavy monument of pedantry, miserable casuistry, and religious formalism. These two twins are assuredly the two creatures the most unlike which have ever gone out from the bosom of the same mother. Something barbaric and unintelligible, a desolating contempt for language and form, an absolute lack of distinction of talent, make of the Talmud one of the books the most repulsive which exist. One feels in it the disastrous consequences of the greatest fault which the Jewish people has committed, which was the turning its back on Grecian discipline, source of all classic culture. This rupture with reason itself put Israel into a deplorable isolation. To read a foreign book was a crime.

"Mr. Brown, couldn't you give me a position of some kind with you?" "Very sorry—don't think there is any vacancy in my establishment." "If you have nothing else, employ me as your adviser." "Very well, you may commence by advising me how to best get rid of you!"

Women are naturally suspicious. You may have got a long hair on your shoulder from holding a six-year-old girl, but your mother-in-law will back your wife in doubting the statement every time.

VOL. VI. NO. 2.

SAN FRANCISCO, JANUARY 10, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE HAWAIIAN QUESTION.

In 1867, the Government of the United States published a map of the Pacific Ocean, designed to show the relative position of the Hawaiian Islands and the distances from them to surrounding commercial countries.* This map goes a long way toward elucidating the Hawaiian Question. It shows that in the immense waste of water that separates America from Asia and Australia, the Hawaiian Islands occupy a central position, and afford the only practicable harbors where ships may refit, recoal, or seek refuge from storms.

To take advantage of this fact, to employ the natural advantages of Hawaii as an agency in the extension of American commerce and the development of American maritime power, has been an object of solicitude with our Government ever since it acquired a footing on the Pacific Ocean. No sooner did the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo cede New Mexico and the Californian coast to the United States than the latter hastened to negotiate a treaty of amity and commerce with the Hawaiian or Sandwich Islands. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was signed February 2, 1848; that with the Sandwich Islands December 20, 1849. Among other provisions, the latter opens the ports of Hawaii to war vessels of the United States, to steam vessels of the United States carrying their public mails, and to American whaling ships, free from duties of tonnage, harbor, lighthouse, quarantine, or other similar charges. It accords to whalers the privilege of trading and bartering a certain quantity of their supplies or goods without having to pay duties or imposts upon the same. And while it confers the most ample privileges of residence, protection, and trade upon the citizens of the United States, it specifically exempts them from military service to the Kingdom of Hawaii. In all other respects they are placed upon the most favored footing.†

When this treaty was concluded Gen. Taylor was President of the United States and John M. Clayton Secretary of State. The discovery of gold in California so rapidly hastened the development of the coast, that before this administration went out of office it perceived the necessity of establishing more intimate relations with the Hawaiian Islands. The extension of our commerce with Japan, China, India, Australia, and the Pacific islands, and the establishment and development of our naval power on the Pacific Ocean, were not the only objects in view: we had now the additional one of assisting to develop our new possessions on the Pacific Coast by providing for them adjacent commercial outlets in times of peace, and a naval outpost in case of war. Possession or control of the Hawaiian Islands would afford us all of these advantages. Possession was impossible. The Hawaiian Kingdom was a political power whose sovereignty and independence had been recognized by both Great Britain and the United States in 1844. We had therefore no right, even if we had the power, to seize the Islands. Such an act would have involved us in war certainly with Great Britain, and probably also with the other great powers, and the least deplorable results of such a conflict would have been the destruction of our maritime commerce and the devastation of our coasts. Moreover, the policy of the United States has always been opposed to the acquisition of extra-continental territory.

Possession of the Hawaiian Islands was therefore out of the question: our policy was, plainly, to control them. Our missionaries had led the way; our merchants had followed it; already the Islands were Americanized. They had embraced the Christian religion; their state had been modeled in great measure after our own; their laws were modifications of our code; their language had been fixed in our letters and types; they had adopted our habits, manners, dress, and currency; and they had come to regard us as their "mother country."‡ The easiest, the only, way to control the Islands was evidently to render our commercial relations with them more intimate; and reciprocity was the means. By the adoption of this policy we would enjoy all the advantages of control without the responsibilities or expenses of possession.

President Taylor and his successor, President Fillmore, and Mr. Clayton and his successor, Daniel Webster, all recognized the advantages of this policy, and favored its adoption. So did President Pierce and his Secretary of State, William L. Marcy; and the subject having been carefully considered in all its bearings, it was determined during the last named administration to submit a reciprocity treaty to the Senate for its adoption. This was done in 1853; but, although the small area of cultivable land in the Sandwich Islands, and the necessary insignificance of its sugar crop, was pointed out, the jealousy of a few Louisiana planters took alarm, and prevented the ratification of the treaty. The preponderance of Southern representation in the Senate continuing until the outbreak of the civil war, and the magnitude of that conflict excluding from consideration all topics not immediately pertaining to it, the subject of the Hawaiian treaty remained untouched until 1867, when it was again brought to the attention of the Senate.

Meanwhile, other American interests had grown up in the Pacific. In 1853, Commodore Perry had visited Japan and effected a treaty with that country, by virtue of which its ports, which had been virtually closed to European commerce since 1639, were again opened.

In 1856, owing to the great value of guano and the discovery, chiefly by our whalers, of numerous guano islets in the Pacific Ocean, the Congress of the United States passed an act extending the sovereignty of the Government to such of these islands as may have been discovered, or found abandoned and taken possession of, by American citizens; with privilege to take guano therefrom and land the same in the United States as a domestic product, free of duty.* Under this act, some fifty or sixty islets had been claimed by Americans, and guano to the value of over half a million dollars a year was being obtained from them and landed in the United States.†

On the 30th March, 1867, Russia had ceded to the United States the whole of her possessions in America, including Alaska, the islands adjacent thereto, and the fisheries in the contiguous waters.‡ Here was a new world, between which and Nicaragua, Panama, Cape Horn, or any other point on the various sea routes from the Eastern States, the Hawaiian Islands formed a middle station.

Moreover, the Australian trade had grown to very considerable dimensions, and Honolulu was on the direct line between San Francisco and Melbourne or Sidney; eight and a half days by steam from the former; twenty days from the latter. Thus many grave reasons presented themselves for desiring to consummate the long desired but neglected treaty of reciprocity with Hawaii. The events of the civil war had taught us how important the Islands were as a naval station; the new interests which we had acquired in the Pacific Ocean demanded protection, and the manoeuvres of other powers toward attaining the same object warned us that no further time was to be lost.

Both President Johnson and Mr. Seward were in favor of reciprocity, and they authorized Gen. McCook, on the part of the United States, to contract a provisional treaty with Judge Harris, on the part of Hawaii, subject to ratification by the Senate. This treaty was signed in San Francisco May 21, 1867. On the 5th of July it was transmitted by the President to the Senate. On the 14th of September Mr. Seward submitted a copy of it to an officer of the Government familiar with our commercial relations, requesting an expression of his opinion on the policy of reciprocity, especially with reference to Hawaiian sugar, and received a favorable reply. This correspondence was sent to the Senate. Yet such was the fear, on the part of that body, of jeopardizing the sugar-growing interests of the United States, that the treaty was not ratified. The Louisiana planters were opposed to it; the refiners in New York were afraid of it; there were no refiners in San Francisco; and as for the sugar trade generally it was, if not hostile, at least indifferent to the measure. It required the experience and observation of eight more years to convince all parties that, so far as sugar or any other production of the Hawaiian Islands was concerned, it could never be great enough to make the least impression upon the established industries of the United States, and that the treaty was absolutely necessary as a means to preserve and protect the interests of the United States on the Pacific Ocean.

The Reciprocity Treaty thus sustained a third ordeal in the Senate, and, after having been most carefully considered and modified, was ratified, with a provision that enabled it to go into effect about the first of September, 1876, to last for seven years, "and further until the expiration of twelve months after either of the contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same."

Gen. Grant was President, and Hamilton Fish Secretary of State, at the time, and they both recognized the importance, urged the necessity, and promoted the ratification of the treaty. Since it was made, no publicist, no statesman, no financial nor no commercial interest, has ever found fault with its stipulations or complained of its working. The press has unanimously approved the policy of making it, and the public has with equal unanimity admitted the satisfactory operation of its provisions.

There is no act of national policy or legislation which does not serve to foster some interest; and there is no interest thus involuntarily fostered which is safe from the attacks of envy and detraction. The Reciprocity Treaty with Hawaii built up a sugar-refining interest in San Francisco which without it would have had no existence. It is not and never can be important enough to harm anybody, not even the sugar refiners of the East, whose works are so far removed from the Pacific Coast that it would be almost as cheap to import and pay the duties on refined sugar from Europe as to transport it by railway across the American continent. The refineries of San Francisco afford a beginning, a nucleus, an encouragement to the cultivation of native cane or beet-root sugar, which the former are ready to purchase so soon as the product can be laid down at an economical price. They give employment to 500 workmen on the Pacific Coast. In short, the refineries have become a useful and important link in the chain of industries that have rendered California and the Pacific Coast measurably self-sustaining and that may yet render it a manufacturing centre.

In spite of these facts the sugar-refining interest of the Pacific Coast has its enemies. They are few and unimportant; but as such characters often make up in loudness and verbosity what they lack in justice or truth, and thus impose upon others a sense of their importance out of keeping with the reality, it will perhaps not be without interest if to the brief sketch we have given of the origin of the treaty we append an account of its practical working.

In the first place, it is to be remarked that in none of the statistics which have hitherto been published concerning our commerce with the Hawaiian Islands has a very remarkable change in the official mode of compiling those statistics been noticed. Previous to 1867 it has been the habit of our customs collectors to enter American whaling ships and vessels laden with guano from American islets in the Pacific ocean as though they had entered from foreign countries.* Their cargoes were thus credited to the last foreign countries from which they had departed; and among them the Hawaiian Islands figured very largely, for they were the common recruiting station for all such vessels. This erroneous practice was reformed in 1867, and ceased to vitiate the official statistics after that year; but in the comparative summaries which are still made by the Government, the period of the reform is not noticed, and the figures relating to the previous period are compared without proper consideration with those belonging to the subsequent one. They thus exhibit less increase of trade than what has actually occurred. At the same period two other reforms were made, both of which affect the official returns relating to our commerce with Hawaii. It had been the habit of customs collectors to include what is known as "indirect trade" in the import entries. For example, the cargo of a ship laden with Chinese tea, entering into the United States from China, after having stopped at the Sandwich Islands, was, under the old system, credited to Hawaii; under the reformed one, it is credited to China. In the same way the "in transitu and transshipment" trade returns had been erroneously included in the import entries. This trade consists of goods transmitted between two foreign countries; only passing in transit through the United States for transshipment to some foreign country: for example, a cargo of oil shipped from Hawaii to England via the United States.

When the statistical system of the United States was reformed, in 1867, these various returns were eliminated from the import entries, which, in consequence, appeared sometimes to fall off, whereas in fact they had increased. And this was the case with the Sandwich Islands.

The statistics herewith submitted are from the official record—not of summaries, but of each year by itself; so that the various sources of error alluded to are avoided.

It is to be remarked at the outset that the Hawaiian Islands possess but a small arable surface, and that even this is daily subject to volcanic eruption. There are twelve islands altogether, of which but eight are inhabited; the rest being small, rocky, and sterile. The area of the whole group is about 6,200 square miles, or nearly 4,000,000 acres; but hardly one-fortieth, or scarcely 100,000 acres, of this area is cultivable under any circumstances. Dr. Wood's estimate, made in 1856, was as follows:

	Acres.
Grazing lands, good.....	1,920,000
Arable lands, good.....	292,000
Sugar-cane lands.....	100,000
Lands adapted to raising manilla, hemp, bananas, etc.....	500,000
Total.....	2,812,000
Of which the arable lands are.....	392,000

This estimate was made before any careful examination of the lands was entered upon. More recent observation reduces the arable lands to 100,000 acres, of which scarcely one-fourth is suitable for the cultivation of sugar. Hon. H. A. P. Carter, Special Commissioner to the United States, said, in 1875:

"Cane lands now in cultivation are 10,000 acres, of which about one-third produces annual crops, one-third biennial, one-third a crop in thirty to thirty-six months. I am very confident it would be difficult to find 20,000 acres more which it would be practicable to plant in cane. Much of the land usually spoken of as arable land is cut up by ravines or subject to drought, or some other drawback. Several plantations have been started in such places, and abandoned after a large expenditure of money. There are from 30,000 to 50,000 acres of land in the group, lying in small patches in ravines and valleys, and on mountain slopes in favorable localities, where bananas, rice, taro, coffee, hemp, ramie and other fibrous plants might be grown. The balance of the lands not barren are fit only for pasture of horses, cattle, goats, or sheep. I am aware that larger estimates have been made of available sugar-cane lands on these Islands. In fact, I do not believe there are 100,000 acres in all the group profitable for agriculture, of which 25,000 could raise sugar-cane under favorable circumstances. Much of this would need irrigation to produce good crops. On the islands of Maui and Kauai much of the lands are irrigated; some are irrigated from ancient water leads, cut by the natives in former times, at comparatively small expense. In other places large expenditure has been made to secure a supply of water, which, from the precipitous character of the Islands, it is difficult to retain in sufficient quantities to last through a few months of dry weather. Some of the cane lands produce three to four tons of sugar per acre; but the average product is about two tons. As some of the cane on the uplands takes two and three years to mature, the average annual product on these lands is about one ton; thus the 10,000 acres under cultivation produce about 12,000 tons per annum."

According to this estimate, which is the latest and most authoritative, the lands are classified at present as follows:

	Acres.
Lands in sugar-cane in 1875.....	10,000
Additional lands in sugar-cane since 1875, say.....	3,000
Other lands suitable for sugar-cane.....	12,000
Lands possibly suitable for bananas, rice, taro, coll ramie, etc.....	500
Other possible arable lands.....	2
Total arable lands.....	25,000

Much of this is subject to floods of volcanic lava and to drought.*

The native population of the Islands is unprogressive. In 1850 it numbered 80,643; in 1853, 71,108; in 1861, 67,084; in 1866, about 65,000; in 1872, 51,531; and in 1877, about 51,000. "Agriculture has made but little progress, and will never probably occupy the natives to any great extent. * * The means of subsistence are so easily procured that the inhabitants have but few inducements, even did they not lack the industry and enterprise, to become extensive agriculturists."†

To supply the place of the unprogressive natives, efforts have been made to induce foreign agriculturists to emigrate to Hawaii, but thus far with little success; the entire foreign population of the islands, including Americans, Europeans, Japanese, Chinese, and Polynesians, having been according to the latest census, that of 1877, only 6,912. The area practically subject to cultivation, and the population being very small and incapable of extension, it follows that the production of the Islands, which consists chiefly of sugar, can not be increased much beyond its present limits. What these are will be seen from the following comparative summary of the exports of that article, which substantially represents the product; the home consumption being about 500,000 pounds per annum. Molasses may be reduced to sugar at the rate of one gallon equals three pounds :

TOTAL EXPORTS OF SUGAR AND MOLASSES FROM THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS TO ALL COUNTRIES FROM 1866 TO 1877 INCLUSIVE. COM. REL. 1874 ET SEQ.

1877.....	34,773,726	187,873

From this table it will be seen that in 1866 the exports of sugar and of molasses reduced to sugar amounted to 20,284,546 pounds, and in 1877 to 35,337,975 pounds, showing an increase of about 75 per cent. Of these exports only a portion—the main portion, to be sure—were exported to the United States; the importations into this country, over three-fourths of which are entered at San Francisco, having been during the past two years as follows :

IMPORTS OF SUGAR AND MOLASSES FROM THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS INTO THE UNITED STATES DURING THE TWO YEARS ENDED JUNE 30, 1878. COM. AND NAV., 1877 AND 1878.

Year.	Sugar, Pounds.	Molasses, Gallons.
1877.....	30,624,162	138,862
1878.....	30,397,329	87,535

Oregon imports about one-tenth of these quantities, and some small lots of sugar and molasses find their way into New Bedford and other Eastern ports of the United States.

How small the entire product of the Hawaiian Islands is, compared with the total consumption of saccharine matter in the United States, will now be shown. The most complete statistics of the sugar consumption of the United States were published by the London Statistical Society, in their Journal for December, 1875, pp. 526-32. According to these tables the consumption of sugar, and of melada and molasses reduced to sugar, in the United States, was as follows :

CONSUMPTION OF SACCHARINE MATTER IN THE UNITED STATES.

Year.	Net Consumption of all Saccharine Matter.	Net Consumption per capita of Population.
1860.....	1,174,135,000	37.4
1861.....	1,179,881,000	36.4
1862.....	1,444,129,000	43.8
1863.....	776,242,000	32.3
1864.....	841,223,000	33.4
1865.....	853,394,000	30.8
1866.....	1,203,634,000	34.1
1867.....	1,302,447,000	36.2
1868.....	1,307,323,000	37.2
1869.....	1,435,352,000	38.1
1870.....	1,595,640,000	41.4
1871.....	1,651,283,000	41.6
1872.....	1,797,412,000	43.9
1873.....	1,805,203,000	42.9

From this table it will be observed that the average consumption of saccharine matter in the United States during the years 1871, 1872, and 1873 was nearly 43 pounds per capita of population, and as it had been increasing for many years, it has very likely by this time reached 45 pounds per capita. The estimated population of the United States for the present year, 1880, is about 50,000,000, so that the total consumption of saccharine matter will hardly fall short of 2,250,000,000 pounds, of which the Hawaiian Islands will furnish about 30,000,000 pounds, or one seventy-fifth part !

In other words, although the sugar product of the Hawaiian Islands has increased 75 per cent. since the operation of the Reciprocity Treaty, and has very nearly, if not quite, reached its utmost practicable limits, it is so small compared with the enormous consumption of sugar in the United States that only one pound in seventy-five of the latter is imported from Hawaii !

It is submitted to the good sense of our people that upon any grounds of consideration this is too trivial a matter to outweigh the material advantages derived from the virtual control of the Hawaiian Islands which the treaty confers upon us, and for which we negotiated it. Suppose the treaty abrogated, and the numerous benefits which were conferred upon our commerce by the Hawaiian Legislature in the hope of promoting its adoption, were abrogated with it. On the one hand, we should gain less than $1,000,000 a year in customs revenues (say 30,000,000 pounds of sugar at 3 cents per pound), and on the other, subject our shipping to perhaps more than $1,000,000 a year in tonnage, harbor, wharfage, and other dues ; shut the markets of Hawaii to the worth of manufactured goods which we now ship in exchange for sugar ; and debar ourselves from de-riying any of those political and commercial advantages which accrue from our present influence upon the government and affairs of those Islands.

Arguments for or against any policy are worthy of consideration in proportion to their practical importance. A number of arguments which have been adduced against the Reciprocity Treaty—such as the Chinese, the balance of trade, the employment of American capital on the Islands, the possible future had faith of Hawaii, the revenue, and other arguments—might possibly be worthy of consideration were the sugar trade more important ; but they fall to the ground as baseless and worthless in face of the fact that this trade scarcely equals one seventy-fifth part of our whole consumption of sugar. As for some other arguments which have found their way into captious hands—such as the so-called sugar monopoly, the beet-root sugar, and the stationary condition of the tooth-brush trade arguments—these are easily refuted.

We have already shown that the establishment of sugar refineries on the Pacific Coast, due to the operation of the Reciprocity Treaty, will serve to build up and encourage the beet-sugar industry.

As for monopoly, there is none. Everybody is free to buy sugar from Hawaii, and consume it unrefined if he prefers. Indeed, many do this. The unrefined sugars of Hawaii are excellent, and vast quantities of them pass directly into consumption without being refined. Moreover, everybody is free to purchase Eastern refined sugar. The presence of a refinery or two in San Francisco need not stand in the way ; on the contrary, it will help to cheapen sugar, not to enhance its price. And in point of fact it has had this effect, as the following table of prices will show :

TABLE SHOWING THE MARKET PRICE OF CRUSHED (REFINED) SUGAR IN SAN FRANCISCO AT OR NEAR THE 15TH OF EACH MONTH SINCE THE OPERATION OF THE RECIPROCITY TREATY WITH THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

From this table it will be noticed that the price of refined sugar has fallen almost constantly since the treaty went into operation, and that it was lower in 1879 than in 1878, and lower in 1878 than in 1877. With these facts the monopoly argument falls to the ground.

The tooth-brush argument is of the same character—worthless.

In scanning the lists which make up our one million dollars' worth of exports to the Hawaiian Islands in 1866, and our two million dollars' worth in 1878 (these do not include re-exports of foreign commodities), it appears that while the general trade nearly doubled, the exports of some few articles—among them tooth-brushes—fell off. To offset the few exports thus shown to have fallen off, we now append a list of the exports of some of the others, far more important, that increased :

If this list of increased exports be compared with that of diminished exports alluded to, it will be found that this one contains 39 articles, or classes of articles, while the other contains but 12. It will also be found that while the other one sums up less than $350,000 in 1878, this one sums up over $1,500,000. Nearly every branch of our domestic manufactures is represented, and not less than half a million dollars of profits are involved—all of which inured to the benefit of manufacturers in the Eastern States and merchants in San Francisco. What more is reasonably to be expected from a small trade like this ? By admitting Hawaiian sugar free of duty, we have secured all the political and commercial advantages we sought for—the latter alone far exceeding in pecuniary value the sum of duties remitted ; we have released our citizens from the payment of these duties, for it is they, and not the Hawaiians, who would have had to pay them ; we have lowered the price of sugar to the inhabitants of the Pacific Coast ; we have secured an increasing market, free of duties, for already over $2,000,000 a year worth of American manufactures ; and have done all this without disturbing a vested interest, without creating a monopoly, without violating a political principle or transgressing a law. On the contrary, we have laid the foundations of a wider commercial policy on the Pacific ; we have protected our guano islands ; we have extended the influence of American commercial capital and increased the profits of American trade ; we have lowered home taxation to the extent of a million dollars a year, by remitting a fraction of the duties on sugar ; we have promoted the consumption of sugar, a healthy and necessary article of diet ; we have secured employment for 500 workmen in and about sugar refineries, and for several thousand others in the manufacture of the various goods shipped to Hawaii ; and we have extended the great principle of Free Trade, by removing all the obstacles that stood in the way of unrestricted commercial intercourse with the most important islands of the great ocean that laves our western shores.

Rondeau.

Over the bay a schooner sailed,
Its sails were black, and closely veiled
Were all its crew, while forward, near
The foremast, stood a sable hier,
With guards attendant, steeled and mailed.
Anon some solemn note regaled
The mourners' ears, as one bewailed
Great Achmit's death, and shed a tear
Over the Bay.

One joy alone the mourners hailed,
Which truth demands shall be detailed—
It was a schooner of lager-beer
Which, over the Bey's unconscious bier,
They drank, and soon were—truth prevailed—
Over the hay.

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1880. SANFORD BENNETT.

THE THREE HUNDRED.

A Southern Story of the War.

Three hundred men of remarkable size remained as the bulwark of a cause. Three hundred rifles flashed in the sunlight, and three hundred glistening bayonets pointed with ominous portent to the sky, which was blue. The uniform of the soldiers was gray. They were drawn up for review. There were several peculiarities that distinguished these men from ordinary soldiers in time of war. Their uniforms were bright and new. Three rows of brass buttons ornamented the breast, gold braid in graceful festoon-designs relieved the front, and a stripe of black ran down the outer seam of the trousers. The caps were surrounded by a black-and-gold band and surmounted by a cockade of white feathers. These facts are worth of note, for the reason that the war was drawing to a close. The soldiers exhibited no signs of fatigue or hardships; their uniforms were not soiled nor ragged, nor slashed by sabres, nor torn by minie-balls.

Let us examine the reasons why this magnificently equipped and excellently drilled battalion was absent from Shiloh, from Seven Pines, from Chickamauga, from Donaldson. Was the Southern army surfeited with men? No. These were of a strange and unusual type. There was not a man who wore a beard. Their faces were rosy and white. Their most striking peculiarity was their size. They were not giants. They were narrow in the shoulders, narrow in the hips, and had legs of disproportionate length. In fact, they appeared to be dwarfs.

Not less remarkable in appearance than the soldiers were those who participated in the review. There was a notable exception in the person of the colonel, who was about forty years of age, of medium stature, straight as an arrow and proud as a king. He had gray eyes that were sharp, quick, intense. His forehead was broad and massive, his hair very gray, his neck powerful and firm. He was every inch a soldier—brave, resolute, daring, calm, prompt. It was upon his companions that the caricaturist could have flung the filthiest ink of bad humor. There were six of these. They were mounted, sat their horses awkwardly and uneasily, were uncouth and ridiculous. One had extremely long legs and large ears; another was so near-sighted that the phalanx appeared to him to be a monstrous pin-cushion, pricked by many needles. Under ordinary circumstances they might have been dignified men; but their surroundings were extraordinary, and they were consequently undignified.

After the review, the colonel asked one of the gentlemen:

"How do you like their appearance?"
 "Very much; very much."
 "Do you think they will stand?"
 "Under your leadership they certainly will, commandant."

The colonel smiled.
 "But, commandant," continued the gentleman, "you must remember that it is only at your earnest solicitation that I consented for the little fellows to retain their uniforms and to be under fire. I would not have a hair of their beads harmed for all the world."

It was strange that he should speak thus of soldiers!
 "I assure you they will be perfectly safe, sir," replied the officer.

"Quite sure?"
 "Yes."
 "Very well."

"The breastworks will afford ample protection. There will be merely a skirmish. The enemy will not fire upon us; but, on a mock show of resistance, will probably aim high and discharge a round to frighten us. I will return the fire in like manner, and then send up the white flag. I am extremely anxious that the boys should smell burnt powder. It will be a harmless lesson; yet I will lead them to believe I am in earnest. Of course it would be folly to oppose five thousand veterans with three hundred school-boys, twelve or thirteen years old."

They were not soldiers, then, but babes, whom the conscript act had disdained to send to the front. They were cadets; they attended a university; the colonel was the commandant; the borsemen, the Faculty. The boys were under the age of fourteen; the professors, over the age of fifty. They were not bomb-proof, but age-proof.

The commandant mounted his horse, spurred down to the centre of the line, and made the following address:

"Men and soldiers!"
 Three hundred young hearts throbbed with pride.
 "The enemy is upon us. Sherman is marching to the sea. He leaves in his desolate track chimneys without houses, children without homes, a people without a God!"
 He paused. The line trembled.

"You hear his guns. You see the black smoke of burning homes. In less than an hour a brigade of five thousand trained soldiers will sweep down upon you. The South does not despair. She has yet three hundred brave hearts to sacrifice upon the altar of Right."

The line swayed with excitement.
 "Your mothers and sisters watch you from afar. Their prayers are with you."

He shook with emotion.
 "Richmond has her eyes upon you! If we die, it is the death of the soldier."

He raised his sword:
 "If we fall, our dead bodies will be a monument to honor, the inalienable birthright of a Southerner!"

This ingenious and eloquent appeal had a wonderful effect. The colors were unfurled, and the entire line, in the wildest enthusiasm, sent up cheer after cheer. What if the boys were beguiled with a taste of glory? It made them soldiers, men, heroes.

The University was a mile from the town. A fence inclosed the broad campus. Along one side ran the public highway. On the side nearest the town was a large meadow. Not many rods from that side of the inclosure nearest the town was a trench two hundred yards long, protected by an earthwork that rose three feet above the surrounding level. The town was separated from the University by an intervening country, crossed and checked with fences, hedges, and walls of stone, the road cutting a broad passage through the whole. On either side was a row of stately dwellings and magnificent lines of cedar and live-oak, with occasional bedges of arbor-vitæ, Osage orange, or Cherokee rose.

The three hundred were drawn up in line of battle some two hundred yards in advance of the intrenchment. It was the intention of the commandant to fall back after the first fire. He speculated considerably on the nature of the attack. It was uncertain whether the raiders would send out a small detachment, or precipitate the whole column upon the feeble opposition of the boys.

But the commandant had not acted in consonance with his original intentions. He did not place the boys under the protection of the breastwork; they stood upon the open plain.

A cloud of dust was seen in the direction of the town. It was caused by the rapid approach of a company of horsemen. They numbered some seventy men. The heart of the commandant beat rapidly; a crisis was at hand. The advancing cavalymen reached the meadow and halted. They formed. A command was given; a charge was ordered. The horsemen plied the spur, and bore down, headlong and furious, upon the three hundred.

The commandant saw at a glance their terrible object: they would not shed the blood of the boys, but they would scatter them like chaff, and perhaps trample them in the dust. It was an anxious moment, and the commandant formed a resolution.

"Aim low!" he commanded.

He could not brook the insult.

"Fire!"

There was a terrific crash. When within fifty yards of the young rebels the impetuous charge of the cavalymen was stopped by a wall of lead. It struck them in the face and blinded them; it crushed their breasts; it shattered their arms. It struck down their horses, some falling to the ground, others, rearing and plunging, fled riderless from the bloody scene. The company was overwhelmed with consternation. A pompous little array of mock soldiers had poured out from three hundred toy rifles an unmerciful hail of death, that scorched the air and tore through the vitals of the veterans.

The soldiers had not fired a gun. They did not retreat—they ran. Death had stalked, unexpected, into their midst. They left a third of their number dead or wounded upon the field. But they were by no means defeated. It was now a point of honor. They rallied and prepared for a second charge.

The feelings that thrilled the breasts of the three hundred at this first taste of victory, the wild energy that sent the hot young blood bounding with redoubled speed through their veins, are things that scoff at portrayal. The faces that were white when the finger pressed the trigger were now glowing with feverish excitement. They stood as firm as a rock, and reloaded their rifles. The commandant praised them.

The cavalymen advanced and delivered a fire at long range. One little fellow was struck in the breast. He threw up his hands and fell flat upon his face. Those in his immediate vicinity were demoralized, but the commandant galloped to the spot and reassured them. Much as it galled his pride, he saw the advisability of ordering an immediate retreat. He carried a heavy responsibility in the little life that had already gone out. He proceeded to retreat, orderly and slowly, and reserved his fire. He was in despair. Events had taken an altogether unexpected turn. He concluded to surrender. He pulled something white from his pocket, and reached down for a gun from which to wave it.

At that moment his plume fell to the ground, severed by a bullet. He had become a target. In another second a mad ball tore blindly through his heart.

When the commandant fell there was indeed dismay in the ranks. His horse bounded away. The cavalymen, seeing his fall, again put spur to horse and charged furiously.

But the boys were not without a leader. The senior captain sprang forward, sword in hand, and placed himself in front of the commandant's body. The hat of the latter had fallen; the boy picked it up and placed it upon his own head. It was too large for him. He was a mere child, but his eyes glared dangerously. He raised his sword as the commandant had done, and assumed command. But the line was giving way. It melted. It was lost. Not to be outdone in bravery, the other captains rallied around their commander. Many were flying, but they also returned. The little captain bravely endeavored to form his men, but it was useless. The horsemen were charging them and were quite near. The boy captain shouted at the top of his voice:

"Fire—low!"

Again was the enemy brought to a stand by a short nervous fire, that did little harm. The boys were huddled together like frightened sheep. The commander ordered a retreat to the intrenchment.

He picked up the dead body of his commandant. By a powerful effort he succeeded in placing it across his shoulder. A torrent of warm blood gushed from the ghastly hole in the side and streamed down the boy's breast. It sickened him. The weight of the body was crushing him. He staggered forward a few steps. The odor of the blood invaded his nostrils. He closed his teeth firmly together, and struggled to retain his balance. The body was heavy and unwieldy. The legs swung from side to side and hindered him. He trembled with the exertion. His stomach revolted at the smell of blood. He surged to one side and fell, the body lying across his back. He raised himself upon his hands and knees, and the body rolled upon the ground. He grasped it by the collar, and mustering all his strength, dragged it across the intervening space, and over the embankment.

In the meantime, a cloud of dust far greater than that previously created by the repulsed horsemen was approaching the battle-field from the town. A regiment of eight hundred horse had been dispatched at the moment the firing was heard. It arrived at a most unseasonable time. The Federal company was stung with anger and shame. It had demoralized the enemy, but only temporarily; for he was now safely lodged behind an efficient shelter. The company was compelled to submit to the mortification of a reinforcement. Eight hundred and fifty cavalymen were now arrayed against three hundred trembling boys.

The solitary figure of a boy stood calmly upon the embankment, in full view of the enemy. He was the leader of the rebel forces. The great mantle of a sorrowful loneliness enveloped him; the sad essence of that oppressing absence of everything but pride pervaded his bearing; he seemed utterly desolate and deserted, but brave, superior, scornful of death. There is not a mother in the world whose heart would not have gone out to that lonely child standing in the shadow of death. She would have clasped him in her arms, and covered his sad, childish face with kisses. His arms were folded. His right hand clasped a sword larger than the one he had previously carried. It was the commandant's. The boy was pale.

He had restored order and confidence. The boys had as yet imbibed no idea of defeat. They were quietly secreted in the trench, rifle in hand, and prepared for another charge.

The storm gathered. A dense blue cloud, charged with a thousand thunderbolts, prepared to burst upon the heads of the three hundred. It advanced, and disgorged a hail of leaden stones. It thundered out destruction, and belched fire and smoke. It rolled onward, hurling death through the air.

The cool commander of the rebels stood upon the embankment unharmed, while the minie-balls rained around him. They threw dirt upon him as they struck the embankment. As the cloud rumbled noisily and thundering over the ground, he seized his opportunity, and shouted at the top of his voice:

"Ready—aim low—fire!"

There was a puff of smoke from the earthwork; a few in the lines of the enemy wavered; but the cloud swept on.

The crisis came. The cloud had become a flood, which poured over the embankment. The boys were scattered to the winds—

All but one. He stood pale and resolute beside the dead body of the commandant. The flood roared and seethed around him; he held the great sword in both hands, to battle with the waves.

A captain approached him and demanded:

"Surrender!"

The boy regarded him scornfully, and grasped the sword more firmly. The captain thought to frighten him by raising his sword as if to strike.

"Surrender!" he repeated.

"Not to you, sir."

The captain was astonished.

"To whom, then?"

"Your colonel."

"My colonel!"

"Yes."

"Why?"

"I demand it."

"For what reason?"

"It is a courtesy due to my rank."

"Who are you?"

"A soldier."

"Your rank?"

"Colonel-commanding."

"And the man lying there?"

The boy gazed down into the upturned face. His breast was seen to heave.

"Who is he?" asked the officer softly.

A tear trembled upon the pale cheek of the boy. Less firmly he answered:

"My father."

OAKLAND, January 4, 1881.

W. C. MORROW.

A propos of the recent seventieth birthday of Oliver Wendell Holmes, an inspector of the Holmes mansion writes: "But inside, the controlling character is shown at once. Family portraits line the hall; 'claw-footed chairs and black mahogany tables and bevel-edged mirrors and stately upright cabinets' (things the Autocrat furnished his 'man of family' in describing him at his first public breakfast) fill the parlors. The portraits include the ancestral member of the council, by Simbert, and, in the Autocrat's own catalogue, 'the great merchant-uncle, by Copley, full length, sitting in his arm-chair, in a velvet cap and flowered robe, with a globe by him to show the range of his commercial transactions, and letters with large red seals lying around, one directed conspicuously to The Honorable, etc., etc. Great-grandmother, by the same artist, brown satin, lace very fine, hands superlative, grand old lady, stiffish, but imposing. 'A pair of Stuarts,' and so through the list. In short, when the Autocrat gave the world his idea of a man of family, he gave a very picture of himself. His library and study is up one flight of stairs, and with spacious bay-windows looks out on the bay. From these windows—overhanging the bay—with his glass, the Doctor has a sweeping view of Beacon Hill, North Boston, Charleston, Somerville, Bunker Hill, Cambridgeport, Old Cambridge, Brookline, Brighton, Mount Auburn, Watertown, Waltham, and Arlington Heights; and winding down from the bills, the sinuous valley of the Charles. In this lofty study, with this airy outlook, our poet and philosopher is as completely isolated from the world as a hermit, and yet looks out into it on every side. He is like a watchman on the wall, who sees the signs and wonders without, and the commotion of the people within."

A correspondent writes from Leipsic that a society composed of fashionable women has been formed there with a view to discouraging extravagance of dress and any and all superfluous expenditure for adornment or display. The members are pledged not to wear jewels, false hair, trains, double skirts, or anything not required by considerations of decency and self-respect. Patterns of single gowns with very little trimming have been devised, and certain mantua-makers have agreed to follow those patterns rigorously whenever they are asked to. The members are persuaded that they will be able to work a thorough reform, and do great good by causing rules of economy to be widely adopted in that city. As many of them are rich and of high social position, they think that their influence will be felt and their example followed throughout Bavaria. We hope that they may be, justified in their opinion, but we have shuddering doubts. Something of the sort has taken place in an Ohio town, though there the motive is theologic. A number of young women have organized themselves into a Circle of the Sanctified, as they designate it, and have discarded gems and garniture of every kind. Recently one of them was found in the street in the early morning in her nightgown, and not long after in a still worse state of wardrobe. She was arrested, properly draped, and pronounced insane. My she is so. When young women, or even toled have discarded ornament or surrendered the there is good reason to question their me-

GANYMEDE'S CUP.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 10, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—Mrs. Jerningham says:

"Men never seem to turn from meat,
Their dinners never come amiss."

But what is the cause of the moderation as exemplified at the various entertainments New Year's night? Can we hope that those who can not read the ARGONAUT have had it read to them, and that a lesson has been learned? or was it because, having been fed all day, the pangs of hunger were in a measure appeased? Whatever the cause, the result is most satisfactory, and there is no longer any need of repeating to our society habitués the reproach which the White Angel once made to Swedenborg: "You eat too much." Their abstemiousness was most exemplary, and one might think they were trying to become spiritualized through fasting. Our entertainers, too, have learned that it is wise to begin to feed early in the evening, quietly informing the older and more distinguished guests that "supper waits," taking good care that there is no cessation on the part of the musicians. They must be refreshed one at a time until all danger of a rush is passed.

And now that this evil has been so easily overcome, can we not find that prescription for "inspiring some of our society leaders with a little more graciousness," a little more kindness of manner, toward invited guests and those whom chance or accident brings within their doors; a little display of cordiality, gentleness, and consideration toward those whom they deem their inferiors in name, rank, or purse; a little evidence of that "grace of sympathy" which radiates and makes beautiful the most irregular features—in place of those howls that impress one as having been "strangled at birth," give us a friendly greeting, that makes one feel "You are welcome—I'm truly glad to see you." Most of our grandes dames appear to think that any exhibition of sensibility and cordiality is highly derogatory to their dignity, and move among their guests and along their spacious halls like magnificent refrigerators, sending a shiver of 1-wish-I-was-at-home-iveness to the very marrow of those who came to be made happy for a little while. We all appreciate the privilege of being received within the portals of these magnificent homes, but something other than open doors and gorgeous suppers is desired of our ladies if they would rank with those whose birth and brains inspire them to be gracious to all. Even Harold Skimpole "took it his business in the social system to be agreeable."

Have you ever observed how things go by threes? and why should they not? the sun and moon have each three names, and Aristotle remarked that "three is the chief of mystical numbers, because it contains a beginning, a middle, and an end," and I have been wondering how our trio of brilliant entertainments was to be completed—Belmont, Crocker, —. The mystery was solved last night, when I responded to the invitation—

Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Goad request the pleasure of your company

Friday Evening, January ninth, 8:30 o'clock.

R. S. V. P.

1222 Pine Street.

At the entrance of the lavishly smilaxed salon stood an usher, who, with a voice more or less resounding according to their social importance, announced the names of the guests to Mrs. Goad, who was just a bit more charming than usual. She wore an elegant green silk costume, most artistically and wonderfully made, and blending harmoniously with the chaste white silk worn by her cousin Miss Wilkins, whose pleasing manners and happy conversation make her a favorite with all she meets. Mrs. Volney Spalding is one of those rare ladies who never forget to be polite, and wore on this occasion a very "Frenchy" and much admired costume, composed of gold and cardinal colors. Dr. Gwin's daughters, Mrs. Coleman and Miss Carrie, were surrounded by their usual corps of admirers, recalling to my mind the days of '57 and '58, when I paid a flying visit to California, spending a few days at the White Sulphur Springs, Napa, where Mrs. Gwin was holding court over a throng of beautiful ladies and handsome men. A few of the ladies are left, but the men are all gone.

You know how complete are the appointments of the Spalding (formerly Ralston) House for entertaining; how spacious the corridors and salons; what a boon to dancers the inlaid floors! The entire parlor floor, with the dining hall, was thrown open. The many mirrors added to the apparent size of the apartments, enabling us "to see ourself as others," etc. Supper was served down stairs, where there was plenty of room to be comfortable. I send you a menu, printed on white satin, gold letters:

MENU DU SOUPER.

Huitres de l'Est. Huitres à la poulette.

I never saw a more toothsome repast, which will not surprise you when you know that it was got up under the direction of Mrs. Spalding—a lady who can count among her accomplishments the art of making a dining-room attractive—an art it would be well for more of our ladies to cultivate. Mrs. McMullin's trio of beautiful daughters were more becomingly attired. Miss Emma Crockett's costume was a bewildering mass of green satin and grenadine. Mrs. James Burling was radiant in pink silk. Mrs. Isaac Requa displayed one of her numerous silk toilets. Mrs. Dan Tazt never looked younger or prettier in her life; and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Selby, was greatly admired. Miss Mamie Coghill, the almost "faultily faultless" beauty; Miss Sedgwick—she with the oriental eyes; Miss Myra Giffin, Miss Hussy, and the Misses Cole made a charming picture.

I must not forget pretty Mrs. Lieutenant Fletcher, who appears to be as great a favorite as when she was Miss Miller. But the army people are all pleasant, and none more so than General and Mrs. Kautz, who were present. In fact the navy and army were well represented, their glittering uniforms adding very much to the brilliancy of the affair. Mr. and Mrs. J. Henley Smith, Mr. and Mrs. A. N. Towne, and almost the entire corps of society beaux were present, headed by Dewey, Tevis, and Mix; and Mrs. Goad is to be congratulated upon having given one of the most elegant parties of the season, the memory of which has left a pleasant jingle in the minds of all present, including SACRAMENTO, Jan. 5, 1880.

N. B. S.

Mr. White—I move that it is the opinion of the Commissioners that it is to the best interests of the city that it should own the lake and the lands condemned.

This was carried unanimously.

Mr. Kelly—I move that we give $1,206,000 for that property, and no more for the entire property.

The Chairman—Is that seconded? [Applause.] It is not. Is there any other motion?

Dr. Meares—I move that we appraise it at $1,500,000.

Mr. Purdy—I second the motion.

The roll was called. Mr. Kelly voted no. Dr. Meares, Messrs. Cobb, Purdy, and White voted aye. Mr. Reynolds's name being called, he said he hoped they would agree on something unanimously; and, after some discussion of an interlocutory character, voted aye.

The Chairman—Gentlemen, the award is made; $1,500,000 is the amount.

Mr. Kelly—My vote is for $1,206,000. I wish to have it so recorded.

QUERIES AND WONDERMENTS.—Why is it that a proceeding that compels the city to buy property it does not want has met so little opposition as this? Why is it that it passed a new Board of Supervisors at its first real business meeting, as a surprise? Whence came the applause when Mr. Kelly could find no second for his attempt to save a quarter of a million of dollars? What has become of that tax-payers' association that was so active just before election? If this property is worth $1,500,000, how did it come to go to foreclosure, judgment, decree, and sale by the Hibernia Bank for an original debt of one-tenth that amount? What is the aggregate amount of taxes to be paid by Messrs. White, Cobb, Meares, Purdy, and Reynolds, annually, upon this additional debt created by them? When Mr. Mahoney gets his million and a half, will there not turn up other proprietary interests in the same lake to be purchased? Is there not a grave constitutional question involved as to whether this additional debt can be created against the city of San Francisco?

Apropos of the recent discovery that the late Charley Parkhurst, the veteran stage-driver, was a woman, the Carson Appeal says: "Parkhurst used to be with Hank Monk a good deal in early days; and when Hank heard the report he was so overcome for several minutes that he gasped for breath, and drawled out: 'Je—hosphat! I camped out with Parkie once for over a week, and we slept on the same buffalo robe right along; wonder if Curly Bill's been playin' me the same way.'"

The San Francisco merchant is laboring for two points that have our full sympathy. The encouragement of home industries and home manufactures, and the development of a Central and South American and Mexican trade. If we were a commercial paper we would be eloquent in this direction.

The fancy for decoration has even reached whisk-brooms, clothing them with embroidered felt cloth, and putting them, when not in use, in a willow frame, decorated with Kensington embroidery.

LEGISLATIVE NOTES.

Mr. Grove L. Johnson is to the fore with his Retraction Bill of last session—a measure that has been long enough dead to smell pretty bad, but not long enough to be buried, it seems. Indeed, it will probably be buried only in the political grave of its author, but the funeral will not be much longer deferred, apparently.

"The same gentleman has a bill 'to prevent the accumulation of large landed estates.' It belongs to that kind of legislation—of which we shall have no end this session—that looks on the face of it like an undoubted cure of a conceded evil, but is invariably abandoned by whatever nation adopts it. To prevent the accumulation of large landed estates is easy enough; it has been done hundreds of times. To cure the greater evils entailed by the prevention is not so easy—except by method of repeal.

Mr. Tyler has given notice of a bill providing for donations to the State, or to the counties, designed to meet the cases of the officials pledged to return a part of their salaries. These conscientious officials are quietly lobbying against the bill.

Assemblyman Braunhart crops out and chips in with a highly practical measure, making it a misdemeanor for a druggist to pay a doctor a commission. We shall have to supplement it with a great many similar laws. For example, it must be made a misdemeanor for the druggist to fall dreadfully ill, call in the physician, pitch his prescription into the fire, and pay him a prodigious fee for "professional services." Perhaps it would be well, too, to make it a capital offense for the druggist to buy a dog of the doctor and then shoot the dog.

It was, after all, a little impertinent, that indorsement of Mr. Swift for the Chinese mission. It was a recognition of a fact of which they had not the right to speak at all, namely, that the present incumbent is "under fire." It is a question of taste—non disputandum.

It is unpleasantly probable that the session will see a good deal of unintelligent meddling with the mining interest under the guise of hostility to stock gambling. Most of the legislators lost heavily in the recent depression; it is natural that they should "go again."

Paul Neumann characteristically opposed the appointment of a Chaplain to the Senate. One got into the Assembly, however, at $5 a day, and another will doubtless be selected for the Senate at an equal or superior salary—of which we shall cheerfully pay our portion, for the reverend gentleman will necessarily pray for Paul as well as for the rest.

Steve Maybell, the poet of the Sand-lot, is said to have made a blasphemous speech on this Chaplain question, which was bad taste in that hard. Five sand-lotters wanted Judge Tyler for chaplain—a mean reflection on the good Judge. It is now said the Senators are thinking of electing a female chaplain, which will be real nice for the Senators. We should be very glad if some broad-minded and fearless man, without impiety and without hypocrisy, would discuss and settle this ever-recurring question of prayers and chaplains for legislative bodies—and souls. We think there should be no hired chaplains for a California legislator, but reserve our reasons for publication in a big brass-bound volume.

The report on "American competition," which is being prepared for the British Royal Commission of Agriculture, contains the coldest sort of comfort for English agriculturists. It is shown therein that American resources for supplying England with food are constantly receiving new developments; and that the facilitation of transport and the extension of agricultural enterprise are uniting to drive the English farmer into bankruptcy. Even the growing of fruit, vegetables, and poultry is already suffering from American competition. It now remains for the "foreign affairs" editor to seriously propose annexation of England.

Obscure Intimations.

LITTLE MAIDEN.—You forgot to send your name and address; you are therefore, as yet, unread. It is a rule.

T. L. C., New London, Conn.—We'll consider the matter.

SCHOOL HOUSE.—We do not find the verses anywhere, nor remember them. So they could not have been very bad, or we should not only recollect them, but they would probably be hanging up in the office framed and glazed. We so seldom get bad verses that they are esteemed a great curiosity here.

TURKISH ADVENTURER.—Be as patient as possible and trust in Allah, who alone can tell what we shall think of it.

W., Nevada City.—We ask you, in all solemnity, if this is a decent time of the year to be working at one's spring poems? How many ulsters did you put on to thaw out a conception of spring so that it would run? We can not yet say what the spring styles of poetry will be, but it was well enough to be a week or two ahead of the other vernal bards, so as to come first in point of time. Pigeon-holed for the present.

NEW YORKER.—You do not give your name, so the song of your satisfaction at the relegation of Judge Terry to his squash ranch would fall rather flat upon ears accustomed to the sonorous diapason of our delight.

J. Q., San Jose.—A story that will take up more than three columns of this paper has but a slender chance of being considered. We have yet a few to work off which were accepted before our suffering readers began to bemoan their fatigue by sending us (derisively) stories a league and a half in length.

"BABY DAYS."—Literary criticism "is not the same thing."

CXI.—Sunday, January 11.—Bill of Fare for Ten or Twelve Persons.

Eastern Oysters.
Gumbo Filé, with Rice.
Smelts, cooked in Spanish Style.
Chicken Salad. Potato Salad, garnished with Tongue and Olives.
Stewed Terrapin. Boiled Hominy.
Fillet of Beef, with Truffles and Mushrooms.
Green Peas. Celery, with Cream Sauce.
Roman Punch.
Roast Turkey. Potato Croquettes.
Rochefort and Gruyère Cheese.
Charlotte Russe. Brandied Peaches. Wine Jelly.
Assorted Cakes, Candied Fruits.
Fruit-bowl of Oranges, Apples, and Bananas.
White Wine, Claret, Madeira, and Champagne. Coffee, Liqueurs.

TO COOK A FILLET OF BEEF.—Take four or five pounds of fillet, trim, and lard with salt pork; place in a cooking basin, cover with white cooking wine; cut up three or four truffles, throw into the wine, and let it stand twenty-four hours. Then take two cans of mushrooms, pour off the juice of one, and place the mushrooms in a saucepan; add the juice and wine of the meat, salt, pepper, and a small piece of butter; let them stew for about an hour. Place the meat in a small pan, baste with butter, cook half an hour; and five minutes before it is served toss the mushrooms over the meat, and serve very hot.

VARIOUS TOPICS.

John St. Martin is a stock speculator, resident in San José. A good place is San José for a speculator in bulls, but there is no worse spot in the universe for the dealer in bruin and wild cat. Last week he came to San Francisco to unload a thousand shares of "Rough-and-Tumble," and while here was seduced into purchasing so large an amount of "Tom-and-Jerry" that his assets were completely swallowed up in the outlay. His entire line of longs is now being sold for "commish," and he has returned to the Garden City fully determined hereafter to busy his head with the raising of cabbages—in which praiseworthy industry he deserves to succeed.

Parties who are not interested in the Maine election frauds hint "that the audacious and unblushing coup just performed in Maine bears a most striking resemblance to the Cronin business attempted in Oregon," and go on to say that "they are so much alike in conception and execution that the suspicion is not altogether unnatural that both originated in the same mind"—that is to say, that of the "Sage of Cipher Alley." It must, nevertheless, be admitted that there is nothing extraordinarily "sage" in using for the second time an expedient that had failed the first, and one which was evidently sufficiently well known to be at the brains' ends of even a paragraphist.

Mr. Bumber, of New York, recently sold his wife for five cents to a gentleman appropriately named Buyer; but a week later Mr. Buyer, indisposed of his bargain, brought her to the original proprietor and wanted his money back. The case at last arrived before a court of law, the woman "waiting for the verdict" with some anxiety. If it should be decided that in his week's possession Mr. Buyer had not had five cents' worth of advantage from his ownership in fee simple she might justly resent it as a reflection upon her capacity for making herself useful. The traffic in wives, unless under the rigorous restriction of a healthy public opinion, is singularly open to abuse, anyhow. We should be sorry to be understood as actually condemning the sale of wives; we merely do not approve of buying them.

Brother Owen—as the progressive sisterhood calls him—Owen of the San José Mercury wants the supply of babies stopped, and Brother McClatchey of the Sacramento Bee says "talking isn't going to do it." It's a very pretty quarrel as it stands, but there is hope for both the gentlemen. The Kindergarten promises to educate the baby of the future into an animal which by no mischance may ever be brought to read either the Mercury or the Bee. Whereupon the chief reproach of childhood will disappear.

"R. F. M." of Oakland has a right to be amused, surprised, and pleased because a certain very worthy person got caught in the lariat thrown by the Grant Boomers. Some people are too good, and too innocent, and too unsuspecting to be able to avoid the snares spread for their entanglement. Such long-headed, broad-horned, prudent cattle as "R. F. M." ought to be more indulgent toward the more unsophisticated calfings of the herd.

Mr. Sam Goodhue is a western poet of approved pattern. He resides near Santa Cruz, in a redwood cañon, and has seventeen children. It has been, for the past sixteen years, his invariable Christmas custom to address a Christmas poem to his latest child. But, early last November, his blushing wife presented him with two pledges of her affection so nearly simultaneously that there was extreme difficulty encountered in deciding which of the twain was "last." In preparing his regular poem, Mr. Goodhue bridged the difficulty in the following novel and picturesque fashion:

My Christmas boy, my Christmas girl,
My proud old head is in a whirl.
To thee, or ye, this I inscribe:
I drink to ye and all our tribe;
And if the "last" be girl or boy,
I wish the hangman double joy.

All of which is tributary to the filial excellence of the fifteen elders, and is also most praiseworthy verse.

The Australian papers are relating—with greater evident pleasure than we think the gravity of the offense justifies—the extraordinary impropriety committed by a lady over there, who, with but an indifferent observance of local custom, had three wives, one of whom is still living. The other two died soon after their respective weddings, probably of disappointment; and the husband herself has gone mad. It appears that none of the wives made any public complaint, and the husband's ineligibility was discovered only after her incarceration in an asylum where she was required to take a bath. This is not quite as clear as might be wished; the agency of water in disclosing a family secret of this kind should have been particularly set forth. Surely she must have taken baths before. Perhaps they use a more powerful sort of soap in the asylum than elsewhere. The matter is not altogether comprehensible in any of its aspects; at least it is not so to us, and we doubt if we have made it so to the reader. On the whole, we would prefer that it should be considered that we have not written anything about it.

The women of New York are represented (falsely, we fear) as having caught the mining share fever, and as having organized a "Woman's Mining Company." The company, it is said, will be limited to "two hundred and fifty souls"—if ladies, despite the dictum of Mahomet, have souls. Twenty-five thousand dollars are to be raised, nearly one-half of which is already pledged, for the purchase of certain mining property in San Juan County, Colorado. The company will be officered and controlled by women exclusively. The Tribune publishes the names of several wealthy and well-known women who are interested, and who it avers have also formed a woman's "Bullion Club" on the model of the male organization of that name. To this point we can follow our esteemed contemporary with willing faith, but when the Tribune avers that a large party of these gentle creatures intend going to the mining districts next spring to prospect we should like the privilege of withholding our belief, if that is not contrary to the etiquette of journalism as understood in New York. We hope the whole statement is true, however; it will be a good thing for the handsome Lent, the fascinating Gashwiler, the engaging Hearst, and many more of the lady-killers of the market. It may be confidently asserted that if the pretty dears really want a fine undeveloped mine, capable of producing a monthly "divvy" with but a trifling expenditure, any one of these gentlemen will have it ready for them.

Mr. John P. Jones, U. S. Senator from Nevada, has taken upon himself to secure the perpetuity of the Comstock. The poetry Editor of the ARGONAUT wishes to return humble and devout thanks to the great prophet of silver and sage of the sage-brush, for this great promise and undeserved boon. All the savings of a long and laborious career are invested in Peavine, and he having a weakness for compound interest investments, the assessments thereon will be paid until 1909, at which date the poet will purchase a senatorship.

Mr. Cox, a Democratic member of Congress from the city of New York, has introduced into the House of Representatives a bill to restrict European and other immigration. Of its terms we are not advised, but it seems as though the time had now come when we should no longer invite an indiscriminate immigration from foreign lands. The continuing policy of giving away public lands as an inducement for aliens to come among us seems a very short-sighted one, in view of the fact that we are getting the refuse and redundant population of Europe, and for this we are giving away the heritage of lands that will soon be needed for the sons and daughters of our own forty millions of people.

Among the changes prominent in business houses we notice that of the old and well-known firm of Williams, Blanchard & Co., long and favorably identified with the shipping business of San Francisco, and for some time past agents of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. Mr. Blanchard having retired, Mr. W. B. Dimond and Mr. A. Cheesbrough have been admitted as partners. The firm is now Williams, Dimond & Co. We congratulate our merchants on this event, as they are more or less brought in contact with "Pacific Mail," with which Mr. Dimond is particularly identified, being the Purveyor of the company. His good judgment and pleasant manner of doing business has made him many friends, and, however much we regret to see old friends retire from business, we are grateful that their places are filled by such active business men as W. H. Dimond and A. Cheesbrough.

We wish that science, common sense, and genuine patriotism would join hands, and undertake to settle the sewerage question for San Francisco. At present we have three crying evils in this connection. The atmosphere of the city is poisoned in summer and fall by the noxious gases which escape from our ill-ventilated and unflushed sewers. The health officer has shown—we think conclusively—that, until we can have systematic and ample flushing, our only safety is to puncture the man-holes on the line of the main sewers, and allow the gases to escape in small quantities, regularly diffused, as soon as generated. Another evil—only indirectly felt—is the constant fouling of the waters of the harbor, and the consequent destruction of young fishes, occasioned by the fetid outpourings of our sewers. A third evil is the continuous waste of the best fertilization material, which, if stored and distributed by a judicious system of engineering and a wise economy, would add incalculable fertility to our market gardens, and help forward the problem of park reclamation to a speedy conclusion. Have we no engineers, no economists, no patriots?

We have received the first two numbers of the American Art Review, published by Estes & Lauriat, Boston. The agents in San Francisco are A. L. Bancroft & Co. The Review is edited by Mr. S. R. Koehler, associated with whom are Dr. Prime and Mr. Charles C. Perkins. It is in nearly every way a creditable attempt to do for American art what L'Art does with such incomparable ability for French. Of course, it is not to be expected that we shall very soon have an art periodical of such a character as that; we have not the artists, the writers, the materials, the public to produce and sustain such a one. We must creep before we can walk, but we are creeping toward the light. Each of the monthly numbers before us contains articles of notable excellence, and is admirably illustrated; the first number having three etchings; the second two, and both many wood engravings. All the work appears conscientiously done, and much of it with exceptional intelligence and technical knowledge. Among the contributed articles we observe one of capital merit from Mr. Wm. Laffan, formerly a journalist of this city, now journalist, artist, littérateur, and man of affairs in New York—a rare fellow, skilled in many kinds of cleverness. We commend the Review as a venture worthy of encouragement and support.

Columbus, Ohio, is wild over Miss Adèle Belgrade as "Hamlet." "Belgrade in breeches" has certainly a taking sound; though one can not help fearing that the divinity which shapes Miss Adèle's ends will be sadly discouraged by the rough hewing of Columbus criticism.

Nym Crinkle, appealing from the dictum of "Willie" Winter, says that he is perfectly willing to admit that John McCullough is "pure and good and sweet, as a man," but does not care to be obliged to sit through a representation of Virginius that his admission may be believed.

According to Mr. J. N. Lockington, the recognized Pacific coast authority on the subject, ninety species of food fishes are sold in the markets of this city. Those who remember what Agassiz said about fish as brain food will scarcely wonder at our present delegation in the Assembly, or feel more than momentary alarm at the continued absence of Denis and the continuous presence of Caliban.

The word "flirtation," which in its ruder sense is an abomination, in its finer sense stands only for brilliant conversations.

DECLINE OF THE BOOM.

The ARGONAUT takes a decided and unyielding stand against the renomination of General Grant. We do not question his patriotism, his service to the country, or his personal integrity. Our views have been so often uttered that it is needless to give them further expression. This opposition we shall make with fearless, and, we trust, honorable warfare, up to the closing day of the Republican National Convention; awaiting then the action of the Democratic Convention, and governing our political course by the then existing political conditions. We declare that, in our judgment, the best intelligence and the highest patriotism of the nation agree with us in this estimate of the situation.

The Philadelphia Press gives the following interview with George William Curtis upon this topic. He says in regard to Grant's nomination:

"I think it would be unwise both for himself and for the party. He would gain nothing by it, even if he could be elected. The party would lose by it. The nomination would certainly be inexpedient—in my judgment the most inexpedient that the party could make. It would provoke the resistance—passive resistance at least—of a large and powerful class of Republicans whose coöperation has been demonstrated to be essential to the party's success next year. The fall State elections showed that it is necessary for the Republicans to carry New York next year in order to elect their President. It is difficult for the Republicans to carry New York at any time. It has been proved beyond doubt that it is exceedingly difficult for the party to carry the State with machine nominations. Grant's nomination would render the success of the party in this State extremely problematical. It would be a machine nomination."

"Would his election be opposed by any other class of Republicans?" "Yes; I think it would be opposed by another class of Republicans whose prejudices against a third term are stronger than even that other prejudice against the machine. There can be no doubt that a great body of the very best Republicans have a deep and incredible feeling against a third term. So strong and general is this feeling that it has created a custom against third terms. It can not be denied that the feeling is deep and wholesome. There is no reason at present for trying to overthrow it. Grant's election is not necessary. It is not sought on any good grounds of public policy. It is not urged to accomplish any needed national object. It is not suggested as a means to secure any desirable thing that can not be just as well secured by the election of any other nominee. There is, in fact, neither reason nor occasion for it. Then why attempt it?"

The Charleston News and Courier, speaking of Grant's candidacy, says:

"Some of the most influential newspapers in the country will oppose him. When he is a candidate, the shortcomings and faults of his administration, from 1869 to 1877, will be recalled and exposed. The respectable and thoughtful voters of the North and West—such voters as scratched Cornell in New York—have no liking for General Grant, and they will not vote for him if the Democracy offer them a better man."

The correspondent of the New York Graphic, a strong Grant paper, writing from Philadelphia, says:

"Public opinion is by no means unanimous, even in Philadelphia, for Grant. I heard many Republicans, like A. T. Goshorn, M. Hall Stanton, Galusha A. Grow, Edward McPherson, and Mayor Harrison, of Cleveland, express their fear that the General was being led away from his own equivoque by over-interested friends. I am satisfied that Grant desires to be, and expects to be, President. If he did not, every strong feeling would have made him speak ere now. His silence can only have one interpretation. Governor Hoyt told me that General Grant would not allow his political friends to be committing themselves for him, and therefore against other candidates, if he expected to desert them."

A correspondent of the Iowa Tribune writes as follows:

"The local prestige of Presidential possibilities is a subject of interest, even at this early stage of the contest. The choice will probably be Grant, Blaine, or Sherman. A new man may capture the nomination, but this outcome is extremely doubtful after the experiment of 1876. The writer will briefly attempt to define Iowa's popular preference. The assumption that General Grant is the favorite is an erroneous one. It arises from heeding the clamor of politicians, rather than from close attention to the voice of the people. Our people honor him as a military hero and twice successful Presidential candidate, but he is not the favorite now. The depth of esteem Iowa people entertain for him is immeasurable; but he has enjoyed a full measure of honor, and should be content. The Republicans of this State are not for Grant for the Presidency, nor would his candidacy inspire old-time enthusiasm."

A correspondent writing from Washington to the Baltimore American thus expresses himself:

"Among close observers of political events, the general sentiment is that the opposition to the third-term movement is so intense and profound among our foreign-born citizens, and especially the Germans, that the nomination of General Grant is, in their opinion, daily becoming less probable. Mr. Richard Smith, of the Cincinnati Gazette, who has been here for several days, expresses himself freely on the subject, and his views have had very great weight among leading Republicans. Mr. Smith makes the important declaration that the German Republicans in Ohio are so hostile to a third term that if Grant were nominated they would go off from the party in a body, and the State would be carried by the Democrats. This was not because they disliked Grant, but because of a strong prejudice against Imperialism, in the direction of which they thought a third term pointed. Mr. Smith observes further that, in talking with the editors of Republican journals who have not taken public position on the question of candidates, he has found that they are, almost without exception, opposed to General Grant's nomination."

"Mr. Smith has discovered that the opposition to Gen. Grant as a candidate is not based on personal grounds, and does not arise either from a personal dislike of him, or because the success of some other candidate is desired; but rather on the ground that it is not believed he would prove a strong candidate, and principally for the reasons assigned above."

"Mr. Keyes, of Wisconsin, Chairman of the Republican State Committee, says that he regards the renomination of Grant as a hazardous experiment. Mr. Enos, a member of the National Committee, from Wisconsin, agrees with Mr. Keyes, and adds that the Germans of Wisconsin are as hostile to a third term as the Germans of Ohio. Mr. Root, the Illinois member of the National Committee, deems Grant's nomination as dangerous. Mr. Martin, of Kansas, and Mr. Stone, of Iowa, also members of the committee from their respective States, are afraid Grant would be defeated by the loss of Ohio and other States where the German and foreign vote decides the result. The notable circumstance that among the leaders of the Grant movement are to be found names that the public can never regard but with aversion has also tended to weaken the cause. Such is the expressed feeling of prominent Republicans here on this question."

A St. Louis dispatch to the Associated Press is as follows:

"The statement that Secretary Schurz has obtained a controlling interest in the Westliche Post, of this city, attracts considerable attention, because of the supposed indication afforded that the Secretary intends to remain a permanent factor in Missouri politics, and as also indicating St. Louis as the probable headquarters of the anti-Grant wing of the Republican party. There is an organized group here, headed by ex-Senator Henderson, opposed to Grant openly, and it is surmised that, with the Post under Schurz's absolute control, an effort will be made to combine the German-Republican influence with that of this group of politicians to control the Missouri delegation to the National Convention."

MEDITATIONS OF A HINDOO PRINCE.

A Correct Translation of a Remarkable Poem.

All the world over, I wonder, in lands that I never have trod,
Are the people eternally seeking for the signs and the steps of a God?
Westward across the ocean, and northward beyond the snow,
Do they all stand gazing, as ever, and what do the wisest know?

Here in the mystical India, the deities hover and swarm
Like the wild bees heard in the tree-tops, or the gusts of a gathering storm;
In the air men hear their voices, their feet on the rocks are seen,
Yet we all say, "Whence is the message, and what may the wonders mean?"

A million shrines stand open, and ever the censer swings,
As they bow to a mystic symbol or the figures of ancient kings;
And the incense rises ever, and rises the endless cry
Of those who are heavy laden, and of cowards loth to die.

For the Destiny drives us together, like deer in a pass of the hills,
Above is the sky, and around us the sound and the shot that kills;
Pushed by a Power we see not, and struck by a hand unknown,
We pray to the trees for shelter, and press our lips to a stone.

The trees wave a shadowy answer, and the rock frowns hollow and grim,
And the form and the nod of the demon are caught in the twilight dim;
And we look to the sunlight falling afar on the mountain crest,
Is there never a path runs upward to a refuge there and a rest?

The path, ah! who has shown it, and which is the faithful guide?
The haven, ah! who has known it? for steep is the mountain side.
For ever the shot strikes surely, and ever the wasted breath
Of the praying multitude rises, whose answer is only death.

Here are the tombs of my kinsfolks, the first of an ancient name,
Chiefs who were slain on the war-field, and women who died in the flame;

They are gods, these kings of the foretime, they are spirits who guard our race,
Ever I watch and worship; they sit with a marble face.

And the myriad idols around me, and the legion of muttering priests,
The revels and the riots unholly, the dark unspeakable feasts!
What have they wrung from the silence? Hath even a whisper come
Of the secret—Whence and Whither? Alas, for the gods are dumb.

Shall I list to the word of the English, who come from the uttermost sea?

"The secret, hath it been told you, and what is your message to me?"
It is naught but the wide-world story, how the earth and the heavens began,

How the gods are glad and angry, and the Deity once was man.

I had thought, "Perchance in the cities where the rulers of India dwell,
Whose orders flash from the far land, who girdle the earth with a spell,
They have fathomed the depths we float on, or measured the unknown main."

Sadly they turn from the venture, and say that the quest is vain.

Is life, then, a dream and delusion, and where shall the dreamer awake?
Is the world seen like shadows on water, and what if the mirror break?
Shall it pass as a camp that is struck, as a camp that is gathered and gone,

From the sands that were lamp-lit at eve and at morning are level and lone?

Is there naught in the heaven above, whence the hail and the levin are hurled,

But the wind that is swept around us by the rush of the rolling world?
The wind that shall scatter my ashes, and bear me to silence and sleep,
With the dirge, and sounds of lamenting, and voices of women who weep?

A. C. LYALL.

THE LADIES OF PERU.

Some of their Peculiarities Described by a Lady of San Francisco.

LIMA, November 2, 1879.

Lima lies in a broad, beautiful valley, seven miles from the Pacific coast, at the base of the Andes, and occupies both banks of the Pimac. It has a population of one hundred and fifty thousand. The streets are narrow, crossing at right angles—some paved with rubble-stone from the coast. The houses are generally built of adobe, plastered on the outside, and stained yellow, green, blue, slate, fawn color, etc., with windows, blinds, cornices, and mouldings. They are from one to two stories in height, with flat roofs, and balconies from the second floor. Some have a mirador, or lookout, on the roof. A large double door opens in front, with an iron-grated window on each side, projecting on to the narrow sidewalk. Within is an open court, in some houses laid with marble, but usually with flat stone or rubble. A corridor extends around the inside from each floor. The various apartments of the house open into the court and on the corridors. There are no fire-places in Peruvian dwellings, although during a portion of the year—from May till November—much discomfort is felt from a damp, chilly atmosphere.

There is a general impression that it does not rain in Peru, and that thunder and lightning are never known. It does not rain at Lima, but there are two well-marked seasons, the wet and the dry, the former corresponding to our summer, the latter to our winter. In time of the wet season a foreigner never walks the streets without earnestly longing for a good pouring rain, to wash away the slippery mud and make the proud Peruvians raise umbrellas and put on water-proofs and overshoes, which they never do, though their clothing may be thoroughly saturated with the drizzling mist, with no fires to warm or dry them!

Lima is called the paradise of women. They are called beautiful; so they are, if you admire their black eyes and ebony tresses—not the dreamy black eyes of the harems, nor the sparkling black eyes of the Syrians, nor the liquid black eyes of the Egyptians, but the black eyes that easily reveal the different types of character. Peruvian ladies have character, and are not afraid to show it; yet we hear nothing of equal rights and privileges among them. For them to lay claim to a right is but to possess it, for they can easily win over the priesthood, and thus have the most powerful class in Peru on their side. They are generally occupied, but do not work; they look upon labor as degrading. They rise early, take a cup of tea, and go to mass. Their toilet requires but a few moments. Their walking suits are neat and pretty; in this respect they surpass us. The dress is black, and never touches the ground; there is no fussing or fumbling with trains. A white skirt is sometimes seen a little below the dress, with a deep hem and two tucks, and always white and clean. Prunella gaiters are generally worn; the hands are bare; the manta is thrown over the head, falling gracefully to the bottom of the skirt. The manta, not being used with us, needs some description.

By way of illustration, let us take one of the large silk shawls, with deep fringes, that were worn in the States several years ago; dye it black; then on one side, about a yard from one corner, remove half a yard of fringe, and put in its place a piece of black lace about two inches deep; we now have a manta. It is the manta that gives the charm to Spanish ladies in the eyes of foreign men; they always praise it; they always speak of the manta whenever they mention the beauty of the women. It has undoubtedly this advantage: it may conceal many defects of a face that is not handsome, and it sets off to advantage the charms of a beautiful face. To drape one's self gracefully in a manta is an art that must be studied. It is first thrown over the head; the lace is brought down on the forehead, sometimes dropping over the eyes. It is fastened so as to draw around the neck; the long end is carried over the left shoulder, and pinned so as to fall down in a fold on the left side. The left hand is concealed, but the right holds either a prayer-book and rosary or a parasol. A lady never goes out alone; two or three go together, and a black woman-servant walks behind. Young girls are carefully escorted by their friends wherever they go, and are never permitted to see the persons of the opposite sex alone. The matches are made by the older people, and so effectually is this done that the ladies all marry, and none are divorced.

The subject of dress claims the most of their time and attention: their ball dresses, and opera and soirée suits, are magnificent. Their boots, especially, are beautiful. No people have naturally as small feet as the Peruvians. The Peruvian-made boots are too small for foreigners. They explain the fact of their feet being so small in a very indefinite way: "We descend from the Incas, and they had small feet." "What was the cause of the Incas' feet being so small?" "Because they descended from the Chinese." "Were not your ancestors Spanish?" "Yes, they were Spanish;" and again the question of the small feet reverts to the Incas and aborigines of Peru.

Peruvian ladies are not very intelligent; as soon as they pass beyond the school-girl period they care little for books or literature. Many learn to play the piano when young, but do not care to continue when married. They are excessively courteous in their manners, but we are not to be misled by appearances. Their mode of salutation is more of an embrace than anything else, and they always say: "My house and all that I have is entirely at your disposal, and we are to be as one family." They are always wealthy in imagination—at least they never speak of poverty. They love to smoke. Although handsome when young, they scarcely turn twenty when they begin to fade. One thing always lasts with them, and that is their gait. Their movements are gliding and graceful, and the same is true of the men. Although the streets of Lima are narrow, and the sidewalks cramped, you are jostled less by the passing throng in three months in Lima than you would be in three days in London, or New York, or San Francisco. Go into the densest crowd in the market or on the plaza, and still the same is true. Conversation among the ladies generally turns upon domestic affairs; instead of asking a foreigner about her own country, and other countries that she has visited, they ask what her name is now (although they have been properly introduced), what her name was before her marriage, how old she is, how long she has been married, if she has any children, the names and ages of each, how long she has been speaking Spanish, what she thinks of Lima, etc. It is esteemed fortunate among them to have a family, for here comes in one prominent feature in their domestic life.

When a child is christened sponsors officiate, called the compadre (godfather), and comadre (godmother). They bind themselves to support, educate, and protect the child, the same as one of their own, if the parents die or are unable to take care of it. In its essential features the system is an excellent one; it provides for children, and brings many families into close friendship and sympathy, enlarging the circle of their acquaintance, and strengthening their influence. It is so common for everybody to have children, either of their own or those of some one else, that even the priesthood is not exempt; a nephew or niece may be the object of a padre's special protection. The system is too complicated to be thoroughly explained in this letter. The ladies are good at shopping and making bargains; they never tire, or find a thing too trivial to occupy their time; they are never in haste; there is always a mañana (to-morrow), and then another. Call a laundress, and she promises to return your clothes in eight days, never sooner, except at the steam laundries, where the price is about one-third the value of an ordinary garment. Eight days pass—the laundress does not appear. She must then be looked after. The things are not ready, she says, but come to-morrow—and to-morrow means another week. By the time that she fully understands that you are in a hurry for your clothes she says you can have them sure este noche (this evening), but she raises her price about threefold. Take your clothes, and pay the price agreed upon, no more. The same delays may be expected in all business transactions with the Peruvians. In making any purchase everything must either be bargained for, or two or three times the value will be demanded. If a lady wears a hat and is well-dressed, when she goes shopping or into the market, a price is at once set upon her head. In this respect, however, the Peruvians do not differ from other nations. Everywhere dress, rank, and nationality must alike be paid for. To the point is the following anecdote:

A sovereign passing through a town in Holland was charged $50 for two eggs. On this he said that eggs were surely scarce in that town. "No," replied the landlord, "but kings are."

When his wife died, Mr. Dante Gabriel Rossetti was so wretched that he felt his own intellectual life was at an end, and in her grave he burned all the sonnets he had written, and which, by the way, were addressed to her. His friends resolved that the poems should not be lost, opened the grave and rescued them; and after a time revealing to the poet that they were in existence, persuaded him to print them.

A personal call ought to insure a meeting, if only for a moment. A mere formal reminder of one's return to town ought to pass through the post or through a messenger. Persons have no right to expect "calls" from busy and intelligent friends nowadays, unless they devote an at-home day to their convenience.

LITERATURE.

Flowers of the Sky is the title which, with his fatal weakness for the sensational, Mr. Richard A. Proctor has selected for his newest book on astronomy. Mr. Proctor's notion of what is interesting in his science could hardly be adequately conveyed, by the way, if our notation did not run up into the billions. When Mr. Proctor has explained that an express train shot out of a cannon would require ten quadrillions of years to get from the Hudson River Railroad Depot to the hither boundary of the orbit of Sirius he sleeps the sleep of contentment.

A French critic endeavors to show that the character of "Colonel Newcome" was stolen by Thackeray from Balzac's "Le Colonel Chabert," in the Comédie Humaine. It is difficult—and perhaps unnecessary—to make a Frenchman understand that anything good in English literature is not lifted out of French literature. There are justifications for this view.

Alphonse Daudet—after Victor Hugo the most conspicuous figure in contemporary French literature—is described as over forty, handsome, with blue eyes and blonde hair, kindly, charming in his manners, and heartily liked by his friends. He writes pretty well, too.

Mr. Edmund Yates is about to publish for the first time his version of his quarrel with Thackeray, twenty years ago, which led to Yates's expulsion from the Garrick Club. Yates not only did not dare to give "his version" of it until Thackeray was dead, but prudently waited until he was also decayed.

Ginx's Baby (otherwise known as Mr. Edward Jenkins, M. P.) is going to read his own works. Unfortunately he has decided to read them "before folks."

Mr. Edmund W. Gosse, himself a poet, says of Mr. E. C. Stedman: "His poetry is fresh and buoyant, full of the memories of great deeds and joyous experiences." The same is true of the poetry of Hans Breitmann.

Porter & Coates issue in pamphlet form six letters of the Hon. William D. Kelley, written last summer to the Philadelphia Times during a trip to Europe. We are not appraised of Mr. Kelley's action in the matter, but presume he has not had the weakness to omit the famous "interview" with Prince Bismarck on the silver question. Bismarck having "branded" it as altogether a lie, it has now a certain importance and value which it had not before he deigned to notice it.

The American Hebrew is publishing an English translation of a portion of the Talmud. This, we believe, is the first time any considerable portion has been translated.

Mr. Swinburne's new book, A Study of Shakspeare, should be popular with the Nevada newspapers. It is a thesaurus of abuse. From its pages might be compiled a copious dictionary of vilification. The objects of Mr. Swinburne's vituperation are other students of Shakspeare, concerning whom there is little in the book, and that little is of little value.

A twelfth edition of the late George Henry Lewes's Life of Goethe has appeared in the German language. The translator adds some fresh information about the last of Goethe's loves—Ulrike von Levezow, the Bohemian lady—who is still alive. Goethe met her in 1822, when past seventy-three years of age, and her beauty so impressed him that he asked her then to become his wife. But the young lady concluded that the difference of years was too great even for her to marry the prince of German poets, and accordingly declined.

A letter of Byron, now for the first time published—at least we do not remember it—is dated Athens, November, 1810, and contains the following characteristic passage: "My works are likely to have a powerful effect with a vengeance, as I hear of divers angry people whom it is proper I should shoot at by way of satisfaction. Be it so. The same impulse which made 'Otho a warrior' will make me one also. My domestic affairs being, moreover, considerably deranged, my appetite for traveling pretty well satiated with my late peregrinations, my various hopes in this world almost extinct, and not very brilliant in the next, I trust I shall go through the process with a creditable sang froid, and not disgrace a line of cut-throat ancestors."

When N. P. Willis visited England in the summer of 1839, he announced in his journal, the Corsair, that he had "engaged as a regular correspondent a Mr. Thackeray." When Thackeray's first letter appeared in the Corsair, the Southern Literary Messenger declared that it "could not see its sovereign merit," and added the wise remark that "Mr. Thackeray has much of the dandyism, affectation, and puerility of Mr. Willis himself." But the Southern man of letters has never been distinguished for the strength and splendor of his critical judgment.

The collected works of Théophile Gautier would fill three hundred octavo volumes, and Mr. Swinburne's good opinion of them would fill a fog-horn of exceptional calibre.

Glatigny, "the vagabond poet," was a tramp from choice. He had a theory that a poet should have but one coat, though it is but right to say that he did not always act on it, for he seldom had even one. He often got a living in cafés and casinos by writing verses for the singers, and was commonly so poor that he slept in omnibuses, police stations, under hedges, and where he could. Here are some of his lines from a poem in praise of a bohemian life:

Les poèmes inachevés,
Les chansons aux rimes hautes,
Les haltes au bord des fontaines,
Les chants et les bonheurs rêvés,
Tout prend une voix et m'invite
A recommencer le chemin.

A STUDIO STORY.

From the French.

There is an artist friend of mine who has all the talents and no talent of his own. He would copy or imitate a Greuze or a Watteau to perfection. A Diaz by him only wants the signature, which an unscrupulous dealer does not hesitate to forge. My friend, whom we will call Durand, is an excellent man, industrious and clever, but too negligent to take the initiative in anything, even in painting.

Well, he had given notice to quit his apartment last July, on the fifteenth day of the month, at noon, according to the customs of the country. He had, however, been so absorbed in his painting that he had forgotten to retain a wagon to take away his furniture; and when he did at last concern himself about the matter, he only succeeded in securing one for the end of the day.

But at noon precisely, just as he was putting the finishing touches to a copy of Greuze's famous "cruche-casse," there came an imperious knock at the door. It was the new tenant, escorted by her furniture. She was furious to find that Durand was "dawdling over his paint-brushes," while all her furniture was out in the street, exposed to the gaze of indiscreet by-passers. She even threatened to fetch the police in order to bring Durand to a sense of his duties as an outgoing tenant.

Durand, like many painters, thought the sea more charming than ever when agitated by a storm. He found some resemblance between women and the sea, from which Venus rose, and concluded that his fair visitor was rendered more charming by her anger. She was about twenty-five years of age. She had dark hair and blue eyes, a fine, nervous figure, and her rosy nostrils were slightly dilated by her emotion. She was accompanied by a little girl of six years of age—a little golden-haired cherub.

"What!" continued the irate lady. "You are not going away until five o'clock? It is absurd! What am I to do with my furniture? Where is the proprietor? I must see the proprietor!"

It was impossible to gratify her last wish. The proprietor was just buying a seventh house, according to the directions of the law regulating such matters and par devant notaire. The door-porter alone was available, but the new comer was so terrible, so aggressive, and so threatening, that Cerberus was tamed, and ran away with his tail between his legs, and left his broom behind him.

Durand ought, according to his system of imitation, to have become wrathful, too; but his adversary was a pretty woman, so he sought an ally. The little girl was playing with a shepherdess in porcelaine de Saxe that adorned one of the chimney-pieces.

"Should you like it?"

"Oh, yes; it is droll."

"Take it."

"Jeanne," said the mother, "I forbid you to accept anything."

"If it were only to please her," replied Durand, "I could understand your prohibition, but it is an economy for me. I shall have so much less to move."

Women are ready laughers. The lady fixed her eyes on the tapestry in order to keep her countenance.

"Your name is Jeanne?" said the painter.

"Yes," answered the child.

"And your father—where is he?"

"He died two years ago."

"And mamma is a widow?"

"Yes, monsieur."

Then, turning to the lady, Durand apologized for his sins, told her that he had cleared one room, and that he would go and help to get her furniture in.

Soon the furniture began to find its place—the wardrobe, the mirror, the bookcase.

"Ah, madame, without knowing you, I can read in your soul Montesquieu, Balzac, Bossuet, Hugo, Lamartine—"

"Ta, ta, ta!" cried the irate lady. "You would have done better to clear out before noon than to be trying to study my character!"

"I am working all the time, madame. Look! That console there—here the statue of the Virgin—this little mirror opposite the window—"

"Ah! it is no use; you can not make peace with me!"

There was an interval of twenty minutes, during which the lady stood at the window. Durand had remained in his room with the child.

"Are they coming to-day or to-morrow—your men?" she asked, angrily, as she came back into the room. But she stopped in the middle. Jeanne, motionless and smiling, was seated on a chair, and Durand was painting her portrait.

"Mamma," said the little one, suddenly, "I am hungry. You have some wine and a pâté in the big basket."

"Come, then, and breakfast on the balcony," murmured the mother.

Durand was left alone to finish his sketch. There was a silence of ten minutes. Then the child returned timidly.

"Mamma has something to ask you."

"What?"

"She does not dare—"

"She wants to turn me out?"

"No."

"What, then?"

"Mamma wants to know—if you—if you would like a piece of pâté."

This happened on July 15, and when the porter arrived, all trembling, to announce that the men had at last come to remove Durand's furniture, he found him sitting on the balcony at table with the mother, and dandling the child on his knees. Misfortunes, however, never come alone. The wagon was too small. It would not hold all Durand's things at once.

"Leave your pallet, your easel and pictures," said Jeanne. "I will take care of them, and then you will be obliged to come back again and finish my portrait."

He left them. He only came into possession of them yesterday, October 15, when he brought all his furniture back to his old room. This time, however, there was no difficulty about the outgoing tenant, for she had meanwhile become Durand's wife; the two households were merged into one.

ABOUT WOMEN.

A Connecticut woman was taken suddenly ill a few days ago, and when a physician arrived she asked him if she was going to die. He replied that it was nothing serious—that she might live twenty-five years longer. "Oh, I'm so glad," she exclaimed; "the Hayden trial may be finished by that time, and I'll lose none of it."

The saddest story yet told about the mania for wearing birds is that a female ornithologist, living in Philadelphia, has been obliged to go into retirement to avoid seeing bonnets on which the head of one bird, the body of another, and the tail of a third are put together, and all are decorated with beads. She says: "If my minister were to mount the pulpit in Indian war-paint, I assure you it would look no more incongruous to me than to see my neighbor in a front pew displaying on her head my favorite loxia cardinalis with blue glass bangles upon its wings. I received a nervous shock which caused me a week's sickness by the association on one bonnet of two birds which I knew were each other's natural enemies."

Among Mrs. Dinah Maria Mulock Craik's poems there is none better known than "Philip, my King." Few of those who read and are fond of this piece of verse know that the baby it glorifies is now Mr. Philip Bourke Marston, the blind poet. He is Mrs. Craik's godson.

The foolish virgin on the train sitteth and looketh out of the window. But the wise one flirteth with the conductor, and he chalketh her back.

An increased sale of corsets among the colored people of the South is mentioned as an evidence that the blacks are advancing in civilization. Wait till the watermelon season, though, and see how quickly that "boom" will burst.

This is Mary Anderson, painted in Louisville colors: "Can you imagine some drifting cloud of evening crystallized in mystic limpidness into that image of the Maker that we call humanity—pellucid, lit with azure fire? It may suggest a dream of that vision of loveliness which I have seen, and which shattered one's soul to pieces. Tall, slender—but slender like one of those threads of steel that carry trains across Niagara—a step as graceful as the wild-cat's; and that neck! aspiring as the Alexandrian shaft that lifted Pharos to light up the sea—commanding as the tower of ivory that looketh toward Damascus."

Arthur Sullivan says Boston women are the handsomest in the world. That's what he says in Boston.

The Reno Gazette says that Mrs. Grant discovered in that town the prettiest girl she had seen in all her travels. The girl has now left Reno, however; she had "stopped off" at the station to get dinner, on her way from San Francisco to visit a sick aunt in Virginia City.

Twenty ladies "chipped in" and bought some lottery tickets. One of them told her minister, and he was shocked. "My dear madame," he exclaimed, "do you not know that is gambling?" She rattled right along as if she hadn't heard him: "Yes, we are going to draw the thirty thousand dollar prize, and if we do—then we've all agreed to give you five thousand of it for the new church organ." "An excellent idea, my dear madame; excellent, and I devoutly trust you may win it."

A lady in Cambridge, who lives alone, was somewhat startled the other day by a man who came to the door, and, without assigning any reason for his coming, began a series of questions: "Who lives here?" etc. "Any man in the house?" he continued. "No." "Do you keep a dog?" "No." At this point, fearing she had put herself in the villain's power, the defenceless lady added: "But I keep a pistol." The man started in astonishment for an instant, and beat a hasty retreat. He was a tax collector, and now he is firmly opposed to woman suffrage.

He called upon Anastasia last Wednesday evening. The conversation languished, and finally she said, thoughtfully: "I don't like these white duck belts: they show finger marks so plainly." Then she added hastily, "That is—of course—in dancing, I mean." Then her brother winked at him, and said something about the "sofa he guesses;" but he didn't notice it, because Anastasia asked him if it wasn't time to get up a coasting party.

Sarah Bernhardt is said to sleep in her own coffin. If our sleeping chamber in a hotel adjoined Sarah's, we would rather she would be sleeping in her coffin than coughing in her sleep.

French history in the past hundred years exhibits three women who have perhaps experienced more splendor and more bitter grief and mortification than any other three women in the world—Marie Antoinette, Josephine, and Eugénie. But none of them took to lemonade, like Mrs. Hayes.

A young gentleman, by no means obscure in New York social circles, called at a leading hotel, and, with characteristic dignity, handed his card to the polite clerk with instructions to send it to Miss —'s room. The young man sat down and awaited with considerable anxiety the return of the bell-boy. Presently the lad came down the stairway, and, shuffling into the office, remarked to the clerk, in a voice loud enough to reach all who were sitting round, while his face was illuminated with a broad grin, "Please Mr. —, Miss — told me to say that she was not in." They do these things better in Frisco.

Moore, in a note to one of his Irish melodies, tells us that during the reign of Bryan, King of Munster, a young lady of great beauty, richly dressed, and adorned with jewels, undertook a journey from one end of the kingdom to another with a wand in her hand, at the top of which was a ring of exceeding great value; and such was the perfection of the laws and the government that no attempt was made upon her honor, nor was she robbed of her clothes and jewels.

Nellie Johnson, of St. Louis, is a diminutive woman, who weighs only fifty pounds. Nevertheless, being insulted by a young man in the street, the other day, she whipped out a pocket knife and plunged the blade into his breast. He escaped with his life only because it was a small blade, not at all because she was a small woman.

THE OTHER POETS.

Winter-Green.

To-day the winter woods are wet
And chill with airs that miss the sun;
The autumn of the year is done.
Its leaves all fallen, its flower-stars set,
Its frosty hours begun.

Should last year's gold narcissus yearn
For next year's roses, oh! how vain!
No brief dead flowers arise again,
But each sweet little life in turn.
Must shoot and bloom and wane.

Sweet, had the years that slip so fast
Brought you too soon or me too late,
How had we gnashed our teeth at fate,
And wandered down to death at last
Forlorn, disconsolate!

Surely before the stars were sure,
Before the moon was set in heaven,
Your unborn soul to mine was given,
Your clear white spirit, rare and pure,
For me was formed and shriven.

Ah! surely no time ever was
When we were not; and our soul's light
Made those cold spaces infinite
That lie between the years like glass,
Seen only in God's sight!

Howe'er it be, my one desire,
If chance has brought us face to face,
Or if the scheme of things found place
To store our twin hearts' light and fire
In strange foreseeing grace—

Howe'er it be, for us at least
The woodland pathways are not dark,
New lights are on the boughs and bark,
And in the rainless sunshout east
We hear a mounting lark.

—Edmund W. Gosse.

Kisses.

Give me kisses—do not stay,
Counting in that careful way;
All the coins your lips can print
Never will exhaust the mint.

Kiss me, then,
Every moment, and again!

Give me kisses—do not stop,
Measuring nectar by the drop;
Though to millions they amount,
They will never drain the fount.

Kiss me, then,
Every moment, and again!

Give me kisses—all is waste,
Save the luxury we taste;
And for kissing—kisses live
Only when we take or give.

Kiss me, then,
Every moment, and again!

Give me kisses—though their worth
Far exceeds the gems of earth,
Never pearls so rich and pure
Cost so little, I am sure.

Kiss me, then,
Every moment, and again!

Give me kisses—nay, 'tis true,
I am just as rich as you;
And for every kiss I owe
I can pay you back, you know.

Kiss me, then,
Every moment, and again!

N'importe.

"What if but yesterday
I laughed, and said him nay,
When here's to-day, to-day
To change my mind and say
A sweeter word than nay."

"What if but yesterday
I told him that my nay
Could never turn to yea,
Though he should pray and pray
Forever and a day."

"What if but yesterday
He swore he would obey
My cruel will, nor stay
To further sue or pray—
Then strode in wrath away."

"What if but yesterday
Like this he strode away,
When here's to-day, to-day
For him to hear me say:
'I love you, Love, to-day!'" —Norah Perry.

The Stirrup Cup.

Death, thou art a cordial old and rare;
Look, how compounded, with what care!
Time got his wrinkles reaping thee
Sweet herbs from all antiquity.

David to thy distillage went,
Keats and Gotama excellent,
Omar Khayyam, and Chaucer bright,
And Shakspeare for a king's delight.

These were to sweeten thee with song;
The blood of heroes made thee strong;
What, heroes! Ah, for shame, for shame!
The worthiest died without a name.

Then, Time, let not a drop be split;
Hand me the cup when'er thou wilt;
If death such dear distillation be,
I'll drink it down right smilingly.

—Sidney Lanier.

Paris petticoats are coming to be as remarkable as that which the young men of a certain congregation once united to sew for their beloved female pastor. One of them, which was lately displayed to a correspondent, was made of peacock-blue satin, with large dog-beetle points which fell over five rows of plaitings, lined with second plaitings made of gold-colored silk, which were finished by three rows of plaited or ruffled white lace—a veritable cloud of gauze.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 10, 1880.

The Republicans have organized both branches of the Legislature. The Governor is inaugurated. The address of the Speaker of the Assembly, the message of his excellency the Governor, closed in promises of good conduct. The Republican party is responsible for the next four years of administration of political affairs. This is an important period in the history of the State. A new Constitution is adopted, and it is one that takes some new departures. It is, to a degree, an experiment, but an experiment in the direction of reform. Having been adopted by the people, it is the law, and it has the right to be generously interpreted in the spirit of the principles that passed it. The Republican party promised to do this at its State Convention. Its candidates for office, its orators, and its press, all gave promises in the same direction. It is undoubtedly true that if the party had not so pledged itself, and the people had not relied upon an honest fulfillment of this resolve, the "New Constitution party" would have swept the State by an overwhelming majority. We shall expect from the Legislature and all its Republican members an honest and earnest effort to give us laws in harmony with the spirit of the new organic law.

Present at the Capital during the organization of the Legislature, the writer came away having most favorable impressions of the personnel and character of its members. The Senate did not make so favorable an impression as did the members of the lower house. We should guess that there were more of ability, dignity, and general legislative competency in the larger body. Nearly all are new members; there were few present of whom we can ascertain that they have any political record. We speak of this not as detracting from, but rather as adding to, our good opinion of the character of the Legislature. The writer sat in the Assembly chamber while its members took the oath of office. He was ashamed of our San Francisco delegation; he always is. Its members—excepting two or three—looked like well-dressed fire Jakes out at a picnic or clamhake—a very "ornery" lot. We hope their ignorance may make them modest, and their individual ambitions to go to Congress may prompt them to a severe effort at keeping their mouths shut on all important occasions. The country members pleased us vastly. We think we know enough of faces to successfully prophesy that a good, sound working majority from the interior is composed of sensible, dignified, intelligent, and honest-minded gentlemen—enough to save San Francisco from the consequences of its own folly in sending uneducated, irresponsible, propertyless adventurers to legislate for its vast interests. If it were not for the country members, San Francisco, its property and its people, its commerce and its manufactures, would have gone to the devil years ago. It is too soon to suggest what Senators or Members will develop into leaders in either branch of the Legislature. We could name, even thus early, some few who will come out as pronounced idiots; they will disclose themselves as talking jumping-jacks very early in the session. They will spring to their feet with a sort of automatic jerk at every opportunity. They will be pronounced economists in stationery and small items of legislative expenditure; they will be harking watch-dogs of the Treasury, but will never bite when some great, red-handed, colossal thief plunges his arms elbow deep into the people's pocket. That provision of the new Constitution is an admirable one which provides that no law shall pass except by a majority of all the members upon roll-call; and it is a happy provision that the vote of the silent, reflective member counts one, while that of the noisy and galloping jackdaw of debate counts no more.

We shall not expect to find at this session of the Legislature that jealous feeling sometimes apparent between the country and the city. Our city of San Francisco is (in the Assembly) so powerless and so utterly at the mercy of the members of the interior, that we shall hope its very unprotected condition may incite their sympathy and arouse the better and more generous feelings of its members. Our wealth, our great commerce, our three hundred thousand people, our public institutions, our industries, our vast and varied interests, are represented at the capital by men mostly destitute of experience and of learning. Most of them are propertyless, some of them are characterless, and some of them are mere adventurers, without the feeling and patriotism that comes from birth upon the soil. It is our shame and our calamity that this condition of things exists. It is our misfortune that behind the larger part of the San Francisco delegation there stands no intelligent and deeply interested constituency to demand of it faithful and honest legislation; that it is the party of an hour. Hence we say to Democrats, and to New Constitutionalists, and to Republicans of the interior, that San Francisco looks to them for protection. This sweeping estimate of what is known as the Workingmen's party has its reservation: there are several members of the Legislature who owe their advancement to it for whom we have great respect, and to whom we look for both intelligent and honest legislation; but they are not the men who may be seen dodging around the corners of the street with alien demagogues and political adventurers at Sacramento, or who in San Francisco spend idle and profligate lives in avoiding work. We commend to the country Workingman that when he is introduced to the sand-lot statesman, or the sand-lot lobbyist, that he feel his palm to ascertain if it is calloused with bones.

There is no class that is so well entitled to be esteemed honorable as the one that works. We mean as the one that, with its strong muscle and patient will, toils at manual labor for a day's wages. The labor of the brain brings its honors of position, and its emoluments that give the enjoyment of later ease, of culture, and of travel. The man that accepts in humility God's curse of daily toil, and does his duty manfully, and in performance of this duty aids to maintain a good wife and bring up the children she has borne him to manhood and womanhood, industrious, virtuous, God-fearing, and law-abiding, is entitled to be esteemed honorable; he is entitled to be considered respectable; he is to be treated as wise and good men treat good and honest men. His class is the foundation upon which is reared the social and political fabric. He is the stone upon which, in this land, the temple of republican liberty rests. He produces all the wealth, and when wealth is accumulated it is useless unless he continues to labor. Without him there would be no law, no government, no religion, no civilization, no society. The rich man's accumulations would turn to ashes, and the learned man would starve, unless the working man toiled continuously on. Therefore the Government, the church, the class, or the individual that ill treats labor or withholds from it all its just dues, is either cruel and cowardly, knavish or idiotic, or mad. God in his wisdom gives to a large class only one means of subsistence, and that is by the exercise of their unskilled physical labor; and society is so ordered that a laborer's daily bread, and that of his wife and children, oftentimes depends upon his daily toil. He must have work and adequate wages, or be and they will starve. When this alternative is presented, organized society must provide him with labor. There is no answer to be given when the palm of the man who is willing to work extends itself and asks for bread, other than to give him labor to earn his bread. To give bread without labor is to encourage idleness and mendicancy; to refuse the opportunity of labor is a brutal and selfish denial for which society is always punished, and always ought to be. The men of brains get the wealth of other men's labors and their own. Society is only an organized trust to dispense fairly and honestly the proceeds of labor. It is the working man's due to have employment, and out of employment enough to maintain himself and those who—being unable, by infirmity of years, or infancy, to toil—are dependent upon him. There is always something to do, and if there is not, labor must be found. The monuments of the prehistoric age—the Pyramids of Egypt, all the great works of antiquity—were built upon the recognition of this demand. Napoleon recognized it in his Parisian work, and no statesman is ignorant of this known factor in ruling a state that has a redundant population. If the time when despots may resort to war in order to give employment and divert the minds of dangerous classes from disturbing the state has not altogether passed away, still such a remedy is no remedy in a republican country. It is not even a temporary relief, and is always followed by taxes, burdens, and kindred oppressions that aggravate the evil it seeks to cure.

The proposed condemnation of Lake Merced for the purpose of supplying the city of San Francisco with water is, in our judgment, a deliberate, well-matured, and criminal attempt to get money from the tax-payers without an adequate equivalent. We do not believe that the Rancho de la Merced and its waters are worth one-half the money that Mr. Mahoney and his associates seek to get for them. We do not believe that there is any individual or corporation that would pay for Mr. Mahoney's interest in that property the quarter of one million of dollars, if the individual or corporation was compelled to bring the water to this city for sale. It is not proved by any disinterested scientific person that the lake will produce four millions of gallons of water daily. The Spring Valley Company owns the west side of the lake from its waters to the ocean; it owns the outlet on both sides; it owns land, and has established pumping works and used them now for three years. Mr. Mahoney never claimed to be the exclusive owner of the lake, and the boundary line of his ranch runs through it. He owns no part of the outlet, and, so far as we know, he never appropriated the waters for public use by notice and by taking the necessary legal steps, while the Spring Valley Company did do this thing some three or four years ago. The fact then is, that Mr. Mahoney is the owner and tenant in common of a lake the waters of which he has no right to take out or divert except for domestic purposes; that the whole volume of water is not one-third of the present requirement of the city. He has no pumping works, machinery, or mode of distribution. He asks for this one and a half millions of dollars, and offers to sell it to San Francisco that it may be held as a stuffed cluh over the head of the Spring Valley Water Company. Its waters never will be, and never ought to be, brought into this city, because neither in quantity nor quality will they answer the purpose. As to quality, it is inferior; and the answer to this proposition, that Spring Valley used it on one occasion, is met by stating the fact that three million gallons of Merced water was mixed with six million of Spring Valley water. When this lake is purchased, what will the city do with it? Will another job of erecting pumping works and laying distributing pipes grow out of it? Shall we have a system of municipal water works to be run by politicians? To purchase Mr. Mahoney's undivided interest in the waters of this lake is but the beginning of an extravagant and profligate expenditure of money, and but the beginning of an endless and costly litigation. If the city buy this water the Spring Valley Water Company will enjoin its use, and, in our opinion, will make such injunction perpetual. When the Spring Valley Water Company began to pump at Lake Merced there was afforded Mr. Mahoney and his associates a good opportunity to test the question whether or not they were the sole owners of its waters. They did not do it. We believe they dared not do it, because we think they are not the sole owners of the waters of Lake Merced, nor can alone control their disposition.

Lake Merced is on a large scale what Washerwoman's Bay was on a smaller one. The lake, though further removed from the business centre than the laguna, is still within the city limits. Lake Merced is on the very level of the ocean; the laguna (Washerwoman's Bay) was some fifty feet in elevation; each was the receptacle of drainage. When we first knew the laguna it was a body of clear water, fed by a bold spring. In after years it became an offensive cess-pool, and was filled and drained, at great expense, by the city, as a sanitary measure, under the direction of the Board of Health. The Merced drains an area of some seven square miles, over which the city must inevitably extend unless the entire area is to be purchased by the city and kept unoccupied for the purpose of catchment. When the city does so extend, there is no plan within reasonable expenditure that can keep these waters clear. The waters of the lake will in time become stagnant and impure, and will demand to be drained or be thrown into open communication with the ocean. If this lake and its surrounding lands could, at a reasonable price, be purchased for a park and pleasure grounds, it would be well; but for ultimate use as a water-supply we believe it will be valueless. It is a strange fact that Mr. Mahoney, his friends, his creditors, and his hirelings, are the only people that seek to compel the city to take it. It looks like a job; and if we did not know that Mr. Mahoney, H. A. Cobb, Wm. F. White, Geo. Purdy, Messrs. Green, Fitch, and others were entirely above even the shadow of a suspicion of interested motives, we should suspect the existence of a conspiracy to sell this property to a city whose people don't want it, for an exorbitant price. We suggest to Messrs. H. Cobb & Co., Commissioners, and to Messrs. Schottler, Mason, Drake, Whitney, Fraser, Doane, and Bayly, Supervisors, that if this job gets through there will be a divided opinion in this community with regard to their official and personal integrity.

The message of Governor Perkins is an admirable document. It considers practical questions and makes practical suggestions, exhibits thought, and is dignified. It is an able State paper, and in marked contrast with most of our political manifestoes. Coming to us too late for extended comment this week, it shall be referred to again in discussion of the important questions treated of in it.

The gifted young Republican statesman by the name of Hardy, who kindly consented to allow the party to send him as its representative to Sacramento, disappointed those party friends who do not know him, by his somewhat boastful and vainglorious attitude of independence. He refused to coöperate with his thirty-six Republican associates in the election of Speaker. We are glad to know, however, that the wheel went round, notwithstanding the weight of this very small political fly.

AFTERMATH.

We tried very hard to think that Governor Garcelon was making an honest effort to purify the ballot-box of Maine. He is a man of advanced years, a good lawyer, and of honorable record, and we were not willing to look upon his attempt as a deliberate one to "Mexicanize" American politics. But in view of the curious fact that all the errors and omissions, all the mistakes and accidents, and all that was attributable to carelessness or crime, occurred in those districts where Republicans had a majority, makes us pause in our charitable estimate of this venerable Democrat. In fact, it rather looks as though this Maine Returning Board had not been guiltless of fraud and gross abuse of discretion in its endeavor to exact rigid conformity to critical rules. The added fact that this board is not willing to submit to the opinion of the Supreme Judges of the State, which opinion it consented to ask, looks at least suspicious. Before this is printed other facts may be elicited, and further history be made. We prophesy, however, that there will be no civil war to break out in Maine; that the cloud will blow over, and that the blue-eyed angel of peace will spread her white wings over the Penobscot.

The city of Brooklyn seems to be singularly favored in the matter of Aldermen. At the first meeting of the new Board, Alderman Dwyer in the chair, the gentleman's brother, "Johnny," the renowned pugilist, was nominated for Clerk of the Third District Court. At this point in the proceedings a respectable member named Dimon interposed an objection to the candidate on the ground of moral character and general fitness. Mr. Dimon was promptly ruled out of order and howled down by the gallery. Mr. Dimon protested that this was all exceedingly infamous, and had the unkindness to display a hideous woodcut of the candidate as he had appeared after an encounter in the ring with a gentleman who is probably now in the State Legislature. It was all to no purpose: the gladiator was triumphantly elected, and Mr. Dimon knows what it is like to oppose the will of the people. Brooklyn is called the City of Churches, and in the intervals of official duty Mr. John Dwyer will probably confirm his hold upon the religious heart by sailing in and cleaning out the impenitent.

We are happy to renew our acquaintance with an old and familiar editorial in the Bulletin. It came out on this occasion on the pardon of Morgan, Ver Mehr, and two others by Governor Irwin. It makes its appearance on all like occasions. We like it. We like it better and better as we read it year by year. Ver Mehr ought not to have been pardoned because he was not a criminal from his cradle up; because his father, good old Christian gentleman, wanted to see him before he died; because his mother pleaded for him with a mother's love; because he had relatives and friends who were being punished by his incarceration. Such men, according to the Bulletin, ought never to be pardoned, because their offense is greater than the sin of the criminal classes. Does not the Bulletin, in its moral snivel, forget that the punishment of such men is an hundred-fold greater than that of the ordinary chronic felon who delights to make his home in the Penitentiary, and who finds his most congenial association among convicts? The Bulletin knew these men were going to be pardoned; everybody knew it. It has been an open secret for weeks. We congratulate Governor Irwin upon this act of clemency, and think he did a just and generous act.

Another view of the matter is subjoined, in order that the reader may take his choice, according to his preference for prose or verse. If there were a middle ground we should endeavor, also, to occupy that:

FOUR OF A KIND.

Said Johnson: "What's the use to irk
Ver Mehr and Morgan with hard work?
'Twere most ungracious to be hard on
The men whom Irwin means to pardon."

Said Irwin: "Plainly 'tis not fair
To hold this Morgan and Ver Mehr.
Why should we give men food and raiment
Whom Johnson won't make work in payment?"

Alas, that Johnson's plans were such
That they did nothing, he did much!
More worthy actions had been numbered
If they had wrought and he had slumbered.

The State had benefitted, too,
If, in your zeal, O Irwin, you
Had let their terms pass undisputed,
Cutting your own until it suited.

Well, Jim and Alf, and Bill and Newt,
Each doffing his official suit,
And showing up as birds of a feather,
Retire from public life together.

In reply to a correspondent we beg to say that we do, indeed, think it about time to denounce this set and concerted persecution of Duncan by the "small depositors." Duncan has about as much chance, in our opinion, of getting into the State prison as Jack Stratman has of much longer keeping out of it. No jury, it is clear, can be got to convict him; each failure to agree makes eventual agreement less likely. At his first trial there were eleven jurymen for conviction, at his last only seven. In the meantime he is kept by excessive bail in a kind of imprisonment so much worse than confinement in the penitentiary that conviction would be mercy. Duncan is old, utterly broken, bankrupt in fortune and respectability. His wife and family are suffering for the necessities of life. His punishment, with its alternations of promise and despair, its vicissitudes of hope and horror, is already greater than the offense of which he is accused. If Jack Stratman will not let go his hold on Duncan's shank, but is determined to fetch away a mouthful of tendons, Jack should have his tail twisted.

Mr. James Redpath is in this city, or has been, and has kindly undertaken to give his views of Mr. Thomas Nast, the caricaturist of Harper's Weekly, whose first cartoon, Mr. Redpath is pleased to say, "was a declaration of independence against English and Irish domination—the inauguration of American liberalism in art." It was a declaration of independence of every rule of art, too, and so was his last, and all the intermediate ones. Mr. Nast is simply not an artist. He has a keen instinct of humor, a happy knack at hitting off a likeness, a nose for political absurdities, and an almost perfect lack of even elementary knowledge of art. He can not draw at all, and if he is the exponent of "American liberalism in art"—whatever that may have the goodness to be—we really do not know whose work best represents the wide and catholic ignorance that knows no east, no west, no north, no south, no times or seasons, no national boundaries and no universal law. Mr. Nast is admirable within the limits of his capacity; he has done good work of its kind; but it is in no sense art, nor allied to art.

Mrs. Meeker publishes a "card" in which she recounts the true story of the treatment to which she and her daughter and Mrs. Price were subjected by the Utes—a story the truth of which was obvious enough from the first, without the telling. We think Mrs. Meeker would have done better to keep this heart-breaking narrative out of print and out of speech. Apart from the other and personal disadvantages of publication, it has given occasion to all the blackguards of the local and Colorado press to exalt their unpleasant voices in a concerted clamor for blood. Blood is good enough, and that of a flirtatious Ute is particularly grateful to the nostril, and its rippling flow especially pleasing to the eye. What we object to in connection with this matter is the voice of the blackguards.

Apostle Taylor—hear him shout:
"Polygamy you can't wipe out!"
We mean not, Dogma's barking pup,
To wipe it out, but wipe it up.

A large envelope marked "Department of State, U.S.A." Under this the words, "A penalty of $300 is fixed by law for using this envelope for other than official business." Contents of envelope a printed sheet; on one page a letter from Secretary Evarts to Governor McCormick, asking him if he would accept a diplomatic appointment, and tenderly mentioning his services at the Paris exposition—on the other a letter from Governor McCormick to Secretary Evarts, declining appointment. Nothing else. Is the sending of this thing to us "official business"? If not, does the man for the gratification of whose vanity it was sent owe three hundred dollars to the United States Treasury? Or will Secretary Evarts be obliging enough to pay the fine for the satisfaction of showing us his method of complimenting a man by offering him something which it is understood he is not to accept?

The wife of Mr. Jonesmith has the misfortune to be more good than beautiful. On the San Rafael boat, the other day, the writer overheard this bit of conversation: Brown-jones.—"That fellow Jonesmith is outrageously unfaithful to his wife." Smith-brown.—"For example?" Br.—"O, I don't know any particular instance." Sm.—"Ah, you are a physiognomist—you think he looks like it." Br.—"Never saw him; I think she looks like it."

That good old man, J. Madison Wells, of New Orleans, is about to be thrown upon the heartless world to shift for himself by browsing round outside of politics: his term of office as Surveyor of Customs is about to expire, and Hayes will not reappoint him. The veteran is naturally in favor of Grant, whom he considers "one of the greatest military geniuses the world ever saw," we suppose.

There has been an explosion of celluloid, with disastrous consequences, in New York. Celluloid is a kind of thing which is made into collars for dogs and hoodlums. If it will explode on their necks and send the heads of them flying into the middle of the next pic-nic season, it will perform a good and beneficent service.

There is a society lady of this city who recently walked from one of the leading hotels to South San Francisco, thence across the hills to the park, thence home to the point of starting. The distance by the route taken was at least twelve miles, yet the lady who accomplished the feat was so little tired thereby that she spent the evening in promenading the hotel corridors with some friends. Possibly there are nether

San Francisco ladies who are in the habit of making long walks and can do so with equal ease. But the habit is certainly not a fashionable one. The lady whose example has been noted is pretty enough and bright enough to set the fashion, if her name might fairly be made public. The formation of social walking clubs—limited in membership to three or four ladies and an equal number of gentlemen—would reveal to society eyes a vast amount of beautiful peninsula scenery and add a healthful supplement to the "witchery of archery" and the social opportunities of lawn tennis.

OUR SOLONS.

St. Peter, leaning o'er his gate (Opened infrequently of late,
For, heedless of what Kallioch said,
Men aped his practices instead—
Directed in the road they chose
Not by his finger, but his toes),
Had cast on earth his anxious eye,
Some upward pilgrim to descry,
But saw not one between his post
And the remote Pacific Coast.
But down upon an arid plain
That stretches inland from the main
He saw a pushing, struggling crowd
Engaged in altercation loud;
No fighting dogs e'er raised such Ned,
Nor tomcats cursing on a shed.
"Come here, R. A.," he called, and the Recording Angel ran to Peter's side, and asked, "What's up?" "Why, look!"
Said Peter, "Something for your book!
Note that unholy squabble there—
The lies and oaths that load the air!"
The Angel glanced upon the fray,
Then turned and calmly walked away.
"Oh, bother!" he remarked; "I've got
No stomach to write up that lot.
Each second year the rascals swarm
To Sacramento to perform
Some kind of circus or a show;
Immoral, doubtless—I don't know:
I've orders to ignore the rabble,
And make no entries of their gabble.
Of how they've stolen, sworn, fought, lied,
They'll find no 'record,' when they've died,
Up here, to which to 'point with pride.'"

The Senate and Assembly pay Mr. John F. Swift the compliment of its nearly unanimous indorsement to the Chinese mission. It is not yet settled, however, that Mr. Seward, the present Minister, will be recalled. There are those who profess to know that he will not be disturbed during the present administration. Mr. Swift would make a serviceable and intelligent official at the capital of China, and we should be glad of his appointment, if Mr. Seward is to withdraw.

Edison at Menlo Park bids the listening gas-men "hark!" while they wag each sinful ear, half in anger, half in fear, catching every word that slips from between his wizard lips: "Hark, ye wreckers of estate! Repent, reform, or fly from fate. For the doom ye long have earned burns more fierce than gas e'er burned. Go found orphanages, go and pay for fuel, where the snow howls 'round tenements as bleak as the Christian creeds ye speak. Turn your gas-jets into grates, sell your gas at cordwood rates. And so 'scape the vengeful fates."

We are delighted to know that the music teacher at the House of Correction is retained, and that the æsthetic education of the young gentlemen who are about to graduate at the Industrial School will not be neglected. When the festive young hoodlum is turned out upon society, he will be in possession of at least one accomplishment, namely, that of music.

Grove Johnson clamors for an Act
To make us editors retract
All words not founded upon fact.

If e'er on any thin pretense
We have committed the offense
Of calling Grove a man of sense,

We'll take it back without a law—
We stand in such Philistine awe
Of his ungently wielded jaw!

The Chronicle of Sunday last had an article profusely illustrated—like Kearney's speeches—with a show of hands. The Chronicle ought to know something of hands, certainly; its proprietors have had more opportunities to study the palms of jurors, grand and petit, while their owners were absorbed in a rapt contemplation of the horizon, than anybody in San Francisco. The hand of fellowship, with clean nails, they know less about.

The meanest attempt that has yet been made to blacken the character of General Grant in the interest of some other no aspirant is that of the New York Tribune, which asserts that during his recent visit to Philadelphia the garrulous Galenean refused to receive Mr. Belknap when that statesman called to pay his respects to his former chief. The story is not only false, it is malicious: Grant received Mr. Belknap with the same simple dignity and unpretentious cordiality that he would have extended to any other thief.

Boston finds fault with "the culture of the West" because a Chicago girl said Henry James, Jr., had "no heart," and suggested that he could not be "compared with Shakspeare." Perhaps the author of Daisy Miller has been making a personal "study" of the Western heart, or, possibly, a girl did not know that Shakspeare was born in

TO MY OLD PIPE.

Ah, here you are, in the same old place.
Come out, Old Pipe, of your well-worn case.
Yes, sure enough, 'tis the meerschau bowl!
And amber mouthpiece, unbroken, whole.

How many rare hours we've passed together!
You made me heedless of stormy weather,
And kept me up pretty late at night
When I colored this clay that was once pure white.

I'll fill your bowl with this fine long-cut,
'Tis the good old brand of the "whisky butt."
There now—well lighted, and drawing good;
Ah ha! Stop smoking? Who could, who could?

Yes, many an hour of rest and ease,
When nothing else had power to please,
I owe to you, Old Pipe, true friend,
Who sorrow soothe and comfort lend.

I've smoked you by the camp-fire's light,
In the dear old woods, of a summer's night;
In the hunter's cabin, shut in by snow;
At home, abroad, with high and low.

And when the midnight oil I've burned,
And long the printed pages turned,
A philosophic, calm review,
And, after, sleep were due to you.

"Who loves not women, wine, and song,
He is a fool his whole life long."
The couplet is more old than true;
They cease to please with time—not you.

The weed and wine and song are good,
But women, in all likelihood,
More pain than peace give us poor men;
The weed and wine and song sing, then.

And now, these piping verses done,
Panned half in sadness, half in fun,
Good-night, My Pipe—they end in smoke—
We'll leave them to the critic's croak.

OUR WATER RATES.

[The following interesting and readable communication upon the water question is furnished us by a writer from Australia. His views are so nearly in harmony with those expressed by us from time to time that we have given the article space in our columns.]

At the founding of San Francisco it might be said that a person standing on one of the local hills could see "water, water everywhere, but not a drop to drink." As the city increased in population it became apparent that the water supply, to be pure and abundant, must be brought hither in pipes from a distance, or obtained from artesian wells. The latter would not answer the purpose, because, according to the opinions of able civil engineers, not more than six million gallons a day would be yielded from artesian wells sunk in the city, while the daily local consumption approximates 10,000,000 gallons, and is constantly increasing. It is unnecessary to rehearse the history of the Spring Valley Water Works, from which the city obtains the most of its aqueous supply. That history has been told and retold by the local press. But a consideration of the subject, founded on experience, from the opening of the works to the present time, gives rise to reflections and suggestions which may properly be laid before our readers.

At the outset we may observe that the most thoughtful of the citizens, those whose conclusions are entitled to weight, are of the opinion that the water supply should not be in the hands of any private company; that the works should be owned and operated by the municipality. As a matter of fact, there are only two cities in the world—London, England, and San Francisco—which are provided with water by private corporations, namely: London, by eight of such bodies; and our city, by the one mentioned. New York was compelled to buy out the old Manhattan Water Works at an immense cost. It was so, also, in Chicago, Albany, Rochester, and a great number of other large towns, where the inhabitants cheerfully assented to the purchasing of the water works of private companies, so that the whole system might be under municipal control. The arguments in favor of this are obvious, and will readily suggest themselves to every reflective reader.

A question of equal importance is: Who should pay for the water? In this respect the Spring Valley Water Works Company occupies an anomalous position, one which would not be tolerated if the concern was in the hands of the municipality. Unlike in England, the northern and eastern States of the Union, on the European Continent, and in Australia—in all which places a water tax is assessed against property—here in San Francisco the consumer has to pay for the water. This practically makes a present to the landlords of all the water used in quenching conflagrations, etc. It is true that in many places where the tax is imposed on property the landlords stipulate with their tenants that the latter shall pay the rate; but a special contract of that kind is quite beside the question at issue, and with it the public are not concerned. A moment's reflection will show that the landlords are deeply interested, as well as the tenants, in having a plentiful supply of water. The owners of houses know that such a bountiful provision is calculated to cause a speedy extinguishment of fires, and also to reduce insurance rates to a minimum. Suppose there was no water supply sufficient to throw a stream twenty feet from the ground, what would be the upshot? Either that the insurance companies would not insure at all, or that they would charge such a high premium as to make house property scarcely worth having. For these, therefore, and other reasons which might be stated, it is manifest that the tax should be against property, and it should be left to the landlords and their tenants to make a proper pro rata estimate as to their respective interests in the water supply, and the amounts they should pay respectively of the tax. In New York four-fifths of the water rates are paid by the landlords and only one-fifth by the tenants. A fact like that speaks more forcibly than a thousand arguments in favor of the tax being levied on property.

Another anomaly, but perfectly consistent with the unsound principle of compelling the company to look to the consumers for payment, is that only about forty per cent. of the buildings in San Francisco are insured, leaving, of course, sixty per cent. uninsured. This can be accounted for on only two hypotheses. First, that the owners are so well satisfied with the abundant water supply, and the efficiency of the Fire Department, that they consider the risk of loss by fire so trifling as to render insurance needless, or, at least, unprofitable; or, secondly, that there are landlords here who own so many houses that they can better afford to lose one occasionally by fire than to insure them all. The latter principle is frequently adopted with regard to personal property as well as to real estate. For example, the great London shipping firm of Green & Green never insures its vessels. The firm is what is technically termed its own insurer. But we apprehend that few, if any, San Francisco landlords act on that principle, but rather on the first hypothesis mentioned. Without paying any insurance or water tax, they ostensibly enjoy all the advantages of an abundant water supply and an efficient Fire Department. This surely is not just. The fire brigade act just as energetically in extinguishing an uninsured as an insured dwelling, and the insurance companies are compelled to indorse such action, for the reason that a conflagration might spread from uninsured to insured buildings.

As a necessary outcome of the state of things described, much injustice is done to both the consumers and the Spring Valley Company. The rates paid are at least four times too high, and yet the corporation does not reap a proper or adequate return for the money invested. Instead of a simple and efficient water tax of so much per cent. on the real estate valuation of the city, there is the following complicated scale of monthly charges for tenements occupied by a single family of not more than five persons:

GROUND SURFACE COVERED BY TENEMENT.	One Story.	Two Stories.	Three Stories.	Four Stories.	Five Stories.
600 to 700 square feet ...	$2 00	$2 00	$2 25	$2 50	$2 75

3800 to 4000 " " " "	6 25	6 50	6 75	7 00	7 25

Nor is that all; there are a number of other confused and perplexing charges. If a one-story house covers a greater area than 4,000 square feet, 25 cents are added for each additional 200 feet; and for each additional story, 25 cents. If a family consist of more than five persons, 25 cents additional are charged for each additional person. For every bathing-tub in private houses a dollar is charged; in barbers' shops, $2. For every horse, and water for washing one vehicle, a dollar; every additional horse, 50 cents, and every additional vehicle a dollar. It would be tedious to give all the petty and positively vexatious items, such as 25 cents for every guest in a hotel or lodging-house, so much for every 25 square yards of garden or pleasure ground, etc., etc. Now, these rates, per month, are not simply enormous—they are outrageous; and if they were charged by a municipality they would be termed extortionate. Nevertheless, it is the system that is to be blamed, and not the company; for, as stated, it does not obtain a suitable return for its investment. One of the charges by meter reads: "Fifty cents per thousand gallons, provided the monthly bill shall not be less than $50." Not less than $600 a year for water! Monstrous! The company itself admits that the charges are four times too high; but, in point of fact, they are five or six times too high, as any person may discern by consulting statistics on the subject. The remedy for this state of affairs is that already hinted at: an ad valorem tax on the real estate of the city, instead of the existing method. So far as we know, no fault is to be imputed to the conduct or management of the Spring Valley Company. The water is good, the supply is abundant, and the present works are capable of furnishing water for many times the present number of inhabitants.

By way of contrast of systems adopted for paying for a city's aqueous supply, we will briefly describe the Yan Yean Water Works which supply Melbourne, the capital of Victoria, Australia, and the mode of payment in force for the commodity. But first, we may observe that there are in Victoria alone—one of the youngest of the seven Australian colonies—no fewer than 43 elaborate water works, constructed at an aggregate cost of nearly $15,000,000, the Yan Yean works, for the capital, having cost $5,000,000. The reservoir for these works—nearly 25 miles from Melbourne—is on three sides naturally bounded by hills, and a vast lake is formed by the artificial construction of an embankment 3,159 feet in length and 30 feet high, connecting two bluffs. The space so inclosed had been the only outlet for the drainage of a watershed of about 45,000 acres. The lake, or reservoir, contains about 1,300 acres, the greatest depth being 25 feet and average 18. At one side of the reservoir runs the river Plenty—a stream of crystalline purity—so called because it is never failing, although in summer it is only a few inches deep; a small dog could wade across it. From the Plenty the water is conducted into the reservoir by an aqueduct, and the supply is thereby capable of being adjusted by a sluice, by means of which a regulated influx takes place. At the end of the reservoir, from which the huge pipes conveying the water to the city are fed, there is a "water-tower" which regulates the depth from which the water in the reservoir runs into the pipes.

The discharge of the river Plenty, where it supplies the reservoir, was ascertained in one summer to be only six and a half cubic feet per second, equal to a yearly supply of eight and a half million cubic yards, and capable of occupying only a mean depth of three and half feet in the reservoir, which is less than the actual evaporation, estimated by observation at five feet. But the reservoir is fed by a drainage basin of sixty square miles of generally a steep character. Before the reservoir was inclosed by the artificial embankment mentioned, the ground was covered with thousands of tons of charcoal, which aids in purifying the water. It reaches Melbourne as clear as water from a mountain spring. The works were constructed by the government, and a small property tax is levied and collected. Pipes from the mains are laid on to all the houses and lots in the city, and payment by all the property-owners is rendered obligatory. They may, of course, and do, make arrangements with their tenants for payment of the whole or a pro rata share of the tap, the landlords being interested to the extent of acquiring the water for the extinguishment of fires, and the low rates of insurance companies consequent on a copious supply of water. The property water-tax does not amount to one-sixth of the charges made by the Spring Valley Water Works Company, and yet the income, on account of the more extended and equitable distribution, is larger than the money yield from San Francisco. The population of our city and that of Melbourne are almost identical—three hundred thousand.

Before closing these remarks we would invite attention to one more very important matter in this connection. The Yan Yean reservoir is about six hundred feet higher than Melbourne, while the reservoirs of the Spring Valley water supply are a little more than half that altitude above San Francisco. Now, the water-power from both, instead of being allowed to go to waste, should be largely utilized. Let us make a little calculation. The water of the Yan Yean reservoir has a motive power of two and a half horses per foot of fall, which, multiplied by the approximate height above Melbourne—600 feet—would result in a total water-power of 1,500 horses, eighty per cent. of which, or that of 1,200 horses, could be made available by means of the turbine, or horizontal water-wheel, the useful effect of which has been proved up to that percentage. This power would be able to break about 2,000,000 cubic yards of road material in the year at a cost of half a cent per cubic yard, a quantity sufficient for 34½ miles of streets, laid thirty feet wide, with nine inches deep of broken stone.

Mr. Alden, of the New York Times, evidently shares the weakness of journalists for military criticism. After describing the recent hostilities in the First Reformed Presbyterian Church at Pittsburg, he asserts, in effect, that the congregation blundered whenever its two factions engaged. "Not the slightest knowledge," he says, "of the elementary principles of strategy was shown, and the means of assuring victory, which would have been apparent even to an average militia colonel, were totally disregarded. It may be laid down as a principle of church fighting that the pupil is the commanding position. The party which wished to conquer at Pittsburg should have occupied the pulpit in strong force at an early hour, posting, at the same time, a number of picked elders on the pulpit stairs. The choir-gallery should also have been occupied, thus placing the body of the congregation between two fires. Had this been done by the Clyde party, it would have been impossible for the Woodside party to hold services in any part of the building, unless they could have successfully stormed both the pulpit and the choir-gallery. This might possibly have been done, but the struggle would have been a hard one, and the carnage would have been fearful. Nevertheless, neither party seems to have thought of this method of securing victory. There was also a failure on the part of all the combatants—with the single exception of the man with the poker—to use their weapons with any efficiency. The fire of Bibles and hymn-books from the back-pews was nearly ineffectual. Those weapons have a comparatively short range, and, except in the case of a plunging fire from a gallery, do little execution at a long distance. There was a large fifteen-inch Bible in the pulpit that would have done tremendous execution had it been thrown into the struggling mass of elders at the foot of the pulpit stairs, but no one had intelligence or presence of mind enough to use it. There were also foot-stools in many of the pews, which might have been effectively used, but the 'Covenanters' seem to have entirely forgotten the example of Jenny Geddes, and not a foot-stool was used. Such a fight as this does not deserve the name of a battle. A dozen stalwart Irish Roman Catholics, accustomed to ecclesiastical fights with their Orange enemies, or a small gang of earnest Methodists inured to expelling roughs from Missouri or Arkansas camp-meetings, could have put the entire First Reformed Presbyterian Church to flight in five minutes."

The Indianapolis Herald has no patience with ladies who use pet names. And the Herald is right. Speaking of Miss Mamie Smith, who was recently admitted to practice at the bar of Kentucky it says: "Can it be possible that a woman of sufficient learning and intelligence to be admitted to practice law would permit herself to be known to the world by such a pet name? What dignified fame can she expect to acquire with the name of 'Mamie'?" What would have been the success of such men as George Washington, Horace Greeley, Charles Sumner, Rufus Choate, Ulysses S. Grant, Henry Ward Beecher, Oliver P. Morton, Thomas A. Hendricks, Conrad Baker, and Jonathan W. Gordon had they attempted to acquire position and fame by starting out in life as 'Dordie' Washington, 'Hoddie' Greeley, 'Charlie' Sumner, 'Rufie' Choate, 'Lyssie' Grant, 'Harrie' Beecher, 'Nollie' Morton, 'Tommie' Hendricks, 'Coonie' Baker, and 'Jontie' Gordon?"

Miss Lilian Whiting, on the editorial staff of the Cincinnati Commercial, stays at her post until eleven o'clock at night, and is then accompanied to a horse car which passes the door and leaves her at her own home. Miss Whiting looks the picture of strong, healthy, fresh young life. She enjoys her intellectual work, and has proved that a woman can do well on a daily paper.

The latest Yankee discovery is a spring in Michigan so strongly magnetic that a man who drank from it and went into a blacksmith's shop found the anvil on which he sat stuck fast to him, and had to have it amputated.

A young man of Cleveland, Ohio, deeply in love with a Jewish maiden whom he wished to marry, recently renounced his Christian faith and embraced that of his betrothed. It is not difficult to determine beforehand who will "run" that family.

THE WIDOW'S COUNSEL.

She Throws a Brand of Discord into the Pard's Family Circle.

TUTTLETOWN, January 4, 1879.

POOR FELLOW:—The Lord only knows how much I pity you, Jim. Not a day passes that I don't weep a bucketful for you. The sight of an idiot always did affect me that way, and I've never really recovered from the effects of my visit to the Stockton asylum four years ago. But, Jim, you're served mighty well right. I warned you against fashionable women long before you made this break. If you hadn't been a natural-born numbskull you'd a heeded what I said to you, and you wouldn't be squirming now. Only five days married, and asking advice of another woman! Why, Jim, you ought to be ashamed of yourself; and if you weren't what you are—a fool of the deepest dye—you'd never lift your head again. Jim, it isn't the square thing to write to a woman unknown to your wife. That's flat, and even that chronic old drunkard, Bill Belcher, will tell you the same thing. And then to call your wife the old woman is the worst in the deck. Jim Snaggleby, if you was my husband, and I should hear of you calling me your old woman, I'd tear that old bald-headed scalp of yours out by the roots. In the first place, it ain't a decent way of talking about women anyhow; and in the second place, no woman ever is old until she's paraded round the country in the side-show of a circus as the sister of one of General Washington's body-servants.

I don't care a snap of my little finger how married life is agreeing with you; and as for your Maud being queer or jealous, I care a mighty sight less. I've had some experience with her style of females, herself included, and I've gauged her gait from heel to toe. She played you for a sardine, and held out both bowers and the ace. She covered every trick, and the first thing you know there'll be war in the camp. You've deeded most of your property over to her; you've given old Tarbox all your loose cash, and, if Bill Belcher isn't sober enough to get it himself, you'll make over the balance to a blear-eyed old bundle of bones who has the honor to be Maud's aunt. You'll be lucky if they leave you your soul; but they say the devil takes care of his own, and as he's probably got a mortgage on that part of your personal property, he won't let his human imps euchre him out of the valuable plunder.

That hotel business shows up you and Bill about as well as anything could, the only difference between you and Bill Belcher being that he was born so, and you inherited your idiocy. You needn't be so surprised at the discovery that society women who are married are not wives. And if you hunt round lively, maybe you'll find out that society dicks, as you call them, who are married, are not husbands. They are gentlemen. So, Jim, you can congratulate yourself on being a gentleman, even if you are married to the daughter of a beef contractor who sold mule meat to the soldiers during the war, and called it supplies. Coming down to business, you want to know how long it'll take for you and your lady to even up on the love racket. Well, Jim, I'll tell you. As soon as they've got all your coin, and you ain't no more use to them as a monkey show in the parlor, her love'll slide down to zero, and as soon as you find out that the whole thing was a put-up job, perhaps your lady will fetch zero, too. It's a case of perhaps in your case, but it's a dead-shot in hers. The truth of the matter is that it's away below zero with her now, but the chances are that it'll climb a little after you're out of the way, because, as they say, distance lends enchantment to the view, and absence makes the heart grow fonder. And that's why I pity you, Jim. I've taken your advice about addressing this letter to Bill Belcher, but I sent a copy of it to you, so that if the peaked institution, as you call her, which is Maud's aunt, opens it by mistake, she can get some idea of what I think of her. If, as you say, she's been in the habit of opening your letters by mistake, I think she'll acknowledge she's caught a tartar in this one. I've heard of this Evangeline Snooks before. Bill gives us her photograph in a letter to Frisbie, describing your wedding, and nearly everybody in the county's read it; and if it'll do her any good to know it, she's the laughing-stock of Tuolumne of 1,200 horses, could be made available by means of the County, from the Confidence Mine to Don Pedro's Bar, and from the Mono line to Jackass Hill. It was the best thing Bill ever did, and by the time you get this, Maud's aunt will be famous from Sheep Ranch to Coppertown, over in Calaveras. I hope the old heptagon, as you call her, will open this letter by mistake. Only, Jim, you'll have to look out for squalls and land-slides, and maybe earthquakes, after this. Bill said she enameled, and I hope she'll poison him for saying it, because, as you know, I don't like your drunken pard any better than she does. He said she was a shadow, a skeleton, a beak-nosed old scarecrow, and I don't know what else. Why, Jim, for fear that she won't have the pleasure of knowing how Bill's flattered her, I've a good mind to direct this letter to her by mistake, but I'll give you a chance to grin at her whenever she sets out to make it uncomfortable for you or Bill, because, you see, she'll hardly dare, being high-toned, to acknowledge that she opened the letter. Of course, you are on the lookout for the letters, so I'll send the one to you off first. She'll be apt to get it, and won't have time to get Bill's. If she should manage to make the rifle on Bill's letter I'll fix it so that he will have her arrested for opening letters that didn't belong to her, and then I'll have the extreme pleasure of appearing against her. But, Jim, give her that bank account Maud's hinting round about, as you say in your letter to me. Don't mind Bill. He wants a slice himself. There's square up-and-up advice on that subject, anyhow.

As for Bill's scrape with the flighty piece, as you call Miss Ogilethorpe in that letter of yours, I hope you'll make it an object for them to marry. I think a present of $10,000 would fix it. I'll bet she wouldn't sell for more than that figure at auction, and I'm sure she ain't worth a tenth of that sum to anyone but Bill Belcher. If the Snooks woman don't show this to the Ogilethorpe person I've wasted my ink for nothing, and Bill won't fall quite as hard as I intended him to. As you have told me all your family affairs, and the Snooks has read this letter, that lady of yours will, in all probability, make it very salubrious for you on general principles. But you've got one friend. Bill and you can always get the best kind of advice by writing to her, unknown to your wife—lady, I mean. Don't be backward, Jim; but when you've got any little family snarls to untangle just drop your friend a line, and she'll fetch you through with flying colors. That friend, Jim, is, Yours truly, PRISCILLA JONES.

P. S.—Maud's aunt must see a copy of this letter. If she don't get hold of it any other way, I'll drop her a line to be on the lookout, and hold this one back. I'm doing this out of friendship, Jim.

A Terrible Revenge.

SONORA, January 4, 1879.

MISS SNOOKS:—If you will take the trouble to investigate Mr. Snaggleby's mail on the next day after you receive this, you will learn something to your advantage, as well as the advantage of Maud and Miss Ogilethorpe. It is not exactly the thing, you know, for him to correspond with other women, and his lady still living. Be very careful about securing the mail matter, as Jim will be on the watch for the particular one referring to you and Maud.

A FRIEND OF THE FAMILY.

To EVANGELINE SNOOKS, Los Angeles, Cal.

The Charming Conversationalist.

The good conversationalist has many gifts, none of which are intrusive. He or she is called by some general term charming, delightful, fascinating, but seldom clever. All the gifts are spontaneous—felt, not criticised; but when one possessing them comes into a room, daylight seems to enter. Good conversation is never ostentatious—it is facile and simple, gently capricious, gracefully lively; it has the easy charm that makes something of nothing, giving value to the commonplace from the fashion of utterance. It must be Proteus-like—ever changing. It must be prepared, never be a preoccupation or a pretension; never seek to be epigrammatic, witty, sentimental, or romantic. Fate has its revenge on those who seek to elude this law of spontaneity. If it be annoying enough to think of the repartee that would so effectively have capped our friend's last speech, when the discussion between us is a thing of the past and he is out of earshot, it is yet more mortifying when, next time we meet, and cunningly bring round the talk to the point where we left off, and at the proper place shoot off our polished and cherished repartee, to find it fall, nevertheless, like an arrow from an unstrung bow.

The secret of conversation lies, par excellence, in its improvisation. It is the word rising fresh and sparkling from the inspiring source of the present emotion. It is noteworthy of the good conversationalist that he never interrupts, and that an unerring tact warns him when the subject in hand begins to pall. If there be a story to tell, he rides the hobby with a light saddle; hastens over uninteresting details like a good horseman coming to the jump; takes a pull when near the fence, makes at it, and comes to land safe amid laughter and applause. He knows the right moment for his story, and is not so dotingly fond of it that if there comes a chill he will not likely drop it and turn to some other topic. Many a clever member of society may travel from Dan to Beersheba and be dull, with never a word to say of his journeys or adventures. The conversationalist will merely walk to the post-office or to the shop, and, like a bee after a little flowery turn returning with its store of honey, he will bring back amusing comment and humorous observation that will rouse the languid and interest the sick. To his other gifts must necessarily be added that of being a good listener—it is the supplement that completes the whole. His foremost virtue is the precious power of sympathy, enlarged by observation, to which is added the discipline of wide and varied culture. Only under like conditions from the barren soil of talk can spring the flowers of conversation.

A lady correspondent in France writes as follows: "What queer ideas you Americans have over there!" said a Frenchwoman to me as we stood one day waiting for our glasses to be filled at one of the springs of Vichy. "Such a droll people! But is it really true that you make grow the potato (sweet potato) by wetting a common potato vine with molasses and water?" "Heugh! those miserable, radical Americans," said an Imperialist once in my hearing; "they plant their dead fathers and mothers in their vegetable gardens, that thus their beans and asparagus may have more nourishing properties." "Your American mothers seem to us mad," said a Frenchman. "They often permit their daughters to go away on traveling excursions of a week at a time with their fiancés. Of course it is true, for I read it in the Figaro." "What would your men do if your American ladies did not provide spittoons in their drawing-rooms? Do you believe they really would spit upon the floor?" said another. "The only American woman I ever saw had a great beard," said a stout paysanne to me among the mountains of Auvergne. "I saw her in a show the year I went to Lyons. I thought all American women were like that. But I am sure you are quite as pretty as a Frenchwoman," she added, patronizingly. It was in that same village, forty miles from a railway, and in so secluded a mountain nook that it was the site of a Trappist monastery, that I was followed by every inhabitant of the village as I walked with my French companion through the main street. "Look at the American," they cried to each other; "she's painted to look like a Frenchwoman!" I had not an atom of powder upon my face, and I had traveled fourteen miles since morning in an open carriage under an August sun. That I was as red as a dahlia was only proof that my natural coffee color lay deep under layers of cosmetic. For did not all those Auvergnats know well that all Americans are negroes?

It is said to be the intention of the Empress Eugénie so to time her visit to Zululand that she may be on the spot where her son met his death on the anniversary of that sad event, the first day of June. Lieutenant Carey will not be detailed as the escort of the illustrious lady in that sad pilgrimage. This sombre duty will be devolved upon Sir Evelyn Wood, for whom the poor Prince Louis conceived a great regard during the latter's short career in Zululand.

The Greenbacker knocked him down, stepped on him several times, whipped his limp form round a lamp-post, and threw him over into a friend's yard with this piece of advice: "Never insult a man's mother, not even in Latin, for there's no telling how well the fellow may be up in the dead languages."

Lebanon, Me., is proud of possessing the stupidest man in the United States. He is a farm hand, and was engaged to plow a ten-acre lot. He started his horses, and his employer's attention was drawn to something else; but in a short time, looking round, he found that the cow had left her place, while the sagacious plowman was following her, drawing a zigzag furrow all over the field.

"Nae, nae; never till you came here," was the rather equivocal answer.

The art of managing an Oxford University mob is rarely learned. The late Mr. Bellew, however, once lulled a storm at the theatre by the very humblest of processes. He simply "gave in"—which is really the only thing to be done. Mr. Bellew had incautiously presented himself with a luxuriant head of hair. Presently a shout arose of "Go and get your hair cut, sir." "There's a barber round the corner, sir." "It only costs sixpence, sir," and other playful quips of Attic delicacy. "What did you do?" asked a friend. "I was a preacher, to whom the latter was relating the story," replied Mr. Bellew, in the naivest way, "I cut."

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

The concert of Mr. Theodor Vogt--Metropolitan Temple, 2d inst.--was probably designed, in the first instance, as an opportunity for that gentleman to present himself to our public as organist and composer; the remainder of the programme may be regarded as a concession to an audience that is scarcely yet prepared to accept an entire evening of organ music, be it never so well played. Mr. Vogt introduced himself with Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C minor, playing afterward a Concert Fantaisie by Dr. Volckmar, and, at the close of the concert, an extemporaneous Fantaisie. I heard only the two former numbers, in both of which the apparent nervousness of the performer was very distressing; his passages were far from clear or correct, pedals uncertain, and general treatment of the instrument exceedingly unsatisfactory. If Mr. Vogt has ever been taught to register his Bach Fugue as he did on Friday evening, he has been very badly taught, since he simply makes a muddle of the whole thing, and entirely obscures the flow of the voices. Of his compositions, the song, "Wer nie sein brod," of Goethe, has decided quality, and is well written, albeit of too much dramatic pretension for a mere lyric. It was exceedingly well sung by Madame Fabbri. The Morning Prayer, a quartette with baritone solo, has the effect of an exercise in modulation, without any theme; it has nothing to say, and continues saying it for about fifteen minutes. The solo--very well rendered by Mr. Müller--reminded me constantly of Wachtel's reply when asked why he did not sing in Wagner's opera: that he was "not engaged to sing viola parts." I heard nothing but a "viola part" and a spasmodic organ accompaniment. Mr. Müller, who was in excellent voice, made a great success of Gounod's Nazareth, a fine though somewhat over-long song, and Mr. Espinosa, at the pianoforte, and Mr. Julius Heinrichs--violinello--were, as we know them, artistic and reliable. Mr. Ferdinand Urban sang a song by Liebe, with a delightful tenor voice and such a beautiful style that I wonder we have not before heard him in concert. It is surely our loss, and one that I hope will be made good in the future, since our market is not overstocked with good tenors who know how to sing a song properly.

I do not know a more trying ordeal to which a concert company could be subjected than to have Signor De Vivo for its advance agent. My Italian friend (I shall always love him, for he taught me how to stuff and bake artichokes, which I believe he can do better than any man in the world) is such an inordinate blower--is on terms of such perfect familiarity with the superlatives in our language, which he uses with delightful abandon--that I defy any company to be equal to his announcement of it, or any artist to be strong enough to survive his genial, but reckless, manner of advertising. Worst of all, the public knows De Vivo, and takes what he gives cum grano salis; so when a genuine artist does happen to fall under his protecting mantle of glowing imagery, he has first of all to undo the work of the agent who over-advertised him--not always an easy matter--and then, in the face of the lingering doubt with which the public always receives De V.'s statements, begin to make his impression. Fortunately for Mr. Chizzola, his company is so exceptionally strong that even De Vivo could do it no serious injury; it is a group of artists of primo cartello, each well able to stand on his own merits, each so admirable in his way that it is a simple statement of a fact to say that we have never before had in this city so delightful and well balanced a group of artists. Of Madame Patti, it is at this writing too early to form a just opinion, since the indisposition which prevented her singing on Wednesday evening had already set in on Monday, and deprived her of the full control of her voice. From what I heard on the opening night, however, I should say that while the voice has perhaps suffered somewhat in the extreme upper register, it has gained breadth and richness in the lower; and that, retaining as she does all her former wonderful accuracy of execution and intonation, her singing is no whit less enjoyable than in the days of her former great triumphs. Mr. De Munck--Madame Patti's husband--is simply one of the finest violincellists I have ever met; his tone and style are alike large, pure, noble, and entirely free from the maudlin affectation of most soloists upon his instrument. Mr. De Munck is a great artist: such a one as since Wieniawski and Sauret we have not had amongst us, and one who--although he has scored a perfect success--will be scarcely properly appreciated until, when he is gone, we shall have only the recollection of his perfect playing to compare with what we get instead. Those who heard his wonderful interpretation of Schumann's Abendlied on last Wednesday night will not speedily forget him.

In Mr. Toedt Mr. Chizzola has presented to us a pure lyric tenor singer, whose like has not been heard here; one who combines with a beautiful, sympathetic voice great culture and a refined, musician-like style that is very rare among singers. Mr. Toedt sings like a musician; so much so, indeed, that I earnestly hope that, before the season ends, he will let us hear him in some of the songs of Schumann and Schubert--something out of the routine of the usual concert programme. (By the by, the huge pedal extremity of one of our "esteemed contemporaries" went into it again, last Tuesday morning, when he accused Mr. Toedt of altering Abt's song Embarrassment. The fact is that the song was sung exactly as written and printed in the original edition.) Signor Ciampi has also a beautiful, though not large, voice, of very pleasant quality, which he manages well, and sings like a thorough artist. I have rarely heard two voices blend more satisfactorily than his and Mr. Toedt's do in Faure's duet Crucifix (sung on Wednesday), or derived more pleasure from an Italian song than he gave in Una Stella of Mililotti, on the same evening.

Mr. Henry Ketten is a pianist sui generis, and in his genre he is a very fine one. Whether one likes the style or not is an open question, perhaps, although scarcely so to me. I am quite clear that I do not. Mr. Ketten is a pianist of the ultra modern French school--a school that takes individual caprice for style and individual methods for technique. It is a school of surprises and stunning effects, of violent fortes and almost inaudible pianissimo, of much execution and no legato, of much octave playing without any real control of the wrist; in fact, a school without method. As a result we have in Mr. Ketten an extremely brilliant player who does some things marvelously well--especially some of his own compositions--and others not so well. He has many novel--and sometimes delightful--effects of the keyboard, and is evidently a thoughtful and cultured musician. His Sérénade Espagnole (Wednesday) is a charming and interesting composition, and his Faust transcription is quite masterly. But his playing of Liszt seems technically faulty (not from insufficiency, but out of the nature of his technique), nor did I fully approve of his treatment of Mendelssohn's little Presto (out of Op. 16) with its tremendous basses and overhard staccati. These, however, as I said before, are individual matters. Mr. Ketten is a pianist who will always delight the public while he interests the musician, and who is undoubtedly entitled to take high rank as an artist.

"Mme. Clara Schumann, on the contrary, cannot play one single bar before the public without having her music before her, and, to the best of our knowledge, has never tried to play from memory." I find this statement in the Trade Review of the 27th ult. It is clearly an error. I have heard Madame Schumann play from memory by the hour, in public and private; heard her play concertos from memory (the A minor of Schumann, the G minor of Mendelssohn, and the G major of Beethoven), and even accompany songs--of her husband--without the book.

ADA VEN'S LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 9, 1880.
MY DEAR HELEN:--I can not tell you how shocked I was on New Year's Day to see gentlemen visiting in full evening dress. The custom has been properly discarded years ago; and it is now universally conceded, among gentlemen of taste, that a dress coat and white cravat should never be worn earlier than the dinner hour; and as every one knows we get all our masculine fashions from London or Paris, it is inexcusable at this late day for any young man who has any pretension to style, or gentility, continuing to adhere to this bad habit. The striking resemblance it creates between the guests and the servants of a house has led to much embarrassment and many ludicrous mistakes, and it is a social law, as fixed as those of the Medes and Persians, that only in the evening will a gentleman wear evening dress. And while I am fault-finding, I must say that the custom prevalent with some young men (well-meaning, no doubt) of leaving gilt or silver-edged New Year's cards, ornamented with elaborate floral or arabesque designs, is supremely ridiculous, as it would be easy to mistake the reminder left by your friend for the advertisement of an enterprising haberdasher.

And now, my dear friend, with the proud consciousness of having done my duty, I turn from the "lords of creation" and their apparel to the more important subject of women--their garb, and pleasures. The present week has had more than the usual amount of "gaiety" crowded within its brief limits. Lent commencing somewhat earlier this year than usual, the time allotted to festivity must be proportionately less. How delightfully things temporal and spiritual can sometimes be made to harmonize! After earthly pleasures have been enjoyed to the verge of satiety, and mind and body alike require a season of rest, Lent interposes its welcome quiet, when abstinence and early hours can repair the drain occasioned by previous dissipation. First upon the list is the "Tea" given by Mrs. William Sillem, on Wednesday afternoon. Last fall Mrs. Louis Haggin inaugurated this style of entertainment, so popular in the East, by a series of five, which were thronged with the élite of our city. In New York two or three in one afternoon are not uncommon, and they are universally attended by the most fashionable ladies, and also a sprinkling of gentlemen. Our fair ones, however, seem to prefer the excitement of the ball-room, with its music, dancing, and may be champagne.

Well, to return to Mrs. Sillem's "tea." It could not fail to be most pleasant, her well-known affability having made her deservedly popular with a great many of our most prominent ladies, numbers of whom made their appearance in splendid costumes, and remained as long as fancy or politeness dictated. On Wednesday evening, Mrs. Sweetapple gave a brilliant entertainment in the grand parlor of the Occidental Hotel. This spacious apartment, with its decorations of flowers and evergreens, made an unusually elegant and spacious ball-room. I will not dwell upon your friends that I have previously mentioned at former entertainments, but give you a little variety by naming those I have not heretofore met. Miss Sweetapple, of whom you have probably heard, is a dazzling blonde of the English type, whose reputation for beauty has been widespread: as visible proof, she has in her train attendant admirers from foreign lands. Mrs. Shillaber was present, wearing an elegant costume. Miss Roberta Thompson, a beautiful brunette, with soft lustrous eyes and brilliant complexion, was one of the most admired young ladies present. I saw Miss McDougal, Miss Van Clief, Miss Johnson, and others.

Now I have something really interesting to communicate. All of our recent entertainments have been attended by an English baronet, Sir George Bridges--he has three or four other initials, but I forget them. I assure you his advent has created quite a flutter; and, as he is young, and endowed with "acres of charms" and a talismanic title, I think he need never sigh in vain. I have lately made the acquaintance of a charming young officer, stationed at the Presidio, who seems to find the pursuit of pleasure quite as congenial an occupation as following the trail of the treacherous savage. Mr. Graves, the mild-mannered McAfee, Bayard Smith, and other acquaintances were among the guests. On Friday evening the much-talked-of reception of Mrs. Frank Goad took place, at the "Raiston House." Our fashionable people are all attending the concerts given by Carlotta Patti. Though her voice seems on the wane, her beauty is unimpaired. I think, however, the combat being waged between her husband and agent even more entertaining than her singing. In their "ruinous assault and inextinguishable rage" they seem to have defied all known rules of warfare, as well as those of the English language. Until my next, Yours affectionately, ADA VEN.

THE NEW YEAR IN SACRAMENTO.

SACRAMENTO, Jan. 3, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT:--Such punch! such Bavaria cream! such salad! such "wine and women"! The boys were all out in full regalia. They ganged (I coined that word myself) about like this: Gang 1--W. A. and Dan Houghton, and Tim Porter. Gang 2--Charlie Houghton, J. E. Mills, and B. F. Smith. Gang 3--Will Cothrin, Collis Emmons, Charlie Parsons, and Frank Johnston. Estudillo (J. M.), Aguirre, Crandall, and Putnam made another team. Prodder failed this year, and sailed under the flag of the older boys, amongst whom were J. I. Felter, L. A. Upson, Dr. Tyrell, Dr. Hughson, our friend Mazlin (and, by the way, we shall feel too dreadfully cut up if he leaves the town when Perkins comes in!), Ludwig Mebius, Dr. Cluness, John Carroll (just returned from the East), A. A. Van Voorhies, J. W. McClatchy, Fred Bird-sall, Norton Bush (one of the fellows tells me that all the "fair frauds" in the city are crazy over tropical painting since Norton set up shop here!), C. W. Clarke, M. A. Shipley, Albert Gallatin, Charles and Byron McCreary, Col. Hamilton, Wm. Lyon, and the Rev. Mr. Ward (who wished all his pretty parishioners a Happy New Year). Of course there were hundreds of others, but I can't think of any more just now. Some of the cards that wished the fair ones a Happy New Year were unique; the most noticeable of which were the four aces dealt by Tom Riley, Clint White, Johnston (A. J.), Val. McClatchey, and Barney Wolf. This last gentleman's was "the boss," and no mistake. It represented a wolf making his exit from the State Capitol, carrying in his mouth a card with the letters P. P. C., and on his collar Wolf's initials, D. B. Prodder's charcoal sketches produced an immense sensation, at an immense cost.

Our gang started out about one P. M. Our first call was on Mrs. Judge Denson, who was assisted by Mrs. Dr. Harvey of Galt, Mrs. Charles Holbrook of S. F., Miss Laura Graham of Elk Grove, and Mrs. George Bates, née Emma Beatty. Thence to Mrs. Bird-sall's, assisted by Mrs. C. W. Clarke, Mrs. Cluness, Mrs. Horace Adams, now of S. F. (and how good it seemed to see her genial face again!), Mrs. Joe Glover, Mrs. Sternfeldt, and Miss Lou Turner. At Mrs. J. H. Carroll's we found Mrs. Gov. Irwin, Mrs. Mebius, Mrs. A. Campbell, Mrs. Arnold, Miss Jennie Taylor, and the Misses Webster, besides the young Misses Carroll. On Tenth and F, Mrs. J. I. Felter received with her daughters. Mrs. Albert Gallatin was assisted by Mrs. Col. Hamilton, Mrs. William Lyon, and Miss Brightie Bush of S. F. At Mrs. J. H. Glyde's we found Mrs. Dr. Snider, and the Misses Snider, Hamilton, and Megowan. Mrs. C. H. Hubbard was assisted by Mrs. Carrie Williams, Mrs. Wilbur Wilcox of Redwood, Mrs. George Hogan, Mrs. Ed Cushman, and Miss Gertie Gerish. At Mrs. Charles McCreary's were Mrs. Harry Weaver, Miss Fannie Tyrell, and Miss Minnie Clark. Mrs. Frank Miller was assisted by Mrs. R. J. Mercley, Lillie Flint, and Amelia Bohl. Mrs. James N. Porter was assisted by Mrs. W. A. Houghton, Mrs. Hurd, Miss Nellie Clark, and Mrs. and Miss McKune. And then there were hosts (or hostesses) of others that I can't begin to mention. The ladies were dressed most elegantly; if I were a woman I could tell all about their furhewels, but I only know they all looked bewildering. Some of their homes were exquisitely decorated, especially Mrs. Gallatin's, Mrs. Carroll's, and Mrs. Foye's. When we came out of Mrs. Foye's, and looked across the road at the Crocker mansion, and found it so still and silent, somehow our gay spirits were quelled as we thought of poor Nellie Crocker, who had received us last year with the customary Crocker hospitality, now lying dead and cold in New York. She died with the old year, and it is a loss very deeply felt by her friends, and, indeed, by all.

We finished up our calls without any "accidents" happening. The absence of wine in many of the houses was particularly noted; indeed, in some places they gave us blue ribbons instead, and in one Cupid's bow and arrows, as if they could ward off Bacchus!

Charlie Prodder gave his usual Christmas tree to the Protestant Orphan Asylum, and cleared about $300, besides making eighty-six little hearts glad, for one day in the year at least. After the Inauguration on the 13th inst. it is rumored that four elegant private parties are to be given.

Our friend, the Recluse, can say "Eureka" in more than one sense of the word, for 'tis said he has "found" the Doctor's daughter. BETSEY AND I.

At the theatres there is a general stagnation, the usual reaction from the glint and glitter of the holidays. The only houses doing any business are the Bush Street Theatre and the Standard across the way. Both are cosy and comfortable, and have good attractions--the Colville Folly Company at the one, and the "great and only" Hermann at the other. Monday begins the last week of the Colville Company at the Bush Street, and for their au revoir they will present a medley of performances--five burlesques: Oxygen, Magic Slipper, Robinson Crusoe, Piff Paff, and The Bohemian Gyrl--the last of which can readily be dispensed with. At the Standard, Hermann begins his fourth week, advertising, in addition to an entirely new programme, his "great cannon act, in which a human being"--presumably Mlle. Addie--"is fired fifty feet into space." This "firing out" process is said to be very interesting and exciting.

Cincinnati rejoices in the "Sardinia Dramatic Company." It is to be hoped that the organization will not visit this city for the following reasons: It is not to be supposed that such a high-toned troupe would have anything to do with the "dramatic editors" of a provincial town like Frisco. Then some envious quill-driver would be sure to dub the organization the "Sardine Dramatic Company," and it is a living fact that no dramatic talent ever outlasted the first fresh blast of local wit.

Wilhelmj the Great will be in town in time to shake out his fiddleful of larks about the 19th inst.

Silver jewelry is fashionable.

MARRIED.--At San Gabriel, January 3, 1880, at the residence of the bride's parents, by Rev. Wm. Willson, E. H. Sanderson to Annie W. Rose. No cards.

DON PIATT ON AMERICANS.

In what a charming mental condition the pious Piatt must have been when he "penned the following lines":

The private letters of Charles Dickens now read by the blessed American people open their innocent eyes to the fact that the great humorist hated and despised us.

It is not so very depressing after all; for we find consolation in noting the sort of people Charles admired and liked. "No great man is a great man to his lackey," says another man of genius who despises us; "but," he adds, "that is the lackey's fault," and we say that Charles Dickens, with all his genius, was yet a lackey.

We never, until we encountered Boz, understood what Shakespeare meant when he spoke of the toad that carried a jewel in its head. Dickens was that toad, with a jewel so precious one never ceases to wonder at its brilliancy.

On the other side, God knows, Dickens found enough in us to loathe with a contempt that defies expression. He tells, for example, how people slept in the streets with the temperature below zero, or fought all night among themselves to secure seats at his readings. And we can tell him that there was not one in a thousand of this multitude that had ever read his works, or could have appreciated them when read. They were animated by the same sickly sort of enthusiasm that makes thousands on thousands rush forward to look at Grant or shake his hand. When Grant left the Presidency he could and did travel over the country without exciting any attention whatever. But since he has been socially tolerated, for political reasons, by royal personages in Europe, the enthusiasm is intense.

There was yet another reason more potent than this for Dickens's contempt. He saw in us a nation of thieves, and a poor lot of snobbish shop-keepers, plus the thief. He saw the brain of Europe plundered to enrich a class in this country possessed of just brain enough to cater to other men's taste, and of enough, and barely enough, moral nature to keep them out of the penitentiary. We beg pardon of the poor convicts—the publishers of the United States escape punishment, not through any regard for the moral code, but because the law protects the stealing instead of prosecuting the thieves.

Dickens visited the United States the first time to negotiate an international copyright law, and, to his amazement and disgust, the first to meet and welcome him were the thievish publishers, clad in purple and fine linen out of the very money they had stolen from him, their guest. And so dull is our moral sense as a nation that these scoundrels are regarded as honorable men, and so treated by the public and protected by law.

The average member of Congress is a man who never read a book. He would not be a member if he had. As he comes up through sample-rooms and lager-beer saloons, his moral sense is on a par with his intellectual attainments, and of course the world of science and literature is unknown to him; while the ten commandments, learned by rote, are only remembered to be broken.

As the representative represents, Dickens had and expressed a pretty fair estimate of our people.

A strange instance of walking during sleep occurred to a deceased Hampshire baronet. This gentleman was nearly driven to distraction by the fact that every night he went to bed in a shirt, and every morning awoke naked, without the smallest trace of the missing garment being discovered. Hundreds of shirts disappeared in this manner; and, as there was no fire in his room, it was impossible to account for the mystery. The servants believed their master to be mad; and even he began to fancy himself bewitched. In this conjuncture, he implored an intimate friend to sleep in the room with him, and ascertain by what manner of mysterious visitant his garment was so strangely removed. The friend accordingly took up his station in the haunted chamber. As the clock struck one, the unfortunate baronet rose from his bed, rekindled with a match the candle that had been extinguished, opened the door, and quitted the room. His astonished friend followed; saw him open in succession a variety of doors, and pass along several passages, traverse an open court, and eventually reach the stable-yard, where he pulled off his shirt and disposed of it in an old dung-heap, into which he thrust it by means of a pitchfork. Having finished this extraordinary operation, without taking the smallest heed of his friend, who stood looking on, and plainly saw that he was walking in his sleep, he returned to the house, carefully closed the doors, re-extinguished the light, and returned to bed, where, the following morning, he awoke, as usual, stripped of his shirt! The astonished eye-witness of this extraordinary scene, instead of apprising the sleep-walker of what had occurred, insisted that the following night a companion should sit up with him, choosing to have additional testimony to the truth of the statement he was about to make, and the same singular events were renewed, without the slightest deviation. The two witnesses accordingly divulged all they had seen to the baronet, who, though at first incredulous, became of course convinced when, proceeding to the stable-yard, several dozens of shirts were discovered, though it was surmised that as many more had been previously removed by one of the helpers, who probably looked upon the horde as stolen goods, concealed by some thief.

Sweetly sings a nineteenth century poet: "What will heal my bleeding heart?" Lint, man, lint; put on plenty of lint. Or hold a cold door-key to the back of your neck, press a small roll of paper under the end of your lip, and hold your left arm. This last remedy is to be used only in case your heart bleeds at the nose.

There is one thing Congress can take, and the country never protests against it or misses it, and that is a recess.

It is generally known to us middle-aged men, by "tradition," that breeches began to give place to trousers during the first decade of the present century, but it is not generally known that trousers were actually worn by London exquisites in the latter years of the last century. "It will be observed," says a writer in Artists' Pocket Magazine of Classic and Polite Literature, new series, volume 3, 1825, "from the following description of a dandy published in 1791, that trousers were then in fashion, and were then considered as a ridiculous article of dress: 'Advertisement Extraordinary!—Lost, last Saturday night, supposed in the lobby of the new theatre, an overgrown baby, who arrived but two days ago in town from the country. He had on a light-colored coat, with cape hanging carelessly over his shoulder; a pair of his father's breeches, which reached down to his ankles; and an old pair of his grandnanna's spectacles, which he converted into an opera glass. He laid on his sister's high-crowned hat, and his hair cut so short that you might observe his bare poll. Laughs a great deal; can swear a few fashionable oaths, but does not know how to write his name. Answers to the name of Master Jackey. As he had only sixpence a week pocket-money, it is feared he is detained in some cake shop for his reckoning; if so, all demands will be cheerfully paid if he is returned to his disconsolate parents.'"

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellow-men. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. HANNAH GIVING THANKS.

Out of the tiresome, dinful town,
Old, old Hannah—lame and poor—
Dwelt in a hut half tumbled down,
With the wolf too often at her door—
Her snow-white hair a holy crown,
For she never felt the cross she bore.

Some water, in a quaint old cup—
A table bare, a crust of bread—
She clasped her hands, and, looking up,
"All this—and Jesus, too," she said;
"And now, dear Lord, with Thee I sup,"
And reverently bowed her head.

Then broke the sun in golden floods,
Before it blushed the flying gloom;
Celestial anthems from the woods
With wondrous music filled the room;
And tender calls from songful broods
Came, mingled with divine perfume.

O Thou Beloved Friend, who cried
To friends who slept forgetfully—
Doubted by one, by one denied,
Kissed unto death by treachery—
Not all in vain that Thou hast died
While one of these believes in Thee.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1879.

EMILIE LAWSON.

THE WHITE MARE.

In the valley, about six miles above the forks of the Teton River, in northern Montana, is the Blackfoot Indian Agency. A high stockade of split logs standing on end, deeply sunk in the earth, encloses about two acres of ground. Heavy gates, opening outward, sway harshly on great iron hinges. They keep the Indians out of nights. A well of water is in the centre of the inclosure. Low log buildings, covered with earth, are scattered along the stockade. A couple of sand-hill cranes stood expectantly at the well, waiting patiently for a thirsty man to draw water. A white-tailed deer, with a broad blue ribbon on her neck, walked daintily around. Her cool black muzzle, studded with drops of dew, brilliant in the slanting rays of the rising sun, was slyly thrust into my hand, giving me a slight shock of surprise. By the stables stood a cow moose, standing so awkwardly with crooked legs and humped back, and the pendulous lip which Mark Twain calls "the Hapsburg," that her very ugliness excited my pity. A moose calf—her miniature in ugliness—stood stupidly at her side. Standing at the well, facing the grand Rocky Mountain range, I drew a bucket of water. Drinking deeply, repulsing the while the advances of the female crane with my moccasined foot, I got the reward of all men who reject the advances of the tender sex, and was soon engaged in repelling a furious attack on me by the long-legged twain. The attack was fierce. Their long, hard bills clashed viciously as they scornfully scolded me, and I was on the point of beating a disgraceful retreat when I heard, "Ho, Frank! come have a mouthful of whisky!" Recognizing the voice, I gladly left the cranes in undisputed possession of the water bucket, and walked across the parade to the store of the fur company.

Bidding Burr "Good morning," I declined the whisky on grounds unnecessary to state; yet the barrel had a yellow head, and—and—well, I knew the tap. I sat and talked to Burr, who was in charge of this extensive store, and before breakfast he went over it with me. A curious stock. Everything you could not find in an Eastern country store was here. As we walked he explained the business to me. Alluring? Not at all. He, looking at his watch, said: "We have yet time before breakfast to look at my mare."

The sudden change in the expression of the voice, the softening of the eyes, as this hard Indian trader spoke of his horse, excited my curiosity; and I went with him. He took me to a low log stable, the chinks carefully mudded, the open shutter and door well made and carefully fitted, so as to exclude the buffalo gnats in season. A few short, heavy chains, stretching from post to post, kept the horse in and the other animals out. With breast pushing against the topmost chain, with her handsome broad head thrust out, and alert ears cocked forward, stood a snow-white mare. She was looking at the moose with a surprised expression on her face, as much as to say: "Well, you have not grown handsomer during the night." Burr whistled, and with a joyful neigh the mare turned her head toward him and bade him welcome. The greeting between man and animal was almost tender. The mare rubbed her nose gently against his breast, and the man stood softly stroking her delicate neck. Unlocking the chains, they dropped. Burr walked toward the well. The mare, with dainty steps, arched neck, and flicking tail, followed behind him, or, caressingly advancing to his side, rubbed her body against his, as though the mere contact with the man was grateful to her. His arm, it seemed to me, instinctively lifted and dropped across her neck.

The two walked on together, unconscious of any incongruity. A bucket of water stood at the well. The high-bred creature smelt of it, and, detecting my previous presence, disdainfully refused to drink after me. Emptying the bucket, Burr drew another, and of this the mare drank slowly, her white face gradually sinking into the shallow vessel. All across the parade, on the return to the stable, the love scene was reenacted. As they passed me, the mare showed her aversion to a stranger by laying back her ears and thrusting out her white-toothed muzzle toward me in a vicious manner, causing me to step hastily back. They pass into the darkness of the stable. Burr comes out with a bucket, puts up the topmost chain, and goes after barley. The mare, with outstretched head, looks after him with kind eyes. Again she saw me, and, with wide opened mouth, reached around the post to pay me the attentions of her dislike. Returning to the stable with a full bucket of barley, Burr passed in. I heard him pour the grain into the feed-box; I heard him speak to the mare as his "dear girl," and I heard him—kiss her.

A singular gentleness had come over this hard man, steeled to human suffering and woe, whose business it was to impoverish Indians, to destroy their morals, to brutify them with the devil alcohol. He sat at the breakfast table, silently, with his antelope steaks and trout untasted before him, the softened face, I wondered what was the story. So I asked: "Burr, why do you love that white mare?" He looked kindly at me, and, with a sad smile, replied: "To-night, after the men are in bed, I will tell you the story." Then briskly: "Frank, this is not business. Eat, my boy, then clear out, and fish or hunt. You will find some fool hens in the big willow thicket about five miles below here. I saw them the other day. Shoot some. To-night we will have a feast, and I will open my two last bottles of sherry, and we will talk." His face hardened. The cold, deadly look returned to the gray eyes, and our breakfast was soon finished.

Shouldering my rifle, I stepped out of the stockade and slowly walked down the valley. On the distant hillsides antelope grazed; down the valley before me I could see a few deer running for cover to the willows by the stream. Now and then a grouse rose before me and flew rapidly away. Resisting all temptation to shoot at anything, I walked steadily on. Climbing a hill, I sat on a rock and musingly gazed at the vast plains to the northeast, at the foothills of the range, and at the rugged, rocky range beyond. I love the Rocky Mountains, and never tire of their face. I wasted hours in looking and in thinking of the many tales I had heard of the range. When the sun was high above me I started for the willows. There I neatly shot the heads off of six grouse. Then jointing a light trout pole, I whipped the clear pools of the south fork of the Teton, and was soon rewarded by a string of fine half-pound trout. Then came the pleasant walk back through the cool, dry air, and over the crispy grass of the north. What a luxury life was in the valley of the Teton! I turned my spoils over to the smiling Indian woman who acted as cook for Burr. The rest of the day I spent on horseback, running antelope with a lot of half-blood Indians. At eight o'clock supper was served and eaten. The sherry was brought out, and I scattered on the table a handful, my last, of Rosa Conchas that had never paid duty, and as we sat smoking Burr told me this story:

"In the fall of 1863, I thought it might be profitable to start a trading-post in the Yellowstone Valley. Learning from the Blackfeet that the Sioux were camped on the south side of the river, I determined to ride over and see what arrangements I could make with them. I crossed the Belt Mountains, and, riding down the valley, was soon at their camp, I on the north side of the river, they on the south. I sat on my horse and hailed the camp. No answer. I could see plenty of Indians walking about, and again I hailed. No answer. I shouted myself hoarse, and the only notice taken of me was by an old huck, who walked to the river bank, looked at me, made an insulting gesture, and slowly walked off. I went there to trade, and, having got angry at the treatment, though I well knew that I ought to leave the valley at once, I, like a fool, resolved to cross the stream and brave the danger. So I forded and rode into the camp. I spoke to no one; no one spoke to me. The sullen braves turned their backs on me as I rode up the street. The young girls looked curiously at me. Riding slowly along, I cooled rapidly. I saw that I was not wanted, and I at last fully realized that I was in danger. I did not dare to ride to the south, out of the camp, nor did I have courage enough to attempt to recross the river.

"Before me stood a great tent made of buffalo skins. It was the largest I had ever seen. I halted, dismounted, and stood silently at my horse's head. No one noticed me. Indians went past me, apparently not seeing me. At last a young woman came and stood before me. Looking right into my eyes, she said: 'What do you want?' I looked her coldly in the face and made no reply. Smiling, she asked: 'What brings you here?' Steadily I gazed into her eyes and was voiceless. She left me and disappeared into the great lodge. Soon an Indian warrior in full paint, with bow and strung arrow in his hands, came to me. Speaking Blackfoot, he said: 'Why are you in this camp?' To him I replied: 'I wish to trade with you.' More men came. They took my horse, and seizing hold of my arm they led me into the great lodge. Here I was seated and a council was held. I sat and listened to them talk of what it was best to do with so presumptuous a white man. Some were in favor of trading. The large majority of the Indians were in favor of torturing me. It was soon decided that I should be tortured; and they sat and discussed the many methods. After a two days' talk it was decided to burn me. I was in a strange condition mentally. I would listen to a plan of torture as though it was some other man they were talking about; and I would comment to myself on that plan as giving the chap but little chance for his life. But when the dusky brave, who talked Blackfoot, told me that I was to die by fire the next day, I understood perfectly that I was the man they had been talking about, and I replied: 'I know it.' Clustering around me, they asked if I had understood all the talk. 'Yes; I had.' Then why not answer the maiden when she spoke to you? 'I came, not to talk to squaws, but to trade with men.' No use; I could do nothing by soft talk, and, having played my hand, finally resigned myself to my fate.

"I noticed that the girl who had first spoken to me in front of the lodge was watching me. She would quickly glance at me, and then drop her eyes on the buckskin shirt she was embroidering with Crow hair. Several times I noticed this, and once I replied with a smile. The lodge emptied. All were gone except the girl. She quickly came to my side, apparently to refold some buffalo robes, and in a whisper said: 'You are to die to-morrow. To-night I will have the best horse in the camp saddled and standing on the outside of the lodge. I will have the tent cut from the outside. You jump through, mount, and ride for your life. You may escape. You will burn if you stay.' Then, with a smile, 'The mare is mine. She is the fastest animal in the valley of the Yellowstone. I give her to you.' She left me, and quickly resumed her work. As she wove the hair of many Crow scalp-locks into the shirt I sat looking thankfully at her. She never looked at me again. As I saw a chance for my life my heart beat so loudly that I thought it would be heard. I calmed my face and waited. I ate fairly of supper. I smoked a pipe. All were very kind and attentive to me. Night was passing away, and still the Indians lingered, looking at the man they were to burn on the morrow. I leaned back against the tent to rest myself, when I felt a hand gently pushing me forward. Sitting whistling, I felt the point of a knife come through and strike my neck. I did not flinch. I could feel the blood trickle down my back. I could feel the knife carefully drawn down until it hit the ground. Still whistling, I waited, my heart thumping, my blood on fire—waited a minute to give whoever cut the tent time to escape. Then grasping my heart and nerves for an instant, I gathered myself, and turned backward through the opening. Instantly jumping to my feet, I vaulted into the saddle that was on the back of a white horse that stood there, and in the midst of yells, of rifle shots, of a pack of howling dogs, we rushed out of the camp. It seemed to me as though a thousand horsemen were in pursuit of me instantly. We galloped up the river to a bend I had seen. Dashing in, we forded it under a fire that made the water boil around us, and were out of water, and on the level land to the north of the river, before any of the Sioux were half way across. Striking the trail to the Bozeman Pass, I took it, and knowing it, pushed boldly on, and though hotly pursued, my horse outlasted theirs, and I escaped. I never drew rein until I dismounted to the west of the pass. The girl saved me. With any other horse I should have been recaptured and burned. I have not got the girl. The love I have for her the mare has instead. I returned to my post, and made no trade in the Yellowstone that year.

"Again. Last winter the snow was on the ground in January, and for three days I had been hunting or running antelope. The sun was very bright, and my eyes hurt me. I saw specks floating about; little chains with small links were constantly before me. My eyes burned smartly when I returned to the agency. Daily while hunting I had seen the low, black clouds in the north that indicate the formation or marshalling of the winds of the frozen north. Daily the south wind swept them beyond the northern horizon; but the next morning found them looming portentously in the northern sky. On my return to the agency I found a runner had just got in from Belly River, in British America, with important news for me. It was necessary that I should go up at once. I started the next morning. My eyes hurt dreadfully.

"I always go to the Belly River, when the snow is on the ground, by the way of the Sweet Grass Hills, and there I camp one night. One side of the hills is always bare of snow, and there is a spring of good water on the northern side of the centre hill. A strong south wind was blowing when I started, but by noon I saw the clouds to the north suddenly rise up. I knew that the marshaling of the north winds was completed, and they were eager for the assault on the soft south wind. On came the black cloud. The south wind still blew fiercely, but it could not stem the assault from the arctic region. Birds flew south before the storm; antelope and deer were running for shelter. I had reached my camping ground, and stood looking far off to the north, seeing the landmarks disappear one by one as the head of the 'blizzard' reached them and shrouded them in its icy breath. A calm. Then, with a mighty rush and a loud noise, the head of the 'blizzard' swept past me. The air was filled with particles of ice that cut through almost horizontally, and seemed as if they would never fall. Colder, ever colder, grew the wind, and denser the air as the ice particles thickened. I sought shelter in the rocks. Buckling the clothing on the mare I turned her loose, knowing that she would not leave me. Then I lay down on my blankets, and, wrapping my heaver cloak around me, I tried to sleep. I began thinking, and could not sleep. The buffalo had not come south that winter, and the wolves were gaunt and hungry. As they follow a horseman over the plains in the summer, so they do in the winter, only more of them, and those great, gaunt famine-breeders, the gray and black ones, go in largely increased numbers. I had had a pack of them at my heels all day, and now they cropped up in my thoughts.

"Finally I slept. When I awoke it was dark. Holding up my naked hand, I felt the icy sweat of the 'hizzard' strike sharply against it. The roar of the wind still continued. I waited, it seemed to me, for hours, when I suddenly felt my mare paw my breast. I spoke kindly to her, saying she had made a mistake. Soon she pawed me again, and I arose to find that all was dark, that I could not see the white mare. Alarmed, I struck a match under my cloak and looked down to see the blaze. I saw nothing, but the match burned my fingers. With a desolating despondency I realized the fact that the glare of the snow encountered for the past few days had made me snow-blind; that I was fifty miles from the nearest house, and unable to see; that a furious storm was raging.

"Stupid, almost wild with horror, I thought I could hear the snuffing of the wolves, and the soft patter of their feet below the wild shriek of the arctic winds. I was simply benumbed with terror. The mare recalled me to myself by rubbing her cold muzzle against my face. She saw that something was wrong with me, but what she could not comprehend. I resolved to saddle her, to feed her, and, after she ate, to mount and let her take her own course. So I fed her the remaining measure of barley, and waited for her to eat. Then I saddled up, and, without bridling, mounted, and, wrapping my cloak around me, sat steadily in the saddle, awaiting the frisky action of the high-strung animal. She stood trembling until I told her to go. Then I felt her turn until the ice drops struck obliquely on my right side and hack, and she rapidly walked off. Not a motion or movement did she make to discompose my seat. Wrapped in my cloak, with hood drawn over my face, warm and encouraged with hope, I patiently sat on the horse. I could now hear the snarling of the wolves, and my only fear was that they, rendered desperate by hunger, might attack the mare. I dismissed the thought—would not think of it. If they did attack us, we were lost; if they did not, I thought we were safe. All day the 'blizzard' raged and tore icily around and on us. The mare walked rapidly or cantered slowly on. It seemed to me that we had been traveling for days, for weeks even, when the mare stopped and neighed loudly. Reaching forward, I felt the rough stockade; dismounting, I felt the hinges of the gate. Loudly I called. Then I took my rifle from the saddle, and rapidly I handled cartridges into it. At last a sleepy voice from the inside called 'Who is there?' I answered, 'Burr; and I am dead snow-blind. Come to me.' They came, and I was saved—saved for the second time by the white mare. Do you wonder that I, not having the Sioux maiden, love her mare?"

I sat by the bright fire, with my feet high on a stool, and did not answer—simply sat and smoked, and thought of the girl, of the man, of the mare. Leaving me thinking, Burr went to sleep in his chair with a softened face.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

His Majesty the Late Emperor Norton.

All the wise men and all the funny men of the press have been straining their ponderous and heavy wits to make a pun and a successor to the dead Norton. Twenty-three years ago, by a stroke of bad luck in the purchase of a cargo of rice, a prosperous, and, so far as we know, an honorable, and, so far as we then observed, a strong-minded business man lost heart and courage and drifted away to seeming idiocy; not an entire loss of reason, that entitled him to be shut up among the insane, but a harmless mania that impelled him to think he was Emperor of America and Protector of Mexico. He was a beggar, and sought alms from his old acquaintances; not an ordinary mendicant who with extended palm sat by the way-side or tramped from door to door, but an artful, ingenious beggar, who asked of his subjects such support as was denied him by reason of the fact that his government, like many others, was not recognized, and his crown, like that of many others, was but an ornament. In his own opinion, he had a divine right to be maintained at the expense of others; to lead a useless, vagabond life, like other imperial mendicants; to get money and be supported, like other kings out of a place. And who shall say that the Emperor was not right? Who shall presume to question the sanity of a mind that for twenty-three years enabled its body to live in luxury and idleness without physical or mental toil? A man who ate well without pay; who, in all those long years, never missed a meal or paid a cent; who slept well, and never experienced a day of illness; who dressed well, with epaulets of gold braid, with hat of plume and feathers, with baton of office, a knobbed and garbled stick; who died in a painless way; who was translated, let us hope, to Abraham's bosom; whose remains were followed to the grave by many friends, and over whose body the gentler ones laid flowers and shed their sympathetic brine; who leaves behind him the memory of no wrongs, and of whom no one tries to treasure an unkind thought!

Is there to-day a crowned king in all the world who could go down to his grave thus regretted? or who could lay off crown and sceptre under which less of crimes or mistakes had been committed? Would not the proud Czar most gladly lay aside the honors inherited from all the Romanoffs if he could be reconciled to queen and heir, and drive from his affrighted imagination the horrors and fears of impending Nihilism, and lie himself down beside his brother and his peer at Lone Mountain if he knew that heirs and subjects would lovingly lay their flowers upon his tomb as the tribute to his well spent life? And that other Emperor, who has waded through seas of blood to unify German States and build a great German Empire upon bayonets and debt, dead peasants and dismembered States—would it not have been better for him and for humanity that twenty-three years ago he had lost a cargo of rice and been an amiable mendicant for sausage and lager among his countrymen in San Francisco? What one of the crowned kings of earth is so much happier to-day than the poor old dead Norton? Not the cold, heartless, unhappy Humbert; not the boy-king of Spain, at whose throat the assassin's knife is a constant menace; not the exiled Bourbon of France, nor the unhappy Empress whose only consolation is to kiss the bloody sand where his to her most dear life went out under the stab of the assegai; not the nasty old King of Holland, nor yet the most virtuous and excellent gentleman who wears the crown of Belgium. Going beyond the grave where our Emperor has gone, where in all of history do we find, or where, wandering in all of heaven or hell or Fiddler's Green, will the dead Norton find any of his sovereign brothers to whom he may not say: "I am one of you. I had no more vain pretensions; I assumed no more absurd imperial airs; I committed no more crimes; I perpetrated no more mistakes; and the evil I did not do more than compensate for all the good any of you ever accomplished." He may proudly stand with Charlemagne, the imperial Augustus, Frederick Barbarossa, Cæsar, Napoleon, and all the great Peters, and Fredericks, and Johns, and all that wore tiaras or crowns, and say: "I brought as much of good from California as you brought from Europe; and I brought less of evil, for with me came—up or down—no groans, nor tears, nor blood."

Among ourselves, too; among our most brilliant of professional, and most successful of business men; among our millionaires; among us all who think, and plod, and strain, and struggle to get fame or coin—mostly coin; among our politicians, who lie and prosper, fawn and grow fat; among our editors, our preachers, our gamblers, our thieves; among us all, who has led for the past twenty-three years so happy a life as the Emperor Norton; and who among us, from the most eminent of our reverend fathers in God down to Old Crisis, has a better hope of a glorious immortality in the world to come? We wise ones—wise in our own conceit—are apt to think, and in fact we do think we think, that ours is the better way, ours the higher enjoyment, ours the straight and narrow path that leads through goodness up to God, or through honor on to fame. We affect to pity these poor, straggling tramps along the highways and byways of life; and as we see them drifting aside, loitering by the way, not attempting to gather shells, not endeavoring to lay up treasures, we criticise and blame them. We are not quite convinced in our own minds that they are not, after all, the true philosophers, and that it is not they who have carelessly stumbled upon the stone we have been so diligently and toilsomely and fruitlessly endeavoring to find. Personally, the writer has often dreamed that he should like to lay aside his identity, and become a tramp, a wandering vagabond, a veritable homeless, friendless, conscienceless, unambitious, ragged, cheeky tramp; an itinerant summer snail, crawling through the country from kitchen to hay-stack, begging, sleeping, dreaming; sparring the world for a living, plucking forbidden oranges in the groves of Los Angeles, stealing the great purple clusters of forbidden grapes in vineyards where they grow, smouching the blood-red pomegranate, and then stealing away to the seashore, to rob the rocks of mussels and chase the fleeing clam; migrating with the seasons—northward in the summer, to the fields where peanuts and sweet potatoes grow, where the succulent green corn gives up its sweetest treasures before the campfire, as we gipsies, dozing and waking, snore and tell our tales—our tales of outwitting shrewd men, of living without labor, of braving women and servant-maids in our raids for meat and bread, of our escapes from the only thing we fear—imprisonment with toil. And when old age and failing faculties of mind give society its triumph over us, and we are worn and weary with the conflict, even then the advantage is with us, we throw ourselves upon its bosom, and, as errant loafers, we welcome the asylum where we may pass our days in idleness, with bread; and when death comes we pass in our chips, conscious that in the game of life none carry away from it more winnings than we.

The duty of rejecting manuscripts into which their writers have put much of earnest effort and honest desire to please, and which they naturally regard with a tenderness like that of a mother for her child whose very faults are dearer to her than the virtues of others, is the most thankless and ungracious that an editor is compelled to perform. It is a duty that he can not execute without giving pain where he is most unwilling to wound, and where, in many cases, with whatever of gentle consideration he perform it, he will arouse unjust resentment. He is not permitted to hope that his contributor will approve his literary judgment, or understand without personal explanation that countless other than literary considerations determine his action. The utmost that he can expect is that his dictum will be endured. But when, expecting nothing but silent or sullen suzerainty, he finds cheerful and amiable acquiescence; when he finds gentleness answered with civility, and goodwill responding to politeness, he feels that kindness—even of the cruel sort—is not utterly wasted, and that even members of the genus irritabile vatum are not so black as they love to paint themselves. In illustration of these random remarks, and in order to afford the reader a not unpleasant glimpse into the interior life of journalism, we venture to subjoin a private note from a clever young woman, some of whose verses we had the unhappiness to decline—an unhappiness which she has generously dissipated; for who could regret an act of which so pleasant a letter was the consequence? In the hope that we shall be pardoned for the liberty, we present this pretty letter as a model of modesty and amiability, commending it as such to others whose favors on similar occasions have been distinguished by superior asperity and inferior grace.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT—DEAR SIR:—My poor, rejected "rhymes" have lain at the Postoffice for some time, and reached me only to-day, together with your little note of condolence. I can not resist the temptation to answer and say a few words in defense of my taste, though you probably do not expect or care to hear from me again. Your kind little note amused me beyond measure—and touched me, too—with its tender consideration for my feelings, with the almost unconscious reproach hidden in its refinement. I have always supposed an editor to be a kind of literary porcupine, and was not prepared for the tender handling I received. Many thanks; only please don't think me disappointed or mortified at my failure. I think I have too much poetry in my soul, am too great a lover of Tennyson and Moore, of Browning and Buchanan, to ever consider my verses more than they really are—cheap imitations, or rather crude attempts, which not even English prosody could bring to perfection; for the "fire of genius" does not smoulder underneath. My writing to you first was only a piece of girlish impulse. Please forgive the infliction, and respect my foolish little secret. Begging pardon for this, I am,

Very respectfully yours,

"Success is measured by the difficulties which make milestones for its only avenue. Success is no more success without struggle than love is love without crosses." In this manner mused Mr. John Swinton as he clasped hands with Denis Kearney. But the great and robust commoner—who needs no prefix to his identity—hissed between his honest lips as he turned on his haughty heel: "The hell-bound spy of capital! He wears an unsoiled shirt. By all the spoons of Butler Ben, I'll trail him in the dirt!" The incompleteness of the poem is due to the sudden flight of "ours" through the window, propelled by Mr. Swinton's fiercely un-Democratic number seven boot. The foregoing is unfortunately a lie, but posterity will say, mournfully: "It might have been."

A sulphuric acid spring has been discovered on one of the Farallone islands, and if a company is not speedily incorporated to make government brandy on that island it will prove that the season of our vigor is past, and that we deserve all the ruin Chinese cheap labor can bring upon us.

The following are the reflections of James Anthony Froude on the uses of a landed gentry for England. Had the Irish gentry been willing to remain upon and of the soil, the present condition of Ireland might have been different: "A nation, it is said, which does not respect its past will have no future which deserves respect. Great Britain is what it is to-day because thirty generations of strong, brave men have worked with brain and hand to make it so. Nothing great ever came to men in their sleep. The fields now so clean and neatly fenced were once morasses or forests of scrub, or were littered with boulder stones. Our laws, our literature, our constitution, our empire, were built together out of materials equally unpromising. We, when we were born, came into possession of a fair inheritance. We are bound to remember from whom it came, and not to think because we have got it we have ourselves only to thank for it. You may test the real worth of any people by the feelings which they entertain for their forefathers. With the Romans, reverence for ancestors was part of the national religion. It was something like a religion here not long ago, and when the nineteenth century has sufficiently admired itself for its steam-engines and electric telegraphs, something of the same feeling, we will hope, may revive. Every step of what is called progress for the last thousand years has been the work of some man or group of men. We talk of the tendencies of an age. The tendencies of an age, unless it be a tendency to mere death and rottenness, means the energy of superior men who guide and make it; and of these superior men, who have played their parts among us at successive periods, the hereditary families are the monuments. Trace them back to the founders, you generally find some one whose memory ought not to be allowed to die. And usually, also, in the successive generations of such a family you find more than an average of high qualities, as if there was some transmission of good blood, or as if the fear of discrediting honorable lineage was a check on folly and a stimulus to exertion. In Scotland the family histories are inseparable from the national history. How many Campbells, for instance, have not established a right to be remembered with honor? How many hundred Scotch families are there not who have produced, I will not say one distinguished man, but a whole series of distinguished men, distinguished in all branches—as soldiers, seamen, statesmen, lawyers, or men of letters? It is true the highest names of all will not be found in the Peerages and Baronetages. The highest of all, as Burns says, take their patent of nobility direct from Almighty God. Those patents are not made out for posterity, and the coronets which men bestow on the supremely gifted among them are usually coronets of thorns. No titled family remains as a monument for Knox or Shakspeare. They shine alone like stars. They need no monument, being themselves immortal. A Dukedom of Stratford for the descendants of Shakspeare would be like a cap and bell upon his bust. Of Knox you have not so much as a tomb—you do not know where his bones are lying. The burial place of Knox is the heart of Protestant Scotland."

There is no good reason why San Francisco should not have better horseflesh than its stables seem to hold. If one may judge by what is ordinarily seen in the Park, our horses are not up to the high standard we claim for ourselves in that line. Possibly the tendency to own fast horses has put it out of our desire to own beautiful ones. This is not saying that the horses seen in our streets, and in the Park do not number a great many handsome, stylish ones, with brilliant action, and all other desirable qualities. But it is certainly true that the "perfectly appointed turnouts" of our wealthier citizens are fewer than they ought to be, and fewer than they will be when our rich men come to consider more the pardonable pride of their wives and daughters, and to think less of their own chances of winning with fast trotters.

It transpires that Mr. Kearney's trip to the Eastern States has a more national political significance than was at first suspected. There is now very little doubt that the most carefully matured plan was concocted long before the great agitator left San Francisco, in which some of the ablest minds in the nation had a part. This plan was—and is—no less a project than the calling of a National Constitutional Convention, to which the conservative States will be forced to accede in order to secure themselves even minority representation. The programme has been carefully prepared, and foreshadows an early call for an election, forced through Congress by Mr. Kearney's numerous admirers in both houses. Mr. Kearney is to be chosen permanent president, and Mr. Ben Butler is to head the list of vice-presidents. Among Californians interested in the scheme are said to be Messrs. De Young, Kallioch, Pickering, Stratman, Smith, Jones, Robinson, and Brown. It is believed that the plan for a new constitution prepared by Mr. Alfred Paraff, recently of Valparaiso, has been passed upon by the committee, and will be carried by the majority known to be in favor of the measure. A provision for the transmutation of the entire yearly product of the Peoria lead mines into gold is objected to by Mr. U. S. Grant; but, as that gentleman is promised the presidency of the company to be engaged in the work, with assurances that the Kearney vote will help him out in his fight for the poundmastership of Galena, there is hope that he may be placated; the chance that he may be only a hitch in the programme.

A BROKEN BRIDGE.

CHAPTER I.

Miss Thyra Tynotte, etat forty, was a charming lady of very decided convictions, but no belief was more firmly rooted in her mind than her faith in the utter and entire desirability of Germantown as a place of residence. Philadelphia proper, of which fair city it was at once a suburb and an ornament, was well enough as a mart in which to transact business, but Germantown was the one spot upon earth wherein to make a home.

Death, however, had made sad havoc in her own household. She, her half-sister Mary, and an elderly female servant were the sole surviving occupants of her father's old homestead. But more grievous than the certainty of death was her anxious suspense as to the fate of her half-brother Henry. He with Mary, both many years younger than Thyra, were the children of her father's second marriage. Orphaned at an early age, she had cherished them with more than an elder sister's love, and had devotedly filled the vacant place of their dead mother. Upon attaining his majority, Henry "realized" his portion of the estate and went to Chicago; there, wasting in reckless dissipation both his health and his modest patrimony, he finally found himself upon a bed of sickness and overwhelmed with debt. Thyra came to his rescue, nursed him tenderly, paid off his obligations, and remained until he was restored to health. This much accomplished, and unable to persuade him to accompany her, she returned to her beloved Germantown, in the full belief that her brother had begun a new life, alike worthy of himself and his name. For a time his frequent letters confirmed this faith; then the intervals of neglect on his part grew longer and longer, until finally he ceased to write at all. For two years she had not heard from him, and the most diligent inquiry only revealed the fact that he had again fallen in with his former dissipated associates and had left Chicago. This was the one great trouble of Thyra's more recent life, and at times the torture of suspense grew almost intolerable. But the natural buoyancy of her disposition asserting itself, she again appeared charming and radiant as of old. Her innocent pride of name—her father had been an eminent judge of national celebrity—sat well upon her. You saw at a glance that she was a thorough-bred lady—perhaps a trifle too stately in bearing, just a shade too positive in opinion, but a lady—kind of heart and gentle of manner. Every line of her face and form, every fold of her simple yet dainty dress, evinced the innate refinement of her nature.

Such at least was the estimate of an observant stranger who met Thyra while taking a stroll at the close of a warm day in midsummer. He was leaning carelessly upon the hand-rail of a once ornamental but now old and very dilapidated rustic foot-bridge, which, at but a slight elevation from the water, spanned a wide and shallow stream. Idly speculating upon the rotten and unsafe condition of the frail structure, his attention was attracted by the obviously insecure position of the slender mimic pier which supported the centre. It was simply a great, gnarled root, or curiously twisted bough, in whose grotesque distortions his fancy found some resemblance to the figure 8. But the appearance of Thyra, emerging from the neighboring woods, dispelled his idle fancies, and he formed the estimate already mentioned as he beheld her following the winding foot-path down the slight hill to the creek.

The bridge was just wide enough for two to pass conveniently, so he maintained his ground. As she neared the centre, where he was waiting, he felt that the vibrations of the light woodwork were accompanied by a slight sagging, which soon became very decided. She was within a few feet of his position when, with a violent lurch, his half of the bridge gave way and he was thrown into the stream. Evidently not unaccustomed to sudden emergencies, he quickly gained his feet, and, standing knee-deep in the water, looked upward with a countenance expressive of angry astonishment rather than alarm. But either his struggles or the falling scantlings had knocked the insecure pier—already out of place—completely awry. Thyra, to her horror and dismay, felt that her fragile support was also tottering. She instinctively turned to fly, but, before she could take a step, the remaining ruin sank down with a crash and she was precipitated, awkwardly enough, into the strong arms of the stalwart stranger. The force of the shock fairly staggered him; but by a manful effort he contrived to hold his own, and then stood stock still, hesitating as to what he ought to do next. This manner of supporting a lady was clearly a novel experience and altogether out of his usual line. All his feelings of gallantry and regard for the sex were opposed to placing her upon her feet in the water, yet propriety demanded that she should be released from his close embrace as soon as possible. Finally he inquired, confusedly:

"To which bank shall I take you, madam?"

Poor Thyra, dazed and terrified, could only cry in her fright:

"Oh, carry me back! Oh, carry me back!"

"To old Virginia shore," he added feebly, in bewildered refrain, as he moved for the side from which she had started.

Heedfully balancing himself, he waded through the water with slow and cautious step. But, spite of his utmost care, he was several times nearly overturned by the loose and slippery stones which lined the bottom of the creek. Never a cry, however, issued from the lips of his firmly clasped charge, not even when once he barely, by the most desperate exertions, saved himself from falling. "Plenty of sand," he muttered to himself, approvingly. Thyra thought he referred to the bed of the stream.

Reaching dry land he awkwardly, yet tenderly, deposited his fair burden upon a rustic settee which handily stood near the ruins of the bridge. After a moment's rest, Thyra instinctively rose to shake out her disordered drapery, but immediately fell back with a low cry of pain.

"I trust you are not hurt?" inquired her companion in misfortune.

She again rose upon her feet, but very cautiously this time, and doubtfully limped a few steps forward.

"I fear I have been slightly bruised," she answered, simply. "Oh, how shall I get home!"

"Permit me to go for a carriage."

"A carriage!" she exclaimed. "Why, the only conveyance that could follow the path through the woods is a wheelbarrow—and I have no fancy to try one," she added, smiling. The stranger appeared nonplussed for the moment. Then, significantly stretching out his powerful arms, he looked doubtfully into her face. Thyra, with a faint blush, glanced keenly at the man before her; for the first time she fairly took in his general appearance. His dress bespoke a man sufficiently well-to-do; his figure, unusual strength and power of endurance; his features, bronzed by exposure at some previous stage of his life, indicated great firmness, combined with a high degree of energy, tempered, however, by a twinkling eye and a good-humored expression of mouth which at once inspired confidence. His short, iron-gray hair—he had lost his hat in the fall—revealed a head of fine proportions. Taken altogether, he was a noble-looking specimen of the genus homo, apparently about forty-five years of age, and in the vigorous possession of sterling qualities of mind and body. Thyra's hasty inspection was evidently satisfactory. She felt not only entirely secure, but also that here was a man over whom, in a small way, she could safely tyrannize. So she limped toward him, replying, somewhat dryly, to his significant look and gesture:

"Many thanks. I question neither your strength nor your good-will; but one arm will suffice this time, if you please. Kindly permit me to lean upon it until we can reach my bome, just beyond those woods." She pointed in the direction of the path down which she had come, and added, sharply: "Be quick, or you will catch your death of cold in those wet clothes."

Without more ado, she made a virtue of necessity, and bore her slight weight confidently upon the stout support extended to her. Then, spite of her pain, she became very gracious and grateful, as they threaded their way through the shadowy woods and up the glistening evening road to her door. Her bearing gave no token of the adventure just passed, though it had not been without a spice of danger and an odd admixture of the awkward and the ludicrous.

But the secure shelter of her chamber once attained, she carefully reviewed the entire affair. As she pictured to herself the figure presented to the uplifted eyes of the astonished stranger when she sprang downward into his arms, she suddenly blushed red as fire.

"At all events," she cried out with a start, "I had on my new silk hose," and then burst into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, which showed very decided symptoms of soon becoming hysterical.

CHAPTER II.

While anxiety as to the fate of her brother was the great trouble of Thyra's later life, another of almost equal proportions was looming up in the near future. Her sister Mary, in making repeated visits to her Aunt Laville, her mother's sister, who resided in Philadelphia, had fallen in love. This, too, with a man of whom Thyra, although she had not seen him, strongly disapproved. In spite of her pride in ancestors of revolutionary fame, who, if they fought for anything, fought to establish the fact that all men were born free and equal, Judge Tynotte's eldest daughter was at heart somewhat of an aristocrat. Her secluded life and the exclusive character of the society in which she moved, had done much to foster this feeling. Hence she could not behold unmoved the spectacle of her darling sister sacrificing herself in favor of a man whom she held to be far inferior to that sister in the social scale. As soon as it came to her ears that such a sacrifice was contemplated, she at once betook herself to Mrs. Laville's abode, and the too willing victim was transferred to her home, in disgrace. The undesirable lover was absent from the city at this time. All unaware of the opposition to his suit, he had resolved that upon his return the elder sister should be apprised of it in due form. Thyra, informed to this effect by the blushing culprit, was busily engaged in fortifying her camp, strengthening its defenses against both assault and siege, and more especially in weakening the power of the enemy, at least in so far as his influence over her sister was concerned.

Her fall into the creek had in no wise diminished her ardor, and on the morning after the accident she renewed her labors with unabated zeal. The two sisters, after breakfast, had sought the cool shade of the breezy piazza. Thyra—in deference to her slight injuries—half-reclining in a bamboo easy-chair, was, in Mary's phrase, "doing the severely maternal."

"Oh, Ty!" Mollie exclaimed, impatiently, "is there never to be peace between us, nor any more rest for poor me? If you only knew him, I am sure you would admire him."

"Knew him?" echoed Thyra, "what do you know of him, or of his connections, yourself?"

"That is just the question I was about to put to you," retorted the younger sister. "What do you know of him, you cruel Ty, that you should be so horribly prejudiced, so wickedly unjust?"

This was an arrow shot straight at the weakest joint of Thyra's armor. The eldest daughter professed to have inherited, in some degree, her father's judicial mind, and "Fiat justitia, ruat cælum" was her device. However lightly others of her sex might have regarded it, to her the accusation of willful injustice seemed tantamount to insult, and she resented it accordingly.

"What do I know of him?" she uttered in a determined voice, "I know just this much. He is not fit to be your husband, nor my brother-in-law. Nor shall he be either, if I can prevent it."

"Oh, Ty! you will break my heart! Indeed you will," cried the love-sick girl. Then she added in coaxing, pleading tones, "Why will you not be a good, comfortable, loving sister Ty, just as you used to be? Let Jim visit us here, and see whether you will not learn to like him as well as I do—that is, almost as well; not quite, or we should become jealous, and be as hateful to each other as we are now."

Thyra stared at her in mild surprise.

"Nonsense," she finally said, smiling, "leave off twisting those vines, dear, and come here beside me. I want to talk to you very seriously."

"Oh, dear!" sighed the little one, who was fond of a mild bit of slang, "now I'm in for it." Nevertheless she obediently drew up her low rocking-chair close to the big bamboo.

"Now, my darling," continued the elder, "I really want to make you think."

"As if I never thought," pouted Miss Heedless.

"I am going to tell you," began her mentor, in a grave tone, "what I know about James Hetherton, the man whom you think you love."

Mollie was on the alert in a moment, ready to do valiant battle, if needs be, in defense of her lover.

"Long before you were born," the speaker proceeded, "Job Gedway, the grandfather of James Hetherton, was the keeper of a low tavern on the outskirts of Germantown and a miserable drunkard. Failing in his wretched calling, he removed to the city with his wife—poor thing, she was not to blame—and his two children. One of these was a boy named Joe, known even at that early age as a wild and graceless ruffian. In the city, as I learned when older, for I was a mere child when all this transpired, the family went from bad to worse, until they sank out of the sight of decent people. Previous to this, the reckless Joe, in 1849, ran away from his home, in company with another young desperado, and made his way to California. Later, upon his sister's death, he sent for her only child. This child, born in the slums of Philadelphia, familiar from earliest infancy with all that is vile, he adopted as his own. This son, the cherished pupil of the unprincipled adventurer, Joseph Gedway, the chosen partner of his wicked schemes, is James Hetherton, the man whom you say you have chosen to be your husband."

Mollie, who, during the latter portion of this narration, had found it almost impossible to remain quiet, sprang indignantly to her feet.

"Oh, Ty! sister Ty!" she cried. "How can you sit there and calmly repeat such wicked lies—base, cruel, cowardly lies? Joseph Gedway is a hero, and my Jim is good and true."

Thyra, drawing herself up in her stately manner, was about to reply to this passionate outburst, when Mollie interrupted her with an earnestness and decision as novel as irresistible.

"Do not speak another word," she uttered rapidly, "until you have heard me out. Joseph Gedway was driven from his home by his drunken father. It was to get gold for the relief of his poor mother that he started for California. After cruel toil, and enduring for two weary years such hardships as we now can scarcely bear to read of, he reached the Sacramento River. There, a fever, the result of his trials and exposure, brought him to the verge of the grave. For tedious months he was compelled to lie idle, but the moment he was able to get about, he renewed the fierce struggle. Then, when on the fair way to success, he was robbed by false comrades and left by them for dead. Indomitable of will, after a second long and dangerous illness, he courageously started out afresh, as soon as he could place one foot before the other. This time fortune favored him. He succored the last hours of his dying sister, and brought up her son an honor to himself and to humanity. That is my Joe Gedway, and that is the stuff which made the real California pioneer. It was true men, men bold and determined as himself, that built up the new country—not the miserable drunkards, desperadoes, and riff-raff generally of your novels. I ought to know, for Jim has told me all about it."

Mollie, flushed with generous excitement, stood in front of her sister, saving the air in impetuous emphasis, with outstretched arm and gesticulatory finger, making of herself, as she afterward remarked, a spectacle for gods and men, had either chanced along the Germantown road at that moment. Thyra, overcome for the moment by this vigorous onslaught, murmured, feebly:

"You forget, my dear, that we are upon the front piazza and—"

The rest of the sentence was not audible, for the impulsive Mollie, struck with contrition, impetuously clasped her Ty to her throbbing heart, and, with strong symptoms of tears, besought her pardon.

"But indeed, Ty, I could not help it," she continued, when peace was again restored and duly ratified. "Your false informants had done my Jim such cruel, wicked wrong. I shall never forgive them—never," she repeated, with an emphatic shake of her head. "And just to think," she rattled on, "Uncle Joe—for so Jim says I must call him—is likely to be here any day." Thyra opened her eyes widely at this announcement. "I mean in the city. He is to meet Jim when he returns from New York, the presence of both partners being necessary to complete the business arrangement which has kept Jim here six months. How terribly the poor man would feel did he know of this wretched slander, and he just returning to his old home. For, after all, Germantown was his home, and

"Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home,"

She sang softly.

Thyra, who only half heeded this persistent chatter, was employed in rallying and reforming her forces. After all, Mollie spoke with no other authority than the unsupported testimony of one of the men accused. Of course he would have ready some such plausible story, and none could have been invented more likely to captivate and inflame the imagination of a young and impetuous girl. Nevertheless, she felt that her task was becoming very difficult, and that it behooved her to move with great caution. She therefore declined to renew battle upon the old ground, and effected a change of front.

"Did you learn the nature of this business?" she began, as Mollie ceased singing.

"Something connected with mines, I believe," replied the younger sister, carelessly.

Exactly what wild ideas of mines and mining these fair ladies entertained is best known to themselves. Thyra, however, had read somewhere that a vast deal of gambling was connected with their successful operation, and had a vague notion that Virginia City was not unlike Baden Baden in its palmy days; minus, perhaps, some of the gilding and external refinement of that once glittering "hell."

"Do you know whether these mines are in shares?" she inquired, gently inquisitive.

"Oh, yes! I know that much; for Jim said something about placing shares in the market, which I could not understand," replied the innocent girl, to whose unsophisticated mind the word "market" meant solely a place where greens, etc., were sold.

Thyra [affectionately].—"Can you tell me, my dear, whether these shares were in stocks?"

Mollie [hesitatingly, and anxious to be exact].—"I think he called them shares of stock."

Thyra.—"Can you not remember clearly?"

Mollie.—"Oh, yes! I remember distinctly now, for he said one of my wedding presents should be a certificate—I recall that word on account of the marriage certificate—a certificate for, I forget how many, shares of stock."

Thyra [inquisitorially].—"You are certain that the expression was 'shares of stock'?"

Mollie.—"Quite certain."
Thyra [severely, and with an air of knowing all about it].—"Then he is a gambler, and wants to make you an accomplice."

Mollie [up and in arms on the instant].—"He is not a gambler, and you are a wicked woman to call him so."

Thyra [with dignity].—"I know all about it. I read in the paper, only the other day, that stock gambling was the curse of San Francisco, and that nearly every one living there was infatuated with the new game."

Mollie.—"I don't care what the papers say."

Thyra [innocently].—"Neither do I, except when they agree with me. I can not conceive, Mollie, how you can think of loving a man who makes his money by playing cards. I can not—"

But what she could or could not will never be known, for at this moment the gate of the front garden was opened, and a young man, somewhat too glaringly attired for good taste, came up the walk to the piazza.

"I believe I have the honor of addressing Miss Tynotte?" he said, as he raised his hat to Thyra.

At first she feared that it might be the very man she was denouncing, his treacherous-looking mouth and false, glittering eye being just what she had expected to find in the gambler-lover. But, seeing no appearance of recognition on Mollie's part, and his features seeming not altogether unfamiliar to herself, she was reassured, and acknowledged her identity.

"May I presume upon your good nature so far as to request a private interview?" inquired the stranger in a courteous manner. Then, noticing a sudden pallor overspread her features, and an odd hesitation in her manner, he added, "You have no occasion to be alarmed; though the matter upon which I call is of grave importance."

But Thyra answered him never a word; the pallor of her face grew deathly, her limbs trembled beneath her, and she was obliged to grasp the rail of the piazza for support.

"Pardon me for being so persistent," resumed the man, upon whom her eyes were fixed in doubting, frightened recognition and aversion. "Pardon me, but I have a letter of an especially private character, which requires an immediate reply. It is from your brother Henry."

Yes, she was right; this was Cliff Den, the smoothest and most plausible of all her brother's villainous Chicago associates. She had met him at Henry's sick-bed, and also in settling up his affairs. No news other than evil could be brought by such a herald. Disaster, disgrace, shame. With a wild gasp for breath, she fell fainting on the floor.

CHAPTER III.

OFFICE OF BARIST, DEN & ELWOOD,
Shippers and General Freight Agents,
San Francisco.

MY DEAR SISTER TY. :—I write you these hasty lines in shame and anguish of spirit. They will be handed to you by my firm friend, Mr. Cliff Den, in whom you can confide entirely. Having inherited a considerable sum of money, he invested it all in the purchase of an interest in the large and well known house of Barist & Elwood, now Barist, Den & Elwood. Through his kind offices I obtained a responsible position with the firm, and won their entire confidence. About this time I became infatuated with the fever for stock gambling, and lost not only my own little savings, but also a considerable sum borrowed from Mr. Den. Then followed the old, old story, of risking my employers' money to regain what I had lost; still further embezzlement, to make the original defalcation good, and so on, from day to day, involving myself more and more deeply. This morning my hopes of concealment and eventual restitution were rudely blasted. The arresting officer stands at my elbow, waiting to take me to prison as soon as I shall have written this letter. In spite of my crime, Den still remains my friend. Being about to leave for the East, upon business, he urged me immediately to communicate to you my situation, offering to deliver the letter in person, and inform you as to further details. Having no other hope, and loathing to drag our name in the dirt, I have consented. I have taken, in all, the sum of five thousand two hundred and eighteen dollars, and have also wrongfully signed the firm's name. I am arrested simply for embezzlement. If you can hand over to Den the amount named, the accusation will be withdrawn and myself released. Should you be unable to do so, an additional charge of forgery will be preferred, and I am liable to be sentenced to seven or eight years in prison. My consolation, in that event, will be the certainty that I can not survive the first year. My health, already seriously impaired, would not sustain so rude a trial. In this terrible strait, I once more appeal to your old love for me, and beg of you to come to my rescue. God knows how I shall ever repay you, but, if it be possible, save our father's name from this foul disgrace. The officer at my side warns me to be brief. I pray you to conceal all this from darling Mollie, and strive yourself to forgive your miserably weak and wretched, but, in spite of everything, always your loving brother,
HENRY TYNOTTE.

While Thyra was reading this letter, closely watched by Den, Mollie, upon the piazza, had her speculations as to its import interrupted by another visitor. It was unmistakably the hero of the bridge, who had been duly described by Thyra, in relating the adventure. Mollie knew him the moment he raised his hat from his iron-gray hair.

"Good morning," he said, in a friendly tone, "I have taken the liberty of stopping to inquire whether Miss Tynotte suffered any inconvenience from the accident of yesterday afternoon."

"Oh, save a little stiffness," replied the young girl, "my sister felt no ill results whatever this morning. She is very particularly engaged just at this moment, or I would bring her here at once to answer for herself. Pray be seated."

"Am I correct," asked the new comer, taking a chair, "in thinking that you said Miss Tynotte was your sister?"

"Quite correct. We are sisters."

"But many years ago, when I knew something of Judge Tynotte, he had but one child, a daughter, when his wife died."

"That is true enough. My brother Henry and I are the children of a second marriage. So, to speak exactly, Ty and I are only half-sisters."

"Pardon my apparent inquisitiveness, but by what name did you call Miss Tynotte?"

"It is only a pet name for Thyra. Henry and myself, and I believe we alone, always called her Ty."

"May I inquire where your brother Henry is to be found at present? Believe me, I am not asking these questions from any idle motive."

"I can not say where he is. We have not heard from him for a long time, not since he left Chicago."

"Chicago?" exclaimed the visitor.

"Not since then. But the very gentleman who is now with my sister—listen, I hear them coming out—has just brought a letter from him."

"A letter from him. Impossible," muttered the stranger. At this moment his attention was attracted by the appearance of Thyra at the hall door, which was quite near to him.

"I will hand you, Mr. Den," she said to her companion, "the money for my brother Henry to-morrow morning. In the meanwhile telegraph to San Francisco at once, and also let Henry know that his sister begs of him to come to her immediately."

Thyra, while speaking, did not observe Mollie's visitor, but Den, looking up to reply, the eyes of the two men met in mutual recognition. Cliff instantly wheeled around, and muttering something about having forgotten his gloves, made hastily for the room they had just left. But the stranger, equally quick, pursued and caught him with a firm grasp before he had taken a dozen steps.

"Hold hard!" cried the captor. "What devil's trick are you up to here?"

Den's eyes flashed fire, but he had no chance against his powerful antagonist. Making a virtue of necessity, he yielded quietly.

"What does this violence mean?" inquired the astonished Thyra, fearful of some new complication in Henry's case. Mollie, mute with surprise, was looking over her shoulder, though she had retained sufficient presence of mind to send the elderly servant for an officer.

"I beg pardon," panted the victor, "but he recognized me and was making off. This is Harry Wirl," he said, indicating his prisoner, "a convict who escaped from San Quentin during the fire there, some months ago. He was serving out a sentence for forgery. He is a hardened offender, and I was one of his victims."

"I am quite confused," exclaimed Thyra. "And this letter from Henry—"

"Is a bold forgery. A device to swindle you out of a round sum of money."

"But how about my brother?"

"Oh, Ty," cried Mollie innocently, "I am sure he will not refuse to tell you the truth if you beg of him to do so. Will you, sir?" she added, turning to Den, alias Wirl, who up to this time had maintained a moody silence.

The escaped convict, although a seasoned rascal, was not altogether lost to manly feeling. This simple appeal, together with Thyra's evident distress and pain, moved him.

"Well, Miss Mollie," he began, with an assumption of gallantry, "for the sake of your bright eyes I will make a clean breast of it, if you and your sister will promise not to prosecute. You see, thanks to our friend here," and he nodded in the direction of his captor, who kept a wary eye upon his movements, "I shall be obliged to return to San Quentin, where I still have a longish term to serve, and so have no desire to test the hospitality of your Eastern penitentiary. Shall I count upon your forbearance?"

He was apparently as much at ease, and spoke as gaily, as though he were making a pleasant morning call. Assured that, for their brother's sake, if for no other reason, he had nothing to fear from the sisters, he continued his story in the same light and careless tone.

"I knew that your brother had been in San Francisco," he resumed, "for we went there together from Chicago. But almost immediately after our arrival I lost track of him, and have not seen him since."

Thyra gave vent to a sigh of relief.

"Then came my own troubles," he went on, "my conviction to, and escape from, San Quentin. Anxious to put as much ground as possible between myself and that pleasant resort by the water-side, I came East. I sought Philadelphia on account of the big fair across the river, expecting to turn my talents to good account in the city of brotherly love. Fortune was favoring me but indifferently, when by chance I recognized Miss Tynotte's fair features—here he made a low bow—"in a city street-car. I overheard her reply, to a friend's inquiry, that she had neither heard of, nor from, her brother Henry since his departure from Chicago. Remembering his troubles in that city, and how handsomely she had put up for him—I beg your pardon, I mean with what liberality she had supplied the money to get him out of his scrapes and debts—I thought I saw my way clear to a neat little turn and a bag of money. As I was about tired of Philadelphia, I went to work at once. I was perfectly familiar with your brother's writing—in fact, had some stray letters of his in my trunk. Taking these as guides, I was not long in getting up the letter I had the honor to hand to you, Miss Thyra; and I flatter myself that the plant—I beg pardon, I mean the scheme—would have been entirely successful but for this unfortunate meeting."

"But I remember the letter had a printed heading," said the elder sister.

"Oh, that was a mere trifle," he answered. "But I fear I must beg of you to defer further explanation, for I see a friend with whom I have a very particular appointment coming up the walk. I trust you will excuse me."

His hearers looked out the doorway, and beheld the policeman for whom the servant had been sent approaching the piazza. Den, briefly given into custody as an escaped convict, made his exit with as jaunty a bow as the manacles upon his wrists permitted. His captor remained behind, having promised the officer that he would shortly call at the station and prefer charges.

"Miss Tynotte," he said, when he found himself alone with the two sisters, "will you let me see the letter which the rascal delivered? I have a special motive in desiring to see it, and to speak with you concerning its contents, if your sister will excuse me."

"I left it upon the table in the next room," replied Thyra, moving toward an open door. "Will you not enter and examine it at your leisure?"

Mollie again sought the piazza; the other two entered the apartment in which Den had been received.

"A clever forgery," the visitor muttered to himself, as he subjected the letter to a close scrutiny. "Every characteristic, every turn of the pen preserved. It must be he. There is no room for doubt." Then turning to his hostess, he spoke aloud in a tone which was strangely gentle and solemn. "You have just passed through a trying scene, Miss Ty-notte," he began, "do you think you could bear the additional fatigue of a story in some measure connected with it?"

Thyra at once signified her assent. She was beginning to feel great confidence in this strong man.

"About two years ago," he continued, "there came to my office in San Francisco—for that is my home—a delicate-looking young man, seeking employment. I chanced to have a minor clerkship vacant, and became interested in the applicant. Though I questioned him pretty closely, I learned but little of his connections. His name was Knotte—Henry Knotte; he had recently arrived on the coast, was unmarried, and had no friends or relatives in the city. All unrecommended as he was, he persuaded me to give him a trial, and I never had reason to regret that I did so. He was honorable, faithful, diligent, though apparently weighed upon by some secret grief. I had become greatly interested in him, and as his health was rapidly failing, made his work as light as possible. In spite of every care, he was soon compelled to give up the desk and take to his bed. Every possible aid to rally his feeble strength was sought after, but all alike in vain. Shortly before his death he told me that Knotte was an assumed name. He and a companion had committed an indiscreet act in Chicago, which brought them to some extent within the ken of the law; so they had come on to San Francisco under false names."

"You said his first name was Henry. That was his true given name, was it not?" in a tone strangely subdued.

"It was," gravely answered the visitor; and then, after a pause, resumed his narration. "The young man was about to confide to me his full name and story, when he was seized by a fainting fit. When he recovered, fearing that the excitement would be too great for his weakened frame, I bade him defer further communications until the following day, it being then late in the evening. As I left, though he appeared somewhat bewildered, he had sufficient control of his faculties to place in my hands a bulky letter, which he desired me to forward. I did not notice, until I had reached my home, that the envelope bore no address. I let the matter rest until the next morning, when I called upon the poor boy again. It was too late. Shortly after my departure, the previous evening, he had become unconscious, and so remained until nearly daylight, when he breathed his last in my son's arms. I therefore never learned from him his true name."

"It was Henry Tynotte," Thyra said, speaking slowly, and with manifest effort restraining her sobs. "Did you open the letter?"

"Failing by other means to ascertain its proper destination, I did," answered the narrator. "It was addressed simply to 'My Darling Sister Ty,' without surname or further indication for whom it was intended. The writing had the same appearance as this clever forgery of your brother's hand, which I now hold," he added, looking solemnly into her eyes.

"Where is my dear Henry's letter? Why don't you give it to me?"

"It is only within the last hour that I have known that the message was yours, Miss Tynotte. It is in my trunk, in Philadelphia. Having vainly attempted to find its owner in Chicago, I brought it with me to renew the search in this city, with which Henry, when off his guard, had betrayed some knowledge. As a last resort, I even read the letter from beginning to end; but I could gain no clue from its contents. It dwells fondly upon your tender love for him from his earliest infancy; upon your self-sacrificing devotion to his welfare; and, in the most endearing terms, blesses your gentle influence, which never entirely forsook him, even when he was at his wildest, and which at last prevailed. It is a message breathing gratitude and love. But while I am describing it I might be on the road for the letter itself," he concluded abruptly, taking up his hat.

Thyra was gently weeping now, but she followed her new-found friend to the hall door. Their attention was so absorbed that they failed to notice that Mollie, accompanied by a tall gentleman, with whom she appeared to be upon the most friendly terms possible, was rapidly approaching up the front garden walk.

"But there is one thing you have forgotten," said Thyra; "a thing which, even in my sorrow, I am anxious to know, that I may treasure it up with my poor brother's memory—I mean the name of his noble friend."

"O! as to that," he began, awkwardly; but before he could utter another word, Mollie's tall companion, bounding forward, seized his hand with a bearty grasp.

"Why, Uncle Joe Gedway!" he exclaimed, "when did you arrive?"

"My Jim, Thyra," said Mollie, slyly, by way of introduction.

It is, perhaps, needless to add that Thyra has reconstructed her ideas of mines and mining, of Californians in general, and of Joseph Gedway in particular. Equally useless to state that Jim Hetherton, his uncle's nephew, found grace in her sight, and that, in due time, he and Mollie were made happy. But it may surprise the reader to learn that Thyra's affection for Germantown is no longer so demonstrative as it used to be; that she has been heard solemnly to declare that climate, situation, and every surrounding constitute Oakland the one place on earth in which to make a home—and then, too, it is so handy to San Francisco. At all events, she is going to try the experiment, in company with—Joseph Gedway.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 2, 1880.

The grand feature of Steele Mackaye's new Madison Square Theatre is the stage, which has been constructed under the supervision of Nelse Waldron. It is a movable double stage, and is, in reality, a huge elevator. It is thirty-one feet in width, twenty-nine feet in depth, and the space between the two floors is twenty-five feet two inches. While the first act of a play is being presented on the lower stage, the scenery for the second act is to be set upon the upper floor. Then, when the curtain falls, the great elevator is lowered, until the upper floor reaches the level of the footlights. The lower floor is then in the deep pit excavated in the basement, and the scenery can be removed and a new set made. The double stage is to be worked by a system of friction wheels, and it is thought that eight men can easily raise and lower it. If it proves to be a success, there will be no necessity for the curtain to remain down for more than two or three minutes between any two acts of

TO G—,

I liken all my friends to flowers,
A bright bouquet that never fades;
Its fragrance scents the morning hours,
Its beauties light the evening shades.

Amidst them all, in velvet fold,
I see the pansy's charming face,
Its purple eyes, its heart of gold,
Its look of love, its gentle grace.

And soon the dying twilight weaves
A chain of tender, hopeful words,
That come from 'neath the twining leaves,
Faint echoes from the songs of birds.

I listen to the low, sweet chime,
Which tells of clearer, bluer skies,
And see that brighter, happier time
Reflected in the pansy's eyes.

And thus the murmuring music blends
With all that's loyal and that's true;
And in that dear bouquet of friends
The flower most loved is that like you.

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1879. J. C. DUNCAN.

THE DECLINE OF THE "BOOM."

The New York Dispatch says: "The desire on the part of a certain portion of the Republican party—a portion which we in our experience find confined mostly to office-holders and office-seekers—to renominate Grant for the Presidency, does not meet with universal favor. Indeed, among the most intelligent Republicans there is strong opposition to the idea of a third term, and even many friends of Gen. Grant doubt the possibility of his election should he receive the nomination. From what we have heard, we are convinced that the nomination of Grant would be followed by disastrous defeat. The quiet Republicans who do not attend primaries, but who vote at every election, are very unanimous in their opposition to making Grant the nominee, and the German Republicans are utterly opposed to him. The talk of Jay Gould and others about having 'a strong man' President has alarmed the Germans, who, by experience, know what a 'strong man' and a 'strong Government' mean. There is still a widespread regard among Americans for the tradition, handed down to us from our earliest President, that it is dangerous to our liberties to give any man a third term of the Presidency. There is another very strong reason why Gen. Grant should not be the nominee: The Republican party would be put on the defensive at the beginning of the campaign. It would have to meet the charge that he had in his Cabinet men who were corrupt; that he was intimate with men who were afterward convicted of defrauding the revenue; that he pardoned with lavish hand such convicts, and that his private secretary was proven to the satisfaction of the country to have been in league with them. These things can not be disproved; and, though we never entertained for a moment the thought that Gen. Grant knew of the wrongs committed by his friends, we can not believe that the man who surrounds himself with corrupt men is the fittest man the country could choose to fill its highest office. Looking at the question of nominating Grant from all sides, we can not but regard it as the most dangerous move which the party could make. Of all the men mentioned as candidates he would be the weakest."

A Tribune Philadelphia special says: "The Times has polled the Pennsylvania press on the choice for the Presidency, and will publish this morning the replies of sixty Republican newspapers, as follows: For Blaine, 26; for Grant, 22; for Sherman, 3; for the field, 5; for the best man, 3; for nominee of the National Convention, 7. A considerable number of those expressing a personal preference for Grant, name Blaine as the second choice, or report that the sentiment of the Republican portion of the community is in favor of the latter rather than Grant."

Returns from 5,338 interviews in Indiana with Republicans of all grades of opinions, give, the Indianapolis Journal says, "the following choice for Presidential candidates: Blaine, 1,882; Grant, 1,600; Sherman, 1,352; Hayes, 874; Washburne, 71; Garfield, 37; Thompson, 12; Colfax, 18; Harrison, 16; Bristow, 11; Conkling, 17; Edmunds, 10; Fremont, 6, and the rest scattering."

The Chicago Journal says: "It is a matter of great surprise to advocates of Grant's nomination that the opposition to him is so great, and mainly based on a conscientious opposition to the third term."

The Dayton (Ohio) Journal says: "If there are men who are determined that Gen. Grant shall be the Republican nominee for President, we seriously advise them to make a careful investigation of the situation in Ohio. We can heartily support Grant, but we know that there are enough Republicans who will not support him to jeopardize the State."

The Philadelphia Evening Telegraph says: "To us the Republican party never seemed in such peril as at the present time, for its blind leaders, ignoring public prejudice and feeling, seem determined to wreck it on the third-term rock. They are leaving out the people, the majority of the voters of the United States, without whose aid their best schemes must come to naught. Besides that, they are doing infinite injury and placing in jeopardy the great fame of the great and skillful soldier, Gen. Grant, by forcing him into a contest which he can not win. As a soldier, his countrymen can not too much honor him, but as a Presidential candidate they will not vote for him. Sects, nationalities, Conservatives, and Independents are all opposed to his reelection; precedents, traditions, and good policy also oppose it; and his nomination would but bring upon him the bitterness of defeat—a shame from which he should be preserved."

Mr. Jacob Bomberg, of Harrisburg, Penn., a banker whose contributions to the Republican "campaign fund" are well known, and whose wide acquaintance with business men enables him to speak understandingly, writes: "If Grant is nominated for President, I know of one thousand German Republicans in this county alone who will vote for his opponent, because of their belief that Grant's election to a third term of the Presidency is the first step toward an American monarchy." The nomination of Gen. Grant, Mr. Bomberg adds, will give Pennsylvania to the Democracy by thirty thousand majority.

The Utica (N. Y.) Observer says: "It becomes more and more clear every day that there is a large and growing element in the Republican party which is opposed to Grantism, with all that it implies. It would indeed be strange if a plot for the suppression of liberty, and the creation of a hasty empire on this free soil, could be carried forward without provoking an earnest protest from all parties. Nobody really misunderstands the Grant movement. It is the story of Louis Bonaparte over again. Give the man what he asks now, and he will take the rest without asking."

An Albany special dispatch to the Chicago Tribune says: "The anti-Grant movement has assumed definite shape in Albany, and a club has been formed having already sixty well-known Republicans as members. Mr. Dawson, one of the Evening Journal editors, is among the members. Branch clubs are forming rapidly, and the opposition to the boom is evidently beginning in this State."

A Washington dispatch, dated December 29th, says: "The noticeable characters who welcomed Gen. Grant here on Saturday were, first, Ned Beale, his host, an old chum of the free-and-easy days in California, whom Mr. Lincoln refused to appoint Surveyor-General, upon the ground that he would soon be 'monarch of all he surveyed.' Next in order was Don Cameron, recently elected Chairman of the National Committee by the bogus votes of John J. Patterson and W. J. Purman, both residents of Pennsylvania, who pretended to represent South Carolina and Florida as members of that Committee. Babcock, whom Grant had saved from the penitentiary, was more cordially and familiarly received than any of the others. Tyner, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, could not restrain his enthusiasm, and stood among the foremost on the platform, with other disciples of Addition, Division, and Silence. John H. Ketcham, whom Boss Shepherd, after being rejected by the Senate, named as his substitute for Commissioner of the District of Columbia, and who now represents the Thirteenth District of New York in the House, and also the First National Bank and the Washington Ring, was, of course, early on the ground. Old Subsidy Pomeroy, long supposed to be dead and buried, was resurrected by the first sign of a return of Grantism, and reappeared in the flesh, to justify a third term of that beneficent policy."

That powerful journal, the N. Y. Times, indicates its opposition to the "Boom" by publishing an interesting sketch in fifteen chapters of the life of Elihu B. Washburne.

A Great Discovery.

A citizen of Montana is the accidental discoverer of a simple, natural process of butter-making which bids fair to revolutionize the industry—to its advantage—and promises to make the butter markets of the world tributary to San Francisco. Like many other great discoveries, the Montana process is almost laughably simple. At the same time, the application of one of the most universal natural laws to a process hitherto both artificial and complicated seems little less than inspiration; and the unknown genius who hit upon the lucky experiment which proved the application at once efficacious and inexpensive, deserves a niche in the temple of invention near those whom the world has united to name great.

The story of the discovery is briefly as follows: A farm-hand employed on the ranch of James R. Johnson, who lives in Prickly Pear Valley, seven miles north of Helena, accidentally broke an immature squash from its vine. The seedling was of the Mammoth Californian variety, and the only one of the kind on the ranch. Anxious to repair his fault, the farm-hand suggested that the squash be "raised by hand." It then weighed only ten pounds, and Mr. Richards laughed at the idea. The hired man, however, obtained permission to proceed with his experiment. The squash was taken to an attic, where it could have a daily sun bath of several hours duration. A long strip of cotton was wound around its stem, and three times a day the end of this strip was immersed in a pan of fresh milk. This novel treatment was continued twenty-seven days. In that time the growing squash had been seen by at least a score of persons, each of whom had witnessed the absorption of milk, and each visitor examined the squash and gave it a vigorous shaking to try and find out what had become of the milk. At the end of the twenty-seven days the squash was removed to the Helena Agricultural Fair. It then weighed forty pounds, and had consumed about fifteen gallons of milk. The fair lasted one week, during which the squash was not fed. It was then cut into halves, and, to the astonishment of all present, ten pounds of superior butter was found in each half, making the yield of butter twenty pounds from fifteen gallons of milk—a yield quite unprecedented. The squash itself was made into pies by the ladies of Helena. One of these pies and a pound of the butter was forwarded to Mrs. President Hayes, whose judgment in such matters is exceeded only by that of the President. Mrs. and Mr. Hayes immediately returned a letter of thanks, countersigned by both Evarts and Schurz, "indorsing" the pie, and ordering a ton of the butter by return mail.

There seems to be only one obstacle to the perfection of this novel process. The scientific in Helena are agreed that the actual coagulation of the cream, after absorption, was due to the shaking of the squash by those who witnessed its novel bringing up. There seems to be no doubt in Montana that this system of butter-making will be introduced throughout the United States. As the leading squash-producer, California must soon take the lead as butter producer. Of course it is not expected that neighbors will feel sufficiently continuous interest in the new process to happen in regularly on churning days; but it is suggested that the milkmen and cowboys might play football or tennis with the squash-churns, and so combine pleasure and profit no end. It is also suggested that it is a poor rule which will not work both ways; and, perhaps, young steers may be fed upon the broken squash-churns, and, when fattened, converted at once into beef and butter—which would beat oleomargarine out of the market.

Marc Antony would make an excellent auctioneer. How he would take some crude cub of a passion and lick it into shape with that incomparable tongue of his! How he would get hold of all the clinging tendrils of sentiment that wrap these little brown packages and make them sell the goods for twice their value! What don't you suppose he could have sold Cæsar's mantle for by the yard if he had happened to be an auctioneer instead of a funeral orator?

OUR OWN MINES.

Ever since the silver discoveries of Washoe the tide of mine speculators and mine purchasers has swept over the Sierras to the eastern slope, leaving the California mines neglected. It is undoubtedly true that there are hundreds of valuable mines in California that have been partially prospected and abandoned, while there are thousands of valuable quartz ledges that have never been even prospected. Valuable mining properties, all the way from Sierra County to Tulare, lie neglected and valueless, while money by the millions has been expended in the more distant mining fields of Nevada and Arizona. If the enterprise, the mining skill, the labor, and the money that have been laid out on the Comstock and other mining districts had been used for the development of the gold-bearing quartz lodes and auriferous gravel deposits of California, the value of hullion would not have been decreased, and California would have been more populous and prosperous than any of the newer States of the Union. We hear continually of mining properties in Sierra, Plumas, Placer, El Dorado, Amador, Stanislaus, Tuolumne, and other mountain counties that are for sale at nominal prices. Some were opened and abandoned when mining was more expensive and less understood than now; when processes of extracting gold from rebellious ores were fewer; when labor was high. Nevada presented what were regarded as superior attractions for capital, and these properties were either abandoned, or "stayed by" in a hopeless, drowsy way by impoverished miners, in the hope that in time something would turn up for their relief.

We are glad to observe that there is a growing disposition on the part of capitalists to seek these mines for investment. Many sales have been consummated within the last six months, and we think we may safely prophesy for the Western Sierras a new and prosperous era. We would warn everybody against investing money in the purchase of a mine except upon careful personal investigation. No one in the world has a better judgment concerning property to be bought than the person who is to pay for it. If the writer had ten or a hundred thousand dollars to invest in a mine, he would visit it, learn its history, examine it for himself, inquire of the miners of the neighborhood concerning it; and would do all this without airing his position as a capitalist. He would examine its ores, see them taken out with his own eyes, have them worked in a mill by a practical process, would eschew analysis; and when he had made up his mind to purchase the property he would ask the advice of experts. Then he would work and operate mill and mine as he would any other enterprise that demanded sense, caution, and economy. There are thousands of mining properties within the reach of small capitalists, which thus treated, would be found highly remunerative. A quartz ledge once tested and developed, a quartz mill properly built, ought not to be a more hazardous property than farm, or ship, or shop, or store. No farm, nor ship, nor shop, nor any scheme of business, ever made money that had not over it the eye of some constant, capable, honest business man. The mistakes about mines are made in California and Pine Streets, and in New York.

TO A YOUNG SENATOR.

A Dunce-Cap that May Fit Whom It Will.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 10, 1880.

MY YOUNG FRIEND:—You have at last achieved the equivocal distinction of representing the senatorial district in which is situated the Arcadian retreat of Rawhide Ranch, and I congratulate you upon the fact; not because I think it is of any especial importance that you are a Senator, but because the usages of good society require that something pleasant should be said, and, as I can see no particular cause to congratulate either your constituents or the State at large, I address my complacencies to you. It is perhaps unnecessary to remind you that many years ago, when I was younger and greener than now, and therefore more like yourself at present, I enjoyed what I then thought was the great distinction of a seat in the body of which you are now—in your own estimation at least—a distinguished member. I therefore have no difficulty whatever in understanding precisely how you feel, and a very little observation will show any one interested how you act. I was not at all surprised, therefore, at receiving a letter from you with the envelope indorsed: "If not delivered within ten days return to Senator —," Senator from Rawhide Ranch; and, however much difference of opinion there may be as to the taste or tautology of the sentence, it can leave no doubt in the mind of any one that you are a State Senator. Of course I was prepared to find on opening the letter a representation of Jupiter throwing darts, variously marked "vote," "speech," "record," etc., at certain covering foes deep in a dark valley; and these enemies, it is easy to see, are intended to represent your political opponents in esse or in prose.

Following this somewhat startling pictorial allegory was this unmistakable typographical announcement: "Rooms of —, Senator from Rawhide District No. —, etc." After these profusely illustrated legends, it was hardly necessary for you to commence your epistle, as you did, with the announcement: "I am elected State Senator," and, after recounting your triumph in three or four short sentences, subscribe your name with the addition, "State Senator."

Now, my young friend, I wish you to distinctly understand that I find no fault with you for these things. It is a fundamental maxim of sociology that every young man is an ass, and his qualities are certain to be developed in one form or another. Neither do I especially object to the fact that you walk and appear as if you had swallowed a yard of lightning-rod; nor that you have spent hours practicing before a pier-glass, in order to acquire the stately otium cum dignitate step that is popularly supposed to have distinguished the old Roman Senators. I ask your friends, in advance, not to think it strange if you should take them aside and request them never, under any circumstances, to call you by your Christian name, but always to give you the title of Senator. Of course you have a scrap-book, in which you have affectionately pasted all the newspaper puffs and incidental mention of your name, even to the list of hotel arrivals in which it appears, on arriving at the capital. It would perhaps be cruel to suggest that these biographies of you were written by men who never knew or saw you, in a moment when the office was "short of copy," and sent there to print with the irreverent but not altogether false comment, "This slush will do to fill up with." It is of course foolish for you to buy hundreds of newspapers, and send them to the people of your District "frekurd," but you will do it, and I do not object. If you do the State no greater harm than is involved in these little vanities, the people will have greater cause for congratulation than I have any present reason to hope.

Your public career will be much of the same character as your private acts. You will introduce a bill. This will probably be unconstitutional, which is to be greatly desired, because in such cases its crudities and intrinsic absurdities will do but little harm. You will lose no opportunity to "make a speech." Your name will appear almost daily in the Record-Union, and this fact will give you untold satisfaction. You will receive countless letters from your maiden aunts, and the Sunday-school teachers of your district; they will tell you of your shining abilities, and assure you, in evident sincerity and execrable orthography, that you are destined to "make your mark." The public-school teachers in your village will adjure the "young idea" to look upon you and see what great things a youthful American can accomplish. In a word, you will for a season be the sensation in and about Rawhide Ranch. The strangest thing of all is that you will swallow all this soft-soap; I did it, you are doing it, and thousands who will come after you will do it.

But the awakening will come. The Legislature will adjourn. According to a venerable custom, public opinion will denounce it as the worst Legislature the State ever had; and it is a truism that honors are always distributed, while censures invariably centre on individuals. You will be called a fool, a knave, a nincompoop, a peacock, a corruptionist, and a few other of the complimentary terms which are invariably bestowed upon retiring State Solons. All this, however, will not hurt you so much as the fact that you will be entirely unnoticed. When you visit this city you will pass up one street and down another without attracting attention. In vain will you step with the most stately stride you can command. In vain will you register your name with the addition "State Senator." In vain will the few constituents you meet in the city persistently introduce you as "the brilliant young Senator." Next session you will reappear. By that time you will have remarkably diminished ideas of yourself. You will do less corresponding, less printing, and will walk like a common mortal. By the time your term expires you will have learned that you have no monopoly of the brains of the State; and by the time you sink into the respectable obscurity in store for you, you will probably have recovered from the attack of big-head with which you are now so sorely afflicted. If this should not be the case your disease is congenital, and you will die a four-eared ass and a perfect model of a broad-gauge idiot.

In the earnest hope that you may not turn out as great a fool as your present conceited practices presage, I remain yours, in the hope that you may improve,

STEPHEN JOHN CROOK.

THAT NOTABLE BOOK.

D. Appleton & Co., of New-York, publish the Memoirs of Madame de Rémusat, in paper covers—three volumes. We have read but the first, and it leaves a bad taste in the mouth, as if one had been biting the corpse of Napoleon I. with Madame de Rémusat's teeth. No book recently published has been more talked about, and none is more disappointing. In one respect it is admirably characterized by Chateaubriand, who had read it in manuscript, and whose judgment the editor, with either engaging frankness or amusing stupidity, appends to the work in a foot-note: "The memoirs of Madame de Rémusat, with whom I was acquainted, were full of exceedingly curious details of the private life of the Imperial Court. Their author burned them during the Hundred Days, but afterward rewrote them. They are now but recollections of former recollections; the colors are faded; but Bonaparte is always clearly depicted and impartially judged." We have not the happiness to believe that Bonaparte was impartially judged by this first obsequiously-expected, then disappointedly-caviling, and always conceited and garrulous female dependent. We do not believe her when she relates how this most secretive of all the rulers of men, whose every action was a surprise to even his ministers and marshals, rattled off to her by the half-hour his plans, hopes, fears, policies, aims, means, crimes, and ambitions, in private conversations, which she repeats from memory, page after page, verbatim. We do not believe he confided to her those of his amours which did not specially concern herself; and as to that, we doubt the sincerity of her deprecation in relating the envy with which she was regarded with reference to those which did. This good lady's husband was made Prefect of the Palace, and she, Lady of the Palace. A large part of the book is made up of apologies for the admiration with which the pair of them consented to regard the author of their little greatness while he was in power and they were in favor. At the time of writing the Memoirs, however, he was dethroned, and they were trying to make their peace with the Restoration. In this first volume M. de Rémusat is a rather shadowy figure, but sometimes stalks majestically into the narrative with severe brow and folded arms to rebuke his erring master, whose meekness under the rod ought to have secured him immunity from subsequent feats of tongue achieved upon his memory by the wife. The book is edited by the writer's grandson, whose tenderness for the grandmaternal good name has borne fruit in an intolerably long preface, stuffed full of that lady's severe virtues, and exuding apologies between the lines like tar from the seams of a stranded ship. These Memoirs have been praised too much, and without discrimination. A just balancing of their merits shows them to be sufficiently indecent, but not sufficiently bright; malicious enough, but the malice not properly disguised with hypocrisy and bedecked with truth. There has been but one Napoleon; the name, when borne by the wretched rout of tricksters, sentimentals, and incapables who, with various kinds of disaster, have had the effrontery to keep or assume it, is not the same thing. We do not object to M. Victor Hugo dignifying the late Louis Bonaparte with books of abuse, but we protest that the fame of his great predecessor shall not be tarnished by this gossiping dependent, scribbling furtively in a corner the obvious falsehoods and petty misconceptions which her grandson thinks good enough to print. On the whole, we prefer to keep the Napoleon we have, and let M. Paul de Rémusat cherish that of his grandmother.

The young women, we observe, are availing themselves of their immemorial privilege by giving "leap-year parties," to which they invite the gentlemen, and where they wait upon them. This whimsical custom, however, is more observed in the country towns than in San Francisco. To justify it the ladies are making use of the following passage, purporting to be from a book entitled Love, Courtship, and Matrimony, published in London in 1606. At least we have seen it engraved upon the invitation and programme cards in old English letters in one or two instances:

"Albeit it has now become a part of the common lawe in regarde to social relations of life that, as often as every bissextile year dothe return, the ladies have the sole privilege during the time it continueth of making love unto the men, which they doe, either by words or looks, as to them it seemeth proper; and, moreover, no man will be entitled to the benefit of clergy who doeth in any way treat her proposal with slight or contumely."

We are sorry to dispel a harmless illusion, but we venture to think the passage spurious and of recent American invention. It carries its own condemnation. Probably no English writer—certainly no English writer of the beginning of the seventeenth century—would have so misused the phrase "without benefit of clergy." Most writers in this country do commonly so misuse it, from the error that it is a denial of the offices of the church to one who has transgressed some particular law. The true history of the expression is something like this: Some centuries ago, the English clergy enjoyed, among their many other privileges, that of traditional immunity from certain penalties—exemption from the action of certain laws. This privilege was, of course, so abused as to become in time the cause of great injustice, and Parliament, in its wisdom, inserted in certain laws liable to the abuse the words "without benefit of the clergy." Its then well understood meaning was to include the clergy in the action of the law. This may not be a point of much importance to the young women who give leap-year parties, but we have thought it of some interest to the gentlemen of letters who relate those events—the society reporter of the Call, for example—and the genius who executes the weekly fashion article for the Mud Springs Lords' Day Scalp-snatcher.

Mexican robbers are real hidalgos, and always steal and murder like gentlemen, being especially polite to the ladies whose jewels they appropriate. A bandit chief, after shooting a gentleman dead because he refused to give up the keys to his house, addressed the agonized widow thus, with hat in hand: "Madame, we are gentlemen, and never could be guilty of rudeness to the fair. Pray accept this diamond as a memento of the deceased, and believe me your slave to command. My compliments to your distressed orphans. Adieu!"

ADA VEN'S LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 15, 1880.

MY DEAR HELEN:—I have heretofore regarded the editor of the ARGONAUT as a most humane personage, but in a recent copy of his paper he has actually boasted of having by means of his denunciations restrained some of our most cherished beaux from their accustomed privilege of "feeding" at balls, when and where and how they please. Now, if a young man, from prudential motives, is desirous of following the advice of that noted trooper, Capt. Dalgetty, and attempts "to victual himself for at least three days, as there is no knowing when he may come by another meal," I consider any interference as most unkind, even if he does take precedence of a troop of well-fed matrons whose breakfasts for the coming morn are involved in no degree of uncertainty. I have recently experienced quite a disappointment that the act from La Grande Duchesse, the performance of which has been so much talked of, has been abandoned for all time. An insatiable curiosity has possessed me to see those nice, refined young gentlemen bending every energy toward the acquirement of a vicious expression. I fear, gentle souls, they will find it difficult to compass; for that inimitable French diablerie, conveyed by such trifles as the drooping of an eyelid or the contraction of a muscle, I fear will prove too subtle a task for their innocent faces to perform.

Mrs. Henly Smith goes East next week, I hope not to remain very long, for she can not well be spared. It has been considered remarkable that a lady, so much admired herself, should be so considerate of the pleasure of others. Especially will she be missed by those young ladies who are so fortunate as to secure her services as a chaperon, her popularity rendering it impossible for them to be included in the mural decorations of an apartment. Mrs. Louis Haggin gives a "Tea" to-day. It is pleasant to see one of our youngest and most beautiful matrons preside in so charming a manner. She must inherit the art from her hospitable mother. Does it not seem strange that Colonel Sawyer and Judge McRae should both have died within the last six weeks? Of course you have not forgotten them—their polished manners and strict observance of all the rules of etiquette. Until this winter, I scarcely remember an entertainment at which they were not present—these two old gentlemen, so unlike in every respect save in their fondness for social pleasures. A life-long association with the most refined and cultivated in this country, as well as in Europe, had imparted an unusual degree of ease and courtesy to their bearing; and they have left many friends who will long regret their loss.

Our friend Mr. McCoppin will soon leave us for a protracted stay at the Sandwich Islands. You will agree that a saccharine enterprise will well accord with his proverbially honeyed words. We are in the midst of Teas and rumors of Teas; a German and several weddings are also on the tapis. Until your last, I was not aware that descriptions of costumes would interest you. So, in accordance with your wishes, the first perfectly stunning toilet I see I will describe at length.

Affectionately yours, ADA VEN.

A correspondent writes: "While in Sutter County last summer I ran across the enclosed epitaph on a tombstone at Kirkville. The bond of sympathy between poetic souls drew me to it, and I made a copy. The man was killed by a runaway horse while returning home from Marysville:

"'Tis little I thought, when from home I strayed,
That I should be so long delayed
From seeing those who on me smiled.
Adieu, dear wife and only child."

I inquired into the history of this, and found that the man had "strayed" early and often, and that caused trouble in the family. On the morning of the departure for Marysville his wife had "smiled" on him with a broomstick, which leads me to think that he made a mistake in the third line, and meant "those who with me smiled." This idea is intensified by the reflection that he had just been in Marysville."

Obscure Intimations.

JUDITH.—We do not know if your pocket-piece has any other value than its congeners of other dates. It would never be declined by us on account of its age; a coin is not in that respect like a woman, who when new is worth her face value, and rather less when old.

J. P. H., Oakland.—No lady named Williams is known at this office.

AUNT JANE.—You must send your name and address if you care to have your MS. considered. We fatigue of repeating this.

MILKY WAY.—It has been sent. We should be unable to use an occasional New York or other suburban letter.

M. B. S., COLUSA.—The Christmas number of the ARGONAUT was, like man's love, "a thing apart." It was not included in the regular subscription.

CHARLES WARREN STODOLARO.—We have a letter for you; to what monastery shall we forward it?

THE REV. J. B. F.—We do not recollect in what local religious paper the alleged speech of Bishop Strossmeyer at the Vatican Council, a portion of which we reprinted, appeared. Doubtless some of our readers will kindly enable us to answer your question.

REN ET JOEN.—We are not willing to inform you who our correspondent "Lel" is, or was; it would be a breach of good faith. If she had wished you to know her name she would probably have signed it to her charming letters. Besides, we do not know, ourselves. She made an incursion into our literary garden, ravaged an apronful of the flowers of compliment, and meanly ran away. Let her try it again, that's all.

Spanish Cream. Preserved Cherries.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Bananas, Oranges, and Grapes.

TO MAKE OYSTER-PLANT SALAD.—Scrape and boil the roots in water, slightly salted; when sufficiently cooked, if any of the skin remains, rub it off when cold. Make an ordinary French dressing, pour over, and let it stand about one hour before using.

TO MAKE SPANISH CREAM.—One quart milk, four eggs, half an ounce of gelatine. Four one pint of milk on the gelatine; when sufficiently soaked, add the other pint of milk, and place it over the fire in a bagin-marie. Beat the yolks of the eggs with three tablespoons of sugar, and stir into the cream when it boils; when it comes to a boil, take it off; stir into it the cream, beaten to a stiff froth with three tablespoons sugar. Flavour with vanilla. Use the next day. It may be eaten plain or around it.

TO LINDA.

On Receiving the Gift of a Pressed Rosebud.

The bud that you gave me, though partially sere,
Was reft from an exquisite rose;
Through all the mutations of many a year
It weathered the sunshine and snows;
Within a grave volume long time it was pressed,
And secretly lighted the page—
Like some fanciful image illuming the breast
And hid in the thought of a sage.

A tear turned to amber, or sigh in a shell
Once whispered, endureth for aye;
The transient and fleeting transformed by a spell
To that which will never decay.
Such magic duration thy hand hath bestowed
On yon fragile thing of an hour;
And ever, though fainter, 'twill glow as it glowed
When first it sprang forth in the bower.

Embalmed in the guise of that flowery form
What sweetness and verdure remain;
No blight of the mildew, no shock of the storm,
Will perill its beauty again:
Thus memory gives to the joys of the past
A delicate fragrance and bloom,
Whose beauty, un fading, forever shall last,
Above all the wreck of the tomb.

Methinks that the dearest fancy might toem
With visions whose charm never tires;
As it gratefully yielded itself to the theme
Which that eloquent emblem inspires,
Might picture a glowing, perennial youth
Through ages on ages untold
Preserving un sullied its freshness and truth,
Like sweet Arcthusa of old.

If love be the language which rosebuds express—
The perishing love of a day—
How touching the sentiment this might confess,
That fades not, nor withers away:
A love whose first fondness shall wane not nor waste
While life, and its sorrows, endure,
But still, undecaying, hold on to the last,
Unchangeably faithful and pure.

Believe me, were mine but the coveted power,
As surely the wish it would be,
To lavish the charms of that radiant flower
In richest profusion on thee;
I'd render thy beauty as lasting, in sooth,
As now it is lustrous and rare,
And cause thee to glow with perpetual youth—
A Hebe, surpassingly fair.

JUDGE FIELD.

His Course on the Supreme Bench of California.

In 1863 Judge Field resigned the Chief Justiceship of California to accept his present place on the Supreme Bench of the United States. Judge Joseph G. Baldwin, now deceased, himself distinguished alike for his legal and literary attainments, who had been associated with Judge Field on the Bench for three years, and had become warmly attached to him, gave expression to his estimate of his friend, on that occasion, in the following communication to the Sacramento Union, under date of May 1, 1863. We reproduce it as a contribution to the general discussion of Judge Field's character and public services, which is now going on in the public press, and connecting his name with the Presidential nomination of the Democratic party:

"The resignation by Judge Field of the office of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of California, to take effect on the 20th instant, has been announced. By this event the State has been deprived of the ablest jurist who ever presided over her courts. Judge Field came to California from New York in 1849, and settled in Marysville. He immediately commenced the practice of law, and rose at once to a high position at the local bar, and upon the organization of the Supreme Court soon commanded a place in the first class of the counsel practicing in that forum. For many years, and until his promotion to the bench, his practice was as extensive, and probably as remunerative, as that of any lawyer in the State. He served one or two sessions in the Legislature, and the State is indebted to him for very many of the laws which constitute the body of her legislation. In 1857 he was nominated for Judge of the Supreme Court for a full term, and in October of the same year was appointed by Governor Johnson to fill the unexpired term of Justice Heydenfeldt, resigned. He immediately entered upon the office, and has continued ever since to discharge its duties. Recently, as the reader knows, he was appointed, by the unanimous request of our delegation in Congress, to a seat upon the Bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, and was confirmed, without opposition, by the Senate.

"Like most men who have risen to distinction in the United States, Judge Field commenced his career without the advantages of family influence or patronage. He had the advantage, however—which served him better than wealth or family influence—of an accomplished education, and careful study and mental discipline. He brought to the practice of his profession a mind stored with professional learning, and embellished with rare scholarly attainments. He was distinguished at the bar for his fidelity to his clients, for untiring industry, great care and accuracy in the preparation of his cases, uncommon legal acumen, and extraordinary solidity of judgment. As an adviser, no man had more the confidence of his clients, for he trusted nothing to chance or accident when certainty could be attained, and felt his way cautiously to his conclusions, which, once reached, rested upon sure foundations, and to which he clung with remarkable pertinacity. Judges soon learned to repose confidence in his opinions, and he always gave them the strongest proofs of the weight justly due to his conclusions.

"When he came to the bench, from various unavoidable causes the calendar was crowded with cases involving immense interests, the most important questions, and various and peculiar litigation. California was then, as now, in the development of her multifarious physical resources. The judges were as much pioneers of law as the people of settlement. We are sure something had been done, but much had yet to be accomplished; and something, too, had to be undone of that which had been done in the feverish and anomalous period that had preceded. It is safe to say that, even in the experience of new countries hastily settled by heterogeneous crowds of strangers from all countries, no such example of legal or judicial difficulties was ever before presented as has been illustrated in the history of California. There was no general or common source of jurisprudence. Law was to be administered almost without a standard. There was the civil law, as adulterated or modified by Mexican provincialism, usages, and habitudes, for a great part of the litigation; and there was the common law for another part, but what that was to be decided from the conflicting decisions of any number of courts in America and England, and the various and diverse considerations of policy arising from local and other facts. And then, contracts made elsewhere, and some of them in semi-civilized countries, had to be interpreted here. Besides all which may be added that large and important interests peculiar to this State existed—mines, ditches, etc.—for which the courts were compelled to frame the law, and make a system out of what was little better than chaos.

"When, in addition, it is considered that an unprecedented number of contracts, and an amount of business without parallel, had been made and done in hot haste, with the utmost carelessness; that legislation was accomplished in the same way, and presented the crudest and most incongruous materials for construction; that the whole scheme and organization of the government, and the relation of the departments to each other, had to be adjusted by judicial construction—it may well be conceived what task even the ablest jurist would take upon himself when he assumed this office. It is no small compliment to say that Judge Field entered upon the duties of this great trust with his usual zeal and energy, and that he leaves the office not only with greatly increased reputation, but that he has raised the character of the jurisprudence of the State. He has more than any other man given tone, consistency, and system to our judicature, and laid broad and deep the foundation of our civil and criminal law. The land titles of the State—the most important and permanent of the interests of a great commonwealth—have received from his hand their permanent protection, and this alone should entitle him to the lasting gratitude of the bar and the people.

"His opinions, whether for their learning, logic, or diction, will compare favorably, in the judgment of some of our best lawyers, with those of any judge upon the Supreme bench of the Union. It is true what he has accomplished has been done with labor; but this is so much more to his praise, for such work was not to be hastily done, and it was proper that the time spent in perfecting the work should bear some little proportion to the time it should last. We know it has been said of Judge Field that he is too much of a 'case lawyer,' and not sufficiently broad and comprehensive in his views. This criticism is not just. It is true he is reverent of authority, and likes to be sustained by precedent; but an examination of his opinions will show that, so far from being a timid copyist, or the passive slave of authority, his rulings rest upon clearly defined principles and strong common sense.

"He retires from office without a stain upon his ermine. Millions might have been amassed by venality. He retires as poor as when he entered—owing nothing and owning little, except the title to the respect of good men, which malignant mendacity can not wrest from a public officer who has deserved, by a long and useful career, the grateful appreciation of his fellow-citizens. We think that we may safely predict that, in his new place, Justice Field will fulfill the sanguine expectations of his friends."

How well he has fulfilled those expectations is now matter of public history, and is the cause of just pride with those friends.

It will be observed that Judge Baldwin places much stress upon the settlement of land titles by Judge Field. To this we wish to add that he also contributed greatly to the settlement of the law of mortgages. His decisions have made that the rule of law which before was the rule of equity, namely: that a mortgage is not a conveyance, but a pledge only, redeemable by compliance with the condition on which it was given. Herman, the author of a recent and most learned work on mortgages, expresses 'the opinion that: "No one man in this country has done as much in developing sound principles in regard to mortgages—that they are mere hypothecations—as Judge Field. To his labors on the Supreme Bench of California, and in the United States Supreme Court, have been indebted the courts of every State where the doctrine is maintained; and his California opinions are cited as leading and decisive of the true principles."

The obligations of municipal corporations, and the rules of law by which they are bound, were also defined and established by Judge Field, in numerous cases, while on the State Supreme Bench. Judge Dillon, in his recent work on municipal corporations, frequently refers to decisions on these subjects by Judge Field in terms of the highest praise, and recognizes the fact that the views contained in them have been concurred in very generally by the courts of other States, observing that they "are vindicated with characteristic clearness and striking logical force, and able and interesting opinions," by him.

In 1833, Mademoiselle de Maupin was begun. It was written in his room at his parents' home, on the Place Royale. This work, with all its fire, wearied Gautier excessively. The poet, then a lion and a fashionable personage, much preferred to rhyme gallant sonnets to fair young damsels, and to promenade the boulevards with his transcendent waistcoats and marvelous pantalons, rather than shut himself up before a lamp to blacken sheets of paper; and besides, being a thorough romanticist, he detested prose and looked upon it as the prime accomplishment of a Philistine. So, when he went into the house, his father would lock him up in his room and lay out his task. "You are not to come out," he would cry through the keyhole, "until you have finished ten pages of Maupin!" Sometimes Théophile was resigned; often he crept out through the window; at other times his mother, always fearful that her son would fatigue himself with so much work, came to release him.

In poison there is physic.—Shakspeare. And conversely in physic there is often—physic.

THE OPPOSING SEX.

The new Queen of Spain is said to have Spanish, Austrian, Hungarian, and Magyar blood in her veins—enough ingredients to make a first-class boarding-house hash.

The train had just emerged from a tunnel, and a vinegar-faced maiden of thirty-five summers remarked to her gentleman companion: "Tunnels are such bores!"—which nobody can deny. But a young lady of about sweet eighteen, who sat in a seat immediately in front of the ancient party, adjusted her hat, brushed her frizzes back, and said to the perfunctured young man beside her: "I think tunnels are awfully nice!"

Gentlemen ought to understand that a seat in a horse-car is anything but a blessing to a woman wearing an ulster. Those garments are made to walk in, but the woman does not live who can sit down while wearing one of them without looking as if she had on another person's clothes; and, therefore, most women prefer to stand when arrayed in them. We prefer that they should.

Among the Romans the women wore dresses of a kind of stuff so transparent that the body might be seen through it. This stuff was made of silk so extremely fine that it was dyed a purple color before it was made up; when this species of gauze was manufactured it was so delicate that it could not possibly have admitted the dye. The shell-fish which furnished the precious material of this color were found near the island of Cos, whence writers have denominated this stuff the dress of Cos. Narro named these habits "dresses of glass." They continued in vogue till the time of Jerome, who declaims loudly against them. We learn from Isaiah that the women and maidens of Jerusalem wore dresses of similar nature.

How sick Clara Morris will feel when she comes to hear that Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt is having a villa built at Sainte-Adresse! It is an agglomeration of pavilions and angles of the most coquettish description. The walls of the rooms are to be decorated by some of the master painters, and in the garden there will be the ruins of an ivy-clad temple—dedicated to Vesta, Plutus, Eros, or Apollo the god of the arts.

In Germany betrothed persons exchange rings, and both the man and the girl go about wearing their betrothal rings. This stamps them both as being out of the market and prevents mistakes.

The Empress of Austria is going to Ireland again shortly, and may possibly perish in Mr. Parnell's famine.

He looked over all the papers on the news-stand, and not finding what he wanted, said to the plump, pretty girl-clerk: "I want a Fireside Companion." "What, sir?" she blushed. "I want a Fireside Companion," he repeated. "Oh, yes, sir; I hear you now," and she chewed the corner of her apron; "well—well—do you think I would do?" It turned out happily.

The mitre, says the London Court Journal, about to be presented to a Roman Catholic ecclesiastic, and which can be seen in a West End silversmith's shop, is partly the produce of the sale of an enthusiastic young lady's jewelry. The lady recently went over to the Roman Church, and her rings and baubles, when broken up, brought about £500.

A young man who had just returned from a long journey, clasping his adored one in a loving embrace in a dimly-lighted parlor, was seized with a great terror, that for an instant paralyzed all his energies. "Oh, my darling," said he, wildly, "why didn't you write me of this? What is it—spinal disease? or have you dislocated some of your ribs, that you are obliged to wear this broad leather bandage?" "Oh, love," she gently murmured, "this is only my belt; I would have got a broader one, but it would not go under my arms."

The Duchess of Marlborough, says the Boston Advertiser, now the first lady in Ireland, likes poplins, but her example is lost upon her sisters. American ladies once drank no tea out of political spite, and the ladies of Lima gave their last golden ring to keep up the fight against Chili a little longer. But no political, patriotic, or national sentiment can induce Irish ladies to wear poplin, or to have their upholstery done with the best and almost only dress material produced in Ireland.

A pious woman was recently before a London police court for "disturbing, vexing, troubling, and disquieting" a clergyman while conducting service in the church which she had devoutly attended for years. Her offense consisted in making "a most shocking noise," which she considered singing, but which was a nuisance to everybody else. It was found to be incurable, and could no longer be endured.

The new Queen of Spain found some gorgeous rooms awaiting her at the Prado. Two parlors—one hung with white satin, embroidered with blue flowers, and furnished with blue satin, and the other hung and furnished with yellow satin; a music-room hung with red and gold, and containing two grand pianos; a study, in white and gold; a bedroom hung with buff silk, brocaded in red and blue, and containing a bed of ebony, ornamented with brass, and having a canopy of embossed brass and silk curtains; a dressing-room hung with buff silk and furnished with silver pine, and a room for the Queen's attendants complete the apartment.

Another American girl is to marry a nobleman. Why is it that our girls refuse to support their own countrymen? There is a lack of patriotism somewhere.

Mrs. Fred. Grant recently appeared in Washington in some quaint Eastern attire, presented to her by her mother-in-law—a dress of some wonderful Oriental fabric, and a number of Hindostanee ornaments, including bangles, which almost concealed her arms from wrist to elbow.

Miss McClellan, the young daughter of the General, is described as tall, slender, and blonde, very fair, and gifted with a charming smile.

General Sherman had the pleasant Christmas gift of a fourth grandchild. His daughter, Mrs. Fitch, has now two sons and two daughters.

A TRUE STORY ABOUT ANIMALS.

There was perhaps a little more than the usual excitement and chatter in the menagerie that afternoon, children, on account of its being Christmas eve; but it was all a good-natured excitement. By and by the elephant left off trying to blow bits of corn cob into the eagles' cage, and said:

"Good news for the menagerie."

And the animals all shouted: "Give it voice! Breathe it audibly!"

The elephant winked one of his wicked, twinkling little eyes and said:

"The parrot says he's going to hang up his talking."

And they all shouted and howled, and the parrot was so mad that it couldn't speak English for ten minutes. It was a Dutch parrot, and had been sold to the menagerie man by a Dutch sailor, but had learned to talk English pretty well when it wasn't very angry. Then the monkey—which was the same monkey that had that kind of a time with the parrot—said to the elephant:

"I know what you're going to get for your Christmas."

"What?" said the elephant.

"Handkerchief box," said the monkey; and the audience applauded again, for the elephant had the longest nose in the menagerie.

"Hullo," the elephant said, "didn't I see you climbing a yellow stick in a shop window this afternoon?"

"They'd have to hollow that handkerchief box out of a gum tree," said the giraffe.

"Look here," said the elephant, "you look like the head of a Noah's ark procession."

When the elephant couldn't think of anything funny, he always tried to say something mean.

"You'd better be careful," he went on, "you've got the awfulest lay-out for a case of croup I ever saw in this tent."

"Yes, but think," said the giraffe, who was a little sensitive to jokes about his neck, "just think, what if you should have a cold in the head?"

And then a Scotch staghound offered the elephant a pinch of snuff, but the elephant changed the subject back to Christmas, and said he hoped somebody would send the white bear a set of furs. The white bear growled that would bruise his health, and then he said he heard the manager say he was going to give the reindeer a nice sled and two strings of bells. The porcupine said he hoped somebody would send him a bunch of quill tooth-picks. Then he said he heard the zebra was going to get a pair of striped stockings. Just then the squirrel came running down the centre pole to ask what they were talking about, and the whole menagerie roared at him in chorus:

"We know what you're goin' to get! We know what you're goin' to get!"

"What?" he asked, with mingled curiosity and incredulity.

And then they just stood up and howled at him in one terrific yell:

"Pair of them climbin' things the telegraph repairers use!"

So you see, children, they have just as much fun on Christmas in the menagerie as they do anywhere else.—Hawkeye.

Truth vs. Local Pride.

This is a cause in which the plaintiff has been so frequently unsuited that he files additional complaints with extreme reluctance. As a lawyer he knows by bitter experience that there is very little money in the controversy, and as an advocate of his own suit he not only has a fool for his client—technically speaking—but is conscious that the world knows it. If the average San Franciscan is brought face to face with the proposition that this is not the most thoroughly cultured city on the planet, or even in America, he will probably admit that the proposition is not untenable; but the chances are that he will vote you a prig, and wish that the intrusive lance of your vulgar pessimism might be indicted as a nuisance. And, after all, the pessimist may be wrong, and San Francisco's culture may be as unmistakable as the wealth of its wealthier citizens and the lavish dampness of its summer evenings; but, if this be truly true, will some San Franciscan answer these three plain questions: Why is not the Mercantile Library out of debt? Why have we not a lecture audience capable of listening to, and paying for, something better than skeptical platitudes or literary hasty-pudding? Why have we not a single public art gallery? To say that our best citizens have numerous and extensive private libraries; that we rarely have had lecturers capable of drawing good audiences, and that when we have had them we have always met them half-way; that the private art collections of our millionaires and the semi-public galleries of our local artists and dealers are adequate to the formation of a catholic art taste in our midst—to say these things is to ask us to forget that our statutes were violated to keep the Mercantile alive, that we damned Emerson and Kingsley with faint appreciation, and that the current local understanding of art is the starvation of those of its San Franciscan caterers who do not deserve starvation.

The situation of a pretty girl, fond and foolish, and consequently fragile, standing in the path of a ruthless rake, is as old as the Psalms and more trite in the average telling than the schedule of the Inebriate Asylum. But the piquancy of immorality is perennial, except to the absolute moralist—and the absolute moralist is a myth. The atmosphere of our lives may, for the most part, be blown over clover meadows and Alpine heights and the broad Atlantic; but half the time we do not care to question either its birth-place or its wanderings. It may be safely testified, on information and belief, that a large majority of those super-sensitive persons who sniff contemptuously at the odor of musk and jonquil, sniff with a great deal of genuine satisfaction when their backs are turned. This is not contending that organized society is altogether corrupt. It is merely asserting that we have not outgrown the pruriency which made Adam a sneak and Eve unchaste. A great many women—including our mothers and sisters and dearest friends—we know to be pure and altogether womanly; yet we know scores of women—excellent as conventional excellence goes—who could not have stood the fire of average temptation for a single fortnight, if it had ever come to them in the form of an unscrupulous and magnetic lover. Perhaps this knowledge governs our undeniable enjoyment of newspaper scandal. But either this knowledge or something else has framed illicit passion with the most palpable halo in all human admiration. Our refinement is measured by our ingenuity in gilding the expression of this idea. Modern refinement culminated with George Eliot's portrayal of the seduction of Hetty Sorrel. The temporary revulsion toward nakedness of expression is seen in the current appreciation of Zola.

During the past eighteen months (says the Nation) we have presented a curious spectacle to the world. Some thousands of our people have been digging silver out of the bowels of the earth, which the Government has paid for, put its stamp upon, and consigned immediately to the bowels of the earth again. The silver subjected to this novel treatment is for all practical purposes just where it was before the miners took hold of it. If it should ever be wanted we should know where to find it, but it never will be wanted except to sell at its bullion value. In the direst depression of the iron trade nobody was bold enough to propose that the Government should buy and bury two million dollars' worth of pig-metal per month. That is what we have been doing for the silver-miners, and they can not expect that we shall continue to do so always. A century or two ago the British Parliament was petitioned to buy and store the surplus woollen goods on the market in order to stimulate trade and give employment to labor and capital. The wisdom of the period was engaged upon the subject a long time, and it was finally determined to deny the prayer of the petitioners, but to require that all corpses be buried in woollen shrouds. A similar compromise might be effected with the miners, if they should prove troublesome, by requiring that all coffins be furnished with silver handles. But to do the miners justice we must acknowledge that they had little share in passing the Silver Bill, and have as yet shown no great anxiety to keep it on the statute book. Senator Jones has made a good deal of noise on the subject at one time and another, but his influence has been insignificant compared with that of the Blands and Warners, the Ferrys and Voorheeses, the Medills and Halsteads. The wisest of them must see that in the long run the price of silver will be regulated by the commercial demand for it, and not by an artificial demand like that of the Secretary of the Treasury, who goes into the market as an automaton to buy what he has no use for. If they do not perceive this truth, the public ere long will perceive it and act upon it.

Many Americans, particularly Californians, says a writer in the Republic, boast of this place or that as the finest in the world. Not very long ago I read in some paper that the country-house now being built for Flood, the bonanza king, at Menlo Park, California, would be one of the grandest residences in the world. No doubt Mr. Flood's house and grounds will be gorgeous, for the neighborhood is celebrated for its handsome residences. Welbeck Abbey, however, one of the residences of the late Duke of Portland, may be considered as somewhat surpassing even the California residences. A late English paper, the Sheffield Daily Telegraph, in speaking of Welbeck, says that the grounds seem to be literally undermined. "Extending in all directions from the abbey are burrows or passages; not mere borings or excavations, but lofty, spacious passages, brilliantly lighted by costly apparatus for letting in sunlight, and where sunlight can not be admitted, by lights from gas. By an underground passage we come to the celebrated riding-school, the like of which is not to be found in Europe, or in the world. It is entered by a trap-door, opened by means of a curiously-designed crank in the passage. In the days of the Duke of Newcastle it was used as a riding-school; now it is a magnificent museum of art over 180 feet in length. Hundreds of pictures are arranged—not hung—round the gallery, and piled in stacks on the floor are thousands of volumes of books, some modern, and many old, rare, and valuable. The floor of this gallery is of oak, and the ceiling is made to represent a brilliant midsummer sky. Mirrors in profusion are placed about, and light is shed from four chandeliers suspended from the roof, and each weighing a ton. This apartment is lighted up by over 2,000 gas-lights, and when all are illuminated the effect must be extremely brilliant. There are some miles of passages under the grounds. One extends from the abbey half the way to Workshop; another was used only by the Duke of Portland. The passages are all broad enough for three people to walk abreast in them, and pleasant to walk in. The library, like the picture gallery, is underground, and is the work of many years.

It is the London News which tells the following: M. Herrmann, the Viennese conjuror, unlike the "mediums" who perform tricks and call them miracles, does miracles and calls them tricks. M. Jules Claretie is responsible for the accuracy of the following tale: Herrmann was engaged in the difficult task of amusing that monarch "who lives the life of a wounded rabbit in a hole"—the Sultan. The scene was a boat moored in the Bosphorus. "Will you oblige me," said Herrmann to the Grand Vizier, "by throwing your watch overboard?" The Vizier looked doubtful, but the Sultan nodded, and the watch sank glittering through the sea. "Now," said Herrmann, "will some one kindly give me a fishing rod?" A rod was brought, a line and a hook, which the conjuror baited before the eyes of the Padishah, as a Pushtoo contemporary calls the Sultan. He soon had a nibble, struck, and, after an exciting interval, had a fine fish in the landing-net. Herrmann opened the fish and took out the Vizier's watch, still keeping capital time. Repressing a strong inclination to refer to the ring of Polycrates, we go on to prove that Herrmann can juggle as well for the wily Muscovite as the gallant Turk. While amusing the leisure of the Autocrat of all the Russias, he broke a large and magnificent mirror. The superstitious potentate winced, for to break a mirror is unlucky, and a curtain was thrown over the glass. Herrmann went on with his tricks for a while, then suddenly exclaimed, "I forgot the glass; look at it." The curtain was removed, and there was the mirror whole and unharmed!

How nearly akin laughter is to tears was shown when Reubens, with a single stroke of his brush, turned a laughing child in a painting to one crying; and our mothers, without being great painters, have often brought us, in like manner, from joy to grief by a single stroke of the brush—the hairbrush.

THE OTHER POETS.

The Mountain of Gold.

In the region of chartless land that lies
Far off in a dream of Hesperian skies;
By the rivers that, drifting golden lees,
Bear beauty and song to the Mexican seas—
I have sat in the miner's bivouac,

When night with its stars like a psalm unrolled,
And heard, as he leaned on his grumpy pack,
A miner discourse on the Mount of Gold.

And the howl of the wolf was faint and far,
As the moon, like a ship, from star to star
Sailed on; and the plain, with a sea-like sweep,
Lay silent and wide in its mystic sleep;
And the river below in an undertone
Sang sweetly, and, chiming its cymbals, sang
Of a sorrowful land and the wolf alone
Where seas had marched and the old wars rang.

And the glorified peaks stood high and white,
Like kings that were called to the court of Night;
And voices of mystery seemed to swell
On the wind in the pines as it rose and fell;
For thus 'mid the audible throbs of earth
The tale of the miner was fitly told—
With never a sneer or a sound of mirth
For those who had battled and toiled for gold.

But the Mountain of Gold was said to stand
Away in the depths of a solemn land,
Which the rivers explore as they bend afar
On the glimmering track of the evening star;
And ever, like dust of the unhallowed dead,
The sands of the desert do rise in clouds,
And gather and sweep with a ghostly tread
Around it, and rustle like dreary shrouds.

And a skeleton guard of mountains bleak,
Where the vulture dozes and whets his beak,
Defend it and hoard in their grisly arms
The dazzle of splendor and virgin charms
That no one has seen but those priests of the Sun
Who fled from the sword of the Spanish knight,
And whose shadows still, when the day is done,
Kneel there on the steps of their altar bright!

'Twas sought—but the rider and horse were lost;
Their bones are still, and their ashes tossed
With the sands as they drift in eternal unrest,
Where their spirits yet rise in the hopeless quest.
But a glamour of mystery strangely shines
Where the dead have been strewn and the living stray,
And the gorges are rich with exhaustless mines—
Untouched, as our hearts and our hopes decay.

And the robber Apache hovers far
On the thundering chase or the trail of war;
And the shark of the desert, gaunt and gray,
Slips by like a shade to distant prey;
And yet and for aye, on the yellow breast
Of the dead and desolate waste, the prize
Of that Mountain of Gold is said to rest,
Like a star that has dropped from the dreaming skies.

Perhaps it is only a miner's theme,
The glint of some wandering Aztec's dream—
As clouds in the magical sunset shine
Like islands of silver in seas of wine;
But may be not think, when the placer fails,
And poverty lurks on the olden trails,
That treasure barbaric and joy untold
Are shining beyond in a Mountain of Gold?

A Sea Song.

Ever alone by the sea
She sang, and she sang away,
"Oh! bide the waters and bides the sky,
But love is for a day."

Up from its wandering ebb
In its strong flood rushed the main;
"Oh! the waters come back, though far they roam,
But love comes not again."

And the sea sang in its depths,
Far from the troubled shore,
"Though I be not in the time to come,
Love shall live evermore."

Twilight Thoughts.

O winter twilight while the moon
Grows whiter on the deepening blue,
I find some brief-lived thoughts in you,
That rise not in the night or noon.

Of faded loves that once were sweet,
But now are neither sweet nor sad;
Of hopes that, distant, looked so glad,
Yet lie, unnoticed, at our feet;

Of these I think, until the red
Has wasted from the western sky,
And royal reigns the moon on high—
What profits to lament the dead?

Small profit; yet in dreams that hold
One hand to forward, one to past,
We stay the years that fly so fast,
And link our new lives to the old. —F. W. B.

Sunshine and Shadow.

A bank of weeds, of simple weeds,
Of sweet wild thyme and yellow, scented broom,
Of tangled grass and slender, wind-blown reeds,
Of brown notched ferns and tall spoked fox-glove bloom.
A world of beauty gathers there,
Low-tittering birds, soft scents, and colors fair.

A narrow mound, a long, low mound,
Snow-covered, 'neath a wintry, leaden sky,
Unlit by moon or stars; and all around,
Through bare, brown trees the night winds moan and sigh.
A world of love lies buried there,
Passion and pain, bright hopes and dull despair.

Oh, golden bank, where sunbeams glint and play,
Bloom out in fragrance with a hundred flowers!
Oh, narrow mound, keep till the judgment day
The mournful secrets of these hearts of ours!
God's light makes joy and sorrow fade,
For near His brightness both alike are shade.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 17, 1880.

The February number of THE CALIFORNIAN, issued next Friday morning, Jan. 23d, will present a most appetizing table of contents. Those who anticipate will not be disappointed. Prudes will be particularly interested in the opening sections of an article entitled "On with the Dance." A book of 100 pages, remember, for 25 cents. Order from your news-dealer, or from any news-boy.

The evidence accumulates upon all sides that the possibilities of the nomination of General Grant for the Presidential office are declining. What is known as the political machine has been worked diligently and intelligently for his nomination. It has had the support of sbrewd and able and wealthy men. The movement has been supported largely by those in office, and those who, like a certain corrupt and desperate ring in California, hope to get office. The opposition to General Grant comes from two causes, and represents but one class of citizens, and that class represents the best, most intelligent, and patriotic of the nation. The first cause is the wide-spread conviction that General Grant was not a success in his civil administration. There are many who affect to think his administration a bad one, and himself not free from the corruption that distinguished his second term. In this opinion we do not agree. We have every confidence in the personal integrity of General Grant. There are men who believe that the surroundings of his second term were bad, that there was great demoralization in public affairs at Washington, that the political "careers" of Robeson, Bahcock, Williams, Belknap, and others would be reenacted if Grant were reelected, and that the corrupt rings so prominent in his second term would come again into active life. This class of Republicans is strong, active, and influential. There is another more numerous, and, at the ballot-box, more formidable body of men, who will not consent to the reelection of General Grant, whether he is or is not nominated by the Republican party. The persons who compose this class have a high personal regard for General Grant, hold him in great esteem, admire him for his heroic qualities, and have entire confidence in his personal honor; but there is, in their judgment, a principle involved that forbids them to vote for the third term. They regard the two-term principle as a settled constitutional provision that may not be disturbed—a tradition that may not be violated; and there are no political conditions that will, in their judgment, justify a departure from this established and settled and fixed constitutional and traditional law. The Republican National Convention might afford to ignore the wishes of that class of citizens who were not satisfied with either his first or second Presidential term. The party leaders might say that party discipline will bring this class to the support of a Republican candidate; but a National Convention dares not say, "We will set at defiance the opinions of that large class of American voters who, from love of country and patriotic principle, have resolved not to support a third-term candidate."

The sentiment among the Republicans of California is warmly sympathetic with General Grant. There is for him an admiration and love that no public man has ever called forth. His mistakes of civil administration are seldom alluded to, and then apologetically; but there is an almost universal sentiment that he must not be renominated, and there is an almost unanimous resolve that if he is nominated, he shall not be made President by the electoral vote of this State. It would be party suicide and political madness to give the candidacy to General Grant, as he could not carry the States of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Ohio, Indiana, California, or Oregon. He may be nominated; there is no mode of measuring the probabilities of a political convention manipulated by the most adroit and most unscrupulous politicians of the Republican organization. The men who propose Grant from principle are not politicians, are not leaders, are powerless in conventions; but they are a great, silent, compact, resolute army, that will march to the ballot-box with a fearless resolve to save this nation from the calamities that are possible if General Grant becomes for the third time President of the United States. There are local causes operating in the State of California that would make it impossible to give the electoral vote of this State to General Grant. It is reasonable to suppose that the men of California who had his ear before would have it again; that the politics of this State would swing back into the old groove; that the same shameless and unprincipled thieves and adventurers who then guarded the Republican throne upon this coast would again rally around it, and again wallow in the mud of its surroundings. The same thieving banditti that ruled in mint and navy-yard; that fattened on contracts and grew rich on the loot and plunder of office; that whispered honest men to death, and stabbed reputations; that rioted and grew fat; that swelled in lobbies, served corporations for hire, and lied and libeled; that turned traitor to party and tail to principle, would all be hack upon us—would be again all lean and hungry and desperate, feeding at the public crib—both feet, all feet in the trough, gorging themselves with the swill of dishonest party plunder. No honest work can give the delegation of this State to General Grant. No human effort can give him its twelve electoral votes.

The disposition of the water question seems to us one of easy solution. We think there is a plan by which the citizens of San Francisco can obtain cheap water without creating a bonded debt, without stealing private property, and without leaving an unequal public burden upon the few water consumers. That the Spring Valley Water Company has the best and only practicable system for supplying the city of San Francisco we do not doubt, never have doubted; that the water is pure and good we know; that it is abundant we believe; that its supply will be sufficient for a million of people when the Calaveras Valley is added we are convinced. The Spring Valley corporation has water; the city of San Francisco wants it. How to get it honestly and cheaply is the question. The city government can not steal it. It can not condemn it without risking the creation of a great debt. The city had better not own it if any other device can be suggested for securing its waters. To own it is, first, to create a bonded debt, and second, to create a political concern that would be expensive to administer. The present condition of things is a flagrant outrage upon the few who are compelled to become purchasers of water. Rates are exorbitant, oppressive, and unjust. Water is an expensive luxury to the few whose necessities compel them to become purchasers of it; while great financial property and business interests reap all the advantages of water without paying anything for it. To illustrate: All owners of unimproved property, all speculators in suburban property, all owners of large commercial buildings, all non-consumers of water, get the benefit of water without paying for it. The speculator who refuses to improve, but lies idly by his lots till the enterprise of others gives them value, pays nothing for the water that protects from fire, or preserves from epidemics, or contributes to comfort. A block of buildings used for merchandise or storage pays almost nothing toward a water system that reduces insurance to a minimum, and, through a fire department, gives protection to uninsured property.

The firm of Murphy, Grant & Co., with a building worth half a million of dollars, and a stock of dry-goods worth a million, pays only for water for its closets and lavation. The Bank of California and the Nevada Bank pay for water-closets and stationary wash-stands. Charles McLaughlin, who lives at the Palace Hotel and drives in the park with his elegant equipage, pays nothing for laying the dust in his drives. Our streets are sprinkled, our sewers are flushed, our public buildings are provided with water, our fires are extinguished, at the cost of seventeen thousand water consumers, while the great body of the people and nearly all the wealth of the city entirely escape taxation. This is an unequal, unreasonable, and unjust burden. The proposition to reduce water rates below a fair interest to the stockholders of the Spring Valley Water Company is a dishonest one. To allow the Board of Supervisors annually to fix water rates is to make it possible for the demagogue or the dishonest politician to curry the favor of voters by stealing the property that does not belong to him, and dividing it among his constituents as a bribe for their support. This is in substance the proposition of Mr. John F. Swift, and is neither honorable, nor practicable, nor honest. To introduce Lake Merced's scant supply of had water in order to work a partial and destructive competition to a more extensive private system is to use it as a stuffed club to so intimidate private owners that they will sell; to so compete with them that they will be compelled to part with their property, is Mr. Andrew J. Bryant's proposition, and it is neither feasible nor decent. When San Francisco extends to the water-shed of Lake Merced, its waters will become poisonous, and there is no device known to engineering, and no protection within the expenditure of millions, that will preserve the waters of this lake from the foul and poisonous drainage of a great city.

To condemn this property by computing as its value what it would cost to-day in the purchase and laying of its mains and distributing pipe and the building of its reservoirs, and take it from its owners by a forced process of law, is to steal it. This is, in substance, the Bulletin's plan. It is confiscation, robbery, and dishonest appropriation. The value of the Spring Valley Water Company's works and franchise is what the franchise and works are worth, considering the fact of location and supply, and whether the works could be duplicated at all, and if so at what reasonable cost. The past, the present, and the future are to be regarded in an estimate of value of property of this kind. The Bulletin is worth—not what its types and press would bring at auction; it has a capitalized value in accordance with its earnings, its good will, its age, its character. It is worth what it would bring under the circumstances of a fair sale. The Spring Valley Company owns its property as all of us own our estates. It has the same right to the protection of the law as an individual. If an individual went to the mountains of San Mateo and brought away a pail of water, no one would have a right to steal and drink it, even if he were ever so thirsty. The city needs this water for the supply of her citizens, for the extinction of fires, for her public institutions, for flushing her sewers, for sprinkling her streets, for fertilizing her parks, for her public fountains; but it has no right to steal it, nor confiscate it, nor fix rates for its use; and it has no right to place the burdens of water consumption on the class of consumers that is compelled to have it from the company's pipes.

This property is not all owned by Senator Sharon and Charles Webb Howard, and if it were it would not be justifiable to steal it, even from them. It belongs to all sorts of people—to foreigners, non-residents, estates, orphans, and is held in trust for minors. The men who own it know their rights, and the law will protect them; and all this demagoguery on the part of ambitious politicians, and all this affectation of public zeal on the part of the Bulletin, Call, and other journals that are engaged in making this howl, is a piece of charlatanism as absurd and ridiculous as it is useless and criminal. To attempt or to succeed in stealing the water company's property, or to obtain it for less than its value, or to fix rates for less than a fair compensation, is as immoral as it would be to take Claus Spreckles's sugar refinery, D. O. Mills's dairy, or the merchandise of the White House, because sugar, milk, and dry-goods are among the indispensable necessities of the people. Then, says the reader, how can the people of San Francisco secure this water honestly and justly?—how get it equitably and fairly?—how adjust this matter satisfactorily to the stockholders of Spring Valley and to the citizens?—how so arrange that its burdens shall be removed from the seventeen thousand consumers and shared equally by all? We answer: By fixing fair compensatory water rates, and equitably dividing them between consumers and all property-owners in the City and County of San Francisco. By levying a water-tax, as all other large cities in Europe and America do. Let a commission of disinterested and honorable business men be selected. Let them be intelligent tax-payers, and not broken-down, impecunious political adventurers. Let them fix a value upon the water company's property, and upon this valuation allow a fair rate of interest. Let a fair amount be allowed for the company to administer its affairs. Let an annual sum be set apart for improvements and repairs. Let the consumers pay one-fifth or one-fourth the entire cost. Let the balance, four-fifths or three-fourths, be charged upon the general tax levy and collected as other taxes are collected.

It might be wise to agree upon an amount for which the company would sell its entire plant, and a sinking fund to purchase it by payment upon the installment plan, say within thirty years. Thus would we avoid litigation, endless and expensive, with the company; avoid doing or attempting to do a wrong; avoid a great bonded debt; avoid a complex and costly political machine; secure the property at the expiration of thirty years; reduce the cost of water to consumers, and place the burden equally upon all property, improved or unimproved, of resident or non-resident owners, and make all alike bear the burdens of that article of universal consumption, indispensable to rich and poor, and necessary for the safety, health, and comfort of all the people. Let us suppose the property is worth $12,000,000. It would not be an exorbitant tax to pay its owners a fair rate of interest for its use, and enough to keep in repair its works, administer its affairs, and extend its area of catchment and distribution as the city expands and increases in wealth and population. If Senator Sharon owned the water company, and Governor Perkins owned the city, and both parties understood their legal rights, and both were disposed to fair and honorable dealing, this matter would be adjusted in a fortnight upon some honest basis. But if Senator Sharon were an idiot and Governor Perkins were an editor—if there were demagoguery, personal malice, ambition to go to Congress, and a desire to please everybody, and make a little money on the sly, and to be reelected Supervisor—there would be the devil to pay, just as there is now.

AFTERMATH.

Two years ago the Legislature made legal provision for a Constitutional Convention, and provided that its members should be paid ten dollars per day while in session, not to exceed one hundred days, and made appropriation therefor; in other words, it was the law, and so understood and accepted by the members of the Constitutional Convention, that for their entire service they should each receive $1,000. Instead of confining the session to one hundred days, it was extended to one hundred and fifty-seven days. In violation of law and contract, the Constitutional Convention issued scrip to its members for the added days of session—$570 to each member more than he was entitled to receive—making in the aggregate $86,640. This scrip was sold at 50 cents on the dollar to money-lenders. In addition to this amount there is a further deficiency of some $40,000 for expenses. Senator Baker, of Santa Clara, has introduced a concurrent resolution to so amend the Constitution that this amount can never be drawn from the treasury, and this is right. It is honest, and it is not a hardship either to the members who still hold their pay, nor to the pawnbrokers and other Shylocks who have risked their money upon the doubtful security of scrip illegally issued.

To pay this amount creates a large deficiency that will be charged to the extravagance of a Republican Legislature, and make a bad financial showing at the next election. Those members of the Legislature who vote to pay this sum out of the treasury will violate their pledges of retrenchment. There are six gentlemen in the Senate who, having been members of the Constitutional Convention, will, from motives of delicacy affecting their personal honor, be estopped from any endeavor to draw this money from the treasury; they are Messrs. Gorman, Burt, Glasscock, West, Lampson, and Moreland. Mr. McComas and others in the lower house are in the same delicate position. The lobby will say to such of these gentlemen as have parted with their scrip that they ought to see it paid. It will be an easy conscience that, having sold $587 worth of illegal scrip, will legislate its payment out of the pockets of tax-payers in vindication of their own honor, and in violation of law.

Donations to the Irish Relief Committee were as follows: Mr. Jackson, of the Post, $50; Mr. Fitch, of the Bulletin, $100; Mr. Pickering, of the Call, $200; Mr. De Young, of the Chronicle, $250. The balance of the press to be heard from. The ARGONAUT gives more than anybody; it gives the following good advice to the poor American Irish: Don't give at all. Keep your money. Don't be bled by politicians.

The Free Public Library on Bush Street is a success. The attendance by day is good; at night, numerous. The visitors are quiet, studious, well dressed, and well behaved. The tough septuagenarian seeks knowledge with the same avidity as the tender boy at his side—devours romances. The chairs are comfortable, the tables handy, the lighting and ventilation good. The male librarians are courteous, affable, and competent. But the female assistants—ah! it is here that our powers of description fail us—that our desire to be conscientious is lost in admiration. They are unquestioned queens of the bibliothecal realm. Their familiarity with recondite literature is bewildering, amazing. If you ascend into the heavens of sociology and physics, they are there; if you go down into the bottomless depths of blood-and-thunder novels, lo! they are there also. Their intellectual aim is unerring. They "bring down" their book with the same calm confidence of superiority and power as Carver or Bogardus might a glass ball. You can not stump them. You can but receive your mental pabulum reverently at their hands, and, as you hunt up a vacant chair in a subdued manner, wonder how these small beads can carry all they know.

There is but one feature in the library which demands reformation. It is this: to the right of the door, as you enter, stands a table, and on this table lie classified indexes (or indices, if you are hypercritical) of all the books to be found on the shelves, so that visitors may make selection before inquiry. The constant fingering and thumbing of eager digits has worn away the brown-paper coverings which once indicated the nature of their respective contents. True, we can still satisfy ourselves of the character of each catalogue by turning over its leaves, and a simple mental process will convince the inquirer that he need not try to find The Scalp Hunters in a list where Proctor's Astronomy stares him blankly in the face. But this is not what is wanted; what is wanted is a cast-iron binding, with title stenciled into it. This is the only thing that will stand the wear and tear of a public library—unless it be sand-paper. There is no affinity between finger-ends and sand-paper. It is a substance that deserves and commands respect. Still, it might make thieves of honest smokers, so on the whole we lean to cast-iron; and, with all due deference, submit the suggestion for the consideration of the librarian-in-chief.

If John F. Swift and ex-Mayor Bryant would drown themselves. If Fred MacCrellish would drink nothing but the waters of the Laguna de la Merced. If Maboney and Cobb and White and Purdy would wait awhile till they got where water would be more refreshing. If the Post and Chronicle would be as intelligent as they are zealous; and if the Bulletin and Call would be as honest as they are unreasonable, malicious, and vindictive; and if all parties had as much sense and independence as the ARGONAUT has, this water muddle could be adjusted to everybody's satisfaction, and that in a very short time.

The Legislature—except our friend Judge Tyler, and our member from Jerusalem, Mr. Braunhart—has scarcely got itself into working order: we might say fighting order. A multitude of bills has been introduced, but none passed. There will be as many acts and amendments of acts introduced into this session as there will be into all the Parliaments, Chambers of Deputies, Reichstags, Assemblies, Sanhedrims, and Legislatures of all the world beside. Most of these will be crude, undigested, ill-considered attempts at legislation by ignorant, prejudiced, partisan fools, who think the world stands on four elephants, the elephants on a turtle, the turtle on a rock, and the rock on their broad and brawny shoulders. About six members in the House and three in the Senate will develop into active, talking, bill-introducing prominence. They will gabble upon every occasion. They will strut and blow, and be personally quarrelsome, offensive, and disgusting. We counsel to the more sensible, sedate, and silent members to allow this little hand of garrulous idiots a full swing. In a week or two they will tire out and subside.

The Inaugural Ball was a success, if such a mixed and incongruous thing as a political hall can ever be a success. It is our observation that social and political life do not harmoniously blend. A gentleman in political position does not willingly bring to his support social aid. A lady in society does not cheerfully accept in her saloons the political bummers who are found indispensable to her husband's advancement. An inaugural ball, in either Washington or Sacramento, is necessarily a very mixed affair. Receptions by Presidents or Governors are ditto. The custom of giving them would, we think, be honored in its breach.

Now, then, let the legislators go to business. There are grave measures to consider, and important laws to pass. The new Constitution is an experiment, and its interpretation demands grave and honest thought, patient and careful and intelligent study. There are men in the Senate and in the House to whom the eyes of the community turn with expectation of honest and intelligent legislation. There is no interest and no class whose welfare is not to be advanced or hindered by the acts of this session: wealth and industry alike look to it for healthful laws, society for protection, and governmental order for support. There are honors to be won and reputations to be made in this legislative term; but the men who will make the most speeches and introduce the most bills are not the ones who will carry back to their constituents the best, most honored, and lasting records of serviceable work.

Our poor bicyclists are having a bard time of it. The "powers that be" are about to issue an edict prohibiting them from tooling their tandem buggies in the sacred precincts of Golden Gate Park; cause assigned, that they frighten the horses. "One of them" has button-holed a reporter, into whose sympathizing ears he pours his woes to this effect: that Washington, Boston, Baden, and London have unanimously "indorsed" this new system of locomotion in public places, without accident or detriment to horse or driver; ergo, why should San Francisco get her cosmopolitan back up about it? We are inclined to think, however, that the action of the park authorities in this matter must be based on some very good and solid grounds; and, as it would be an unbearable insult to hint, or even imagine, that our horses are more timid and skittish than the horses of the afore-mentioned cities, there is but one reasonable way of getting out of this most awkward dilemma—and that is by supposing that the capers and contortions of our bicyclists are fearfully and wonderfully unique, and consequently overstep the limits of equine endurance; in other words, horse sense.

Bats have bed-bugs under their wings. It is a very good place for the bug, but it is devilish uncomfortable for the bat. George C. Gorham, a small and bad-smelling political bug, is endeavoring to crawl under General Grant's Presidential wing. It would be a good thing for Black-and-Tan, but General Grant would lose the electoral vote of California.

Francis Parkman, in his reply to the critics who played a five-flush against his full hand on the "Woman Question," tells, in the North American Review, the following neat story: A gentleman recently visited a school taught by a young woman, and essayed to examine the pupils in grammar. Among other questions he innocently asked the gender of a certain noun. "We don't teach anything about gender in this school," interposed the fair instructor. Mr. Parkman says that his critics have misquoted him, and that their arguments are no arguments, and their facts distorted nothings. Neither Mr. Higginson nor Mrs. Stanton will like either the tenor or the tone of Mr. Parkman's latest paper, but they can scarcely write more brilliant dogmatism themselves, and their three coadjutors are scarcely in the fight at all.

At the Young Men's Christian Association Hall on Monday evening "Dublin Pete," the young Christian from Ireland, who nearly killed Jack Askew at Virginia City, gave an exhibition in the manly art of muscular Christianity. He illustrated how triumphant the church militant might become if the young Christians who own this hall, and who give in charity over $500 a year, cash, and three hundred "meal tickets" of the value of ten cents each, would, instead of prayers at noon, afternoon, and evening, instead of street preaching and tract distributing, go out into the by-ways and hedges, and with their well-practiced maulers compel a change of heart to all the ungodly whom they should meet. Mahometism spread by fire and sword, and, under the sign of the crescent, changed the religion of broad and populous empires. We honor Dr. Cox, Lloyd Tevis, and other enthusiastic young Christians for this new departure, commending them for turning their hall into a den of pugilistic short-boys, plug-uglies, shoulder-strikers, and hoodlums. It is one of the most useful purposes to which this Young Men's Christian Association Hall has of late been appropriated.

The Sacramento Record-Union suggests the importation of a warden for our State prison, and leads us to hope that Col. Louis D. Pilsbury, of New York, might be induced to immigrate to this State and take charge of our penitentiary at San Quentin. We agree with the Union-Record that the management of San Quentin has been unsuccessful and extravagant, but we are not quite prepared to admit that we must go abroad for the capacity and integrity requisite for a penologist to manage our convicts. We have great confidence in our home productions, and think that with diligent search the right man for the position may be found in California.

Says Parsons: "We must have some great Man from abroad to serve the State."
"Twere most unwise," says John McComb,
"To overlook such men at home."

We suppose we ought to feel very grateful to Messrs. Burke, Dewey, Holliday, and Trekane for their very public-spirited and entirely unselfish desire to serve the stockholders of the bonanza mines and the tax-payers of San Francisco. We suppose we ought to recognize the fact that this quartet of superior citizens are generously spending their time and money to reform mine management and to compel the bonanza firm to do its entire duty to the public in payment of its taxes; but somehow there is just the breath of latent suspicion that the attorneys are working for coin, and the clients working out their personal revenge, in a quarrel with which the general public has no especial concern. We do not hint at blackmail, because it is not presumable, from the character of the gentlemen whose names we have mentioned, that any conceivable amount of money would restore the formerly amiable relations that existed between these parties. If there is anything we admire, it is the moral courage, public spirit, and unselfish resolve that prompts individual members of society to sacrifice themselves for the public good.

In Jackson Street, the other day, a painful sight presented itself—a proud Saxon sawing wood for a moon-eyed harbarian, while leprous sons of Asia stood idly by.

Mr. J. C. Duncan informs us that we erred last week in stating that at his first trial the vote of the jury was eleven for conviction and one for acquittal. The vote, he says, at both his first and second trials, was at first seven for conviction, five for acquittal, and finally eight for conviction, four for acquittal. We took our figures from a correspondent of the Bulletin, who, we think, professed to have been on the first jury; but whether he was the one for acquittal or the eleven for conviction he did not state.

The portrait of Emperor Norton by Oscar Kunath, which is exhibited in a Montgomery Street window, is almost a masterpiece. Could the artist be persuaded to carry it nearer to completion in a few particulars it would rank above any of our recent similar works. Despite its few evident faults and shortcomings—perhaps partly owing to them—it merits more than a passing approval. Its slight exaggerations add the element of "the artist's personality." A lack of finish has left its excellent modeling and relief undisturbed by the risks of elaboration. Its breath, which verges on temerity, reveals the conviction of knowledge; and, finally, the faithful sympathy which has reflected the appealing dumb-animal look of the kindly, crack-brained old man is the distinctive characteristic of the true artist.

A deputation of young men, each in a claw-hammer coat, visited this office to protest against Ada Vent's nation of that loga virilis, in her last week's letter to a large circle of sorrowing friends.

THREE POEMS OF HEINE.

Translated by George Gossman.

WHAT WOULDST THOU MORE?
Thou hast diamonds and pearls, I see,
Of all in richest store,
And thine eyes are so enchanting—
My sweet, what wouldst thou more?

And of those eyes so enchanting
I oft have sung before;
And hosts of songs have I written—
My sweet, what wouldst thou more?

And with those eyes so enchanting
Thou mad'st my heart so sore,
And now that my life is blasted,
My sweet, what wouldst thou more?

THE BENEFACTOR.

Oft much good advice they gave,
And showered me with praise,
And said: "Have plenty of patience,
And wait for better days."

For all that good advice they gave,
I worse and worse did fare,
And would have starved, had not a man
Now taken me in care.

This good man all my wants supplied,
Put food upon my shelf—
I can not kiss him, I regret,
For I'm that man myself.

THE DECLARATION.

All generations are passing,
And the years come and go,
But my love to you, my dearest,
Shall never vanish so.

Once more I should like to see you
And fall upon my knee,
And tenderly declare: "Madame,
I'm yours respectfully."

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1880.

"FLYING SHEETS."

A Christmas Ride by Rail, and its Reward.

There were four of us; a distinguished elocutionist, an extinguished judicial candidate, an unextinguishable Democratic politician, and a nondescript journalist. We had been invited to spend Christmas week at the home of the politician's family, near Duncan's Mills. The elocutionist and the willing-to-have-been judge had paid previous prolonged visits to this favored retreat; the other had never been there.

When we left San Francisco on the 11:40 San Quentin boat, the Frisco atmosphere was as brusque and frigid as the undiluted sympathy of a professional philanthropist. But before the graceful Sausalito had reached her moorings the sun was shining through a more responsive atmosphere. The whiff of salty breeze from off the marshes at San Rafael was all unlike the pungent crispness of the domineering norther which came in through the Golden Gate, and swept over the metropolis in rude contempt, to tear itself into complaining tatters upon the Alameda hill-tops.

The ex-candidate, who is a theorist—as dogmatic in his eloquence as the best and worst of the species—had a theory of the origin of these winter northers. It was that they have their beginning in the ice-bound cañons of the high Sierras, whence they wander westward over the rain-drenched forests of Oregon and out to the sea, in search of sunlight and warmth and moisture and sympathy.

"But this isn't the Pacific," interposed the elocutionist, "what are the ice-devils doing here?"

"Home-sick and bound for Nevada," said the politician. At which the others laughed, and the elocutionist, sighing abstractedly, parted his moustache, and looked out of the window.

Beyond San Rafael, Ross Valley and the cañon of Papermill Creek unfolded one by one their countless sylvan charms. At Taylorville we saw the engine tank-house hung with a thousand icicles which glistened in a frosty sunlight imported from the Maine woods direct—per contract with the weather clerk. Pity 'tis that the railroad authorities might not own the belt of Marin County redwoods through which the road passes, for the vandals who sell cord-wood at less than half a dollar per cord profits are fast making the region a wilderness of charred stumps and blighted undergrowth. At Olema we kissed our finger-tips to the last lovely dimple of the fern-flecked cañon, as the panting engine emerged from the fringe of forest into the broadening landscape of Tomales Bay.

Comparatively few San Franciscans have ever seen Tomales Bay. Until the advent of the railroad, less than five years ago, it was as little known as Sahara. For years, however, Italian, Portuguese, and Greek fishermen, and aboriginal clam-diggers, have camped beside its quiet shores, and the blending of the four races has resulted in a dusky progeny, which stares at the passing train with big black eyes, and forms the best possible contrast to the cold, gray shore line, treeless for the most part, and desolate as darkness at the first glance. The western shore at the southern end—the head of the bay—is clad with a sparse growth of pines. A long series of ravines breaks more than half the western shore into lovely coves, in which are pretty looking farm-houses—the homes of a few of the many dairy ranchers on the great Shafter Ranch, which runs north and west, beyond the highest discernible hilltops, to Point Reyes and the Pacific.

The trains run at less than a snail's gallop around the continuous zigzag curves of the bay, and we stood for almost an hour on the rear platform of the last car, looking over the quiet sheet to the rounded hills on the opposite shore, which showed at once the reddish brown of the soil, the vivid green of the young grass, and the dull gray of the withered brakes and faded weeds. The water of the bay had several distinct tints, and all were beautiful. Close inshore, the choppy ripples broke upon the brown rocks and yellow pebbles, taking on the exact hue of the shore formation on which they fell. A little further out, the broad leaves and slimy trunks of the vast kelp gardens which line the shore gave their dull green hue to the waves which flowed serenely above them. The centre of the bay was the color counterpart of the cloudless arch of blue sky above it, and the broad pathway of the afternoon sun was reflected across the full breadth of the bay, except where the southern shoulders of the opposite bluffs threw their parti-colored shadows upon the miniature bays, and gave the contrasted quiet of perfect tone to the flawless color poem. Glossy cormorants and spangled coots—all the wild fowl of the place and season—with the Bohemian vagrants from a dozen duck farms, paddled about within easy gunshot. The ex-candidate was in despair because he hadn't brought his gun.

From the poetry of Tomales Bay to the prose of Tomales town is only a step. There is little of beauty in the village or its surroundings. It is the market town of an immense dairy region, and the Tomales butter is "about as good as they make."

Beyond Tomales is the longest tunnel of the road—so nearly a mile in length that pretty brides prefer the N. P. C. trip to any other within the State.

The seats in the narrow-gauge coaches are so arranged that half the length of each car has double seats on one side and single ones on the other; for the other half of the length this arrangement is reversed.

We four monopolized three double seats near the front of the rear car. The monopoly was not at all "grinding," however, as the car held less than a dozen passengers after the train left San Rafael. Of these passengers there was one rather pretty girl, with big eyes and a soft, placid, bread-and-butter look about her rosy mouth. Early in the afternoon the politician turned the pulverizing batteries of his gallant glances in this shy maiden's direction, and, under the full fire of his beauty the result was scarcely to be doubted. But the maiden was coy—more coy than eloquence at a Workingman's meeting in the Tenth Ward. However, the politician was not easily discouraged, and meditated a conversational flank movement, which would doubtless have been irresistible had not Providence interfered in shape of the young girl's foster-father. Subsequently it transpired that the f. f. was a quarter millionaire, with a morbid belief in the loveliness of his adopted daughter, and a corresponding disbelief in the harmlessness of handsome young men. He had caught one of the politician's killing glances on the fly, misinterpreted the harmless gallantry, and removed the big-eyed damsel to a "ride backward" seat at the opposite end of the car.

From Freestone, about fourteen miles beyond Tomales, all the way to Duncan's on the north side of the Russian River, the road winds through a region which thirty years ago was unbroken forest. Near Freestone the first private saw-mill operated in California was erected by an old Baltimore seacaptain named Smith, previously to the discovery of gold. Near Freestone, also, Joshua Hendy, Samuel Duncan, Lieutenant Stoneman (now Railroad Commissioner), Thomas Smith, and others, built the mill which supplied the lumber of which was built the town of Sonoma. The best part of this forest has been wasted in riotous lumbering, which has blurred the fair canvas of nature as a thousand generations of savagery could scarcely have done. Yet the region is still a marvelous one, in which the botanist and the artist of landscape glimpses may find nature at its best and brightest, and meet more responsive treatment than in the wilder wilderness of the more northern forests; for, scattered amidst the Sonoma County redwoods are pretty homes and productive dairy farms, where one can bave the freshest of mountain butter, the most piquant of mountain fruit, and the most toothsome of mountain chickens—at starvation prices. All these things said the politician of his native heath as the train rattled down grade from Howard's, along the lovely river, through the curved tunnel, across the big bridge, halting at the little terminal station just as the first stars were struggling for recognition with the cloudless twilight.

There was a misunderstanding at the politician's home concerning our arrival, and no one was there to meet us. Neither was there a team to be had in town for love or lucre. But there was a local entertainment at the village hall, to which we all "repaired," where were a stuttering master of ceremonies, and an ambitious glee club, and half a dozen Frisco wags. One of the latter arose at the instigation of the ex-candidate, and accused the politician of writing a Christmas carol in a queer weekly. At which the politician rose and made a long speech in his own defense, to which some one replied, and some one else added a word, and the chorus chipped in, and the eloquence fairly ran riot. After the entertainment it began to freeze, and nobody dared go to bed, so the remnant of night-time was spent in John Orr's bar-room, where the journalist and the elocutionist sat piously before a roaring fire in a big backwoods fireplace, musing upon the season, and the ex-candidate and the politician sang carols until daylight.

At daylight—before sunrise—we climbed into the most curtailed mud-wagon known to our historical reading. It was computed by the elocutionist that the politician required eleven pulls at the "cough mixture" bottle to keep him alive in the eight-mile ride through the frost-bitten valley. When we came within sight of the ranch, we left the stage and struggled up a steep hillside with our traps; and before long were met by "Steve and his mules," who—and which, and the wagon—bore our burdens "unto Mecca." Three delightful days we lingered at the ranch, looking out upon the Pacific and the long curves of coast line terminating with Point Reyes, eating turkey, and fruit-cake, and mince-pies, and "sich," listening to the mirthful music of a pretty woman, the bright talk of her gracious sister and the wisdom of their mother, gathering ferns and mosses and sprays of frost-bleached pine, telling tame stories and playing inexpensive draw-poker in "the men's room," making artistic analyses of the sunset colors, wishing we might linger forever and a day, and "go out," at last, "with the tide." But all things—except Pinafore music—have an end, and Sunday afternoon we were driven to Duncan's Mills, where we were fêted in princely style by the lord of the manor, his hospitable wife, and his accomplished daughters. Monday we came home—and that is all.

"Honesty coupled to beauty is to have boney sauce to sugar."—Shakespeare.

"SOWN IN CORRUPTION."

One Sunday, old Grabb went to church. Now, this assertion sounds simple and commonplace, but nevertheless is really a big fact; because, not for a quarter of a century, as time is reckoned here on earth, had the celestial recorder been burdened with the duty of jotting down this deed to the credit of John Grabb; because, 'twas a day not calculated to bring up themes for religious meditation—we think—for our ease-loving hearts are more apt to lift starward when warm, bright days drop into each damp, sinful nature, and the newly-heated, expanding flower looks up to the light. We can't associate a nipping cold breeze with the winds that ruffle the lilies in Eden-fields; or, a cloud-veiled sky with the eternal blaze that floods the golden dome. We huddle up close within our individuality, and hear the dreary tunes that hum discordantly over our wretched little world. Yet old Grabb went to church notwithstanding; but there was only one period when he failed to be inconsistent, and that was when the time came to show his avarice—then the exhibition was perfect. John Grabb was every inch a sinner—orthodox standard measurement. The plaster roses on the ceiling above the chandelier had seen him christened after the "Divine," and so far as he was concerned their fragrance was wasted, for, the acquaintance not being kept up, they soon forgot each other. The bells had called dismally that raw day, but whether the hollow cadence touched an answering chord in John's songless soul, or in the brazen clang an audible voice chanted of prayerless mornings, sheaveless eves, or treasure laid not up in heaven, only a Poe could tell. He entered very quietly and passed slowly but steadily down the aisle, so slowly that the people stared curiously, for whenever Grabb went out he acted under the impression that a dollar awaited his arrival at the journey's end; then he moved as do the storm-clouds. But now he came and slipped into his place the embodiment of a prodigious transformation.

"We shall all be changed," appropriately spoke the minister, but the roses knew him, despite the long separation and the paleness of his face, which gave forth no sign of thoughts within. He looked so meek, so unconscious of the strangeness of his position, that we found ourselves half-overlooking the host of contemptible acts which his grasping disposition devised; for John Grabb was "of the earth, earthy"—a mighty mean man—and no amount of charity can brush that stain from his "image." "But we shall all be changed"—then perhaps our natures will be improved, or maybe somewhere down deep in immortality we—John and I—will find in each other hidden "gems of purest ray," yet unseen, yet unknown. The few violets which he held seemed to know that old Grabb hated flowers, and to sbrink closer together as if they expected no sympathy from the hand that bound their broken stems. Little weak, sinless blooms! We know you will "be raised in power" when the grave "is swallowed up in victory." And the wind clamoring around the cornice outside moaned an accompaniment to the Apostle's Corinthian message. So on in perfect time with happy birth-bells roll over the drum-beats of death; and the silver nail-heads on the coffin shone sharply in the frosty air as old John Grabb, carrying the chilled violets, went from the cold church on that dismal day to be "sown in corruption;" there, until this natural shall have put on the spiritual, he and they lie festering. Thus went John Grabb to dust, leaving no void, no record of generous deeds, no tears. More insignificant than the little flowers that perished with him, be passed to the tomb—a valueless trophy. "O grave, where was thy victory?" TOM GREGORY.

U. S. S. "INDEPENDENCE," M. I., January 10, 1880.

A Texas love story begins with separation and ends with union in death. Several years ago a young pair, who had been joined in wedlock, lived unbappily, and finally parted company. The husband became a wandering rake, and remained a sorry dog until two years ago, when he obtained employment on a railroad near Arcola. He mended his ways, wrote to his wife, and induced her to return to him. It was in August of this year that they resumed their domestic life. One day recently, the husband was taken seriously ill, and on the following night the wife manifested the same symptoms. They would take no medicine, although they were rapidly growing worse. One night she fell asleep and never awoke. Her sick husband went to her trunk, took out the few trinkets which she owned, placed them upon her person, lay down on the bed beside her, and, kissing the cold face, dropped into a gentle, peaceful sleep from which he never awoke.

Some sensation has been created in London by the officiating clergyman—the rector of St. Peter's, Kensington—having at the Millais wedding, instead of reading the last portion of the marriage service, substituted a new and improved version, in which it was explained, or rather stated, for no one could explain what was meant, that a husband should be as indulgent to a wife as heaven is to the church.

The Italie gives an account of Peter's Pence collections during the past year. According to this statement, France contributed 1,100,000 francs; America, 900,000 francs; Great Britain and Ireland, 750,000 francs; Austria-Hungary, 700,000 francs; Italy, 600,000 francs; Belgium, 300,000 francs; Germany, 150,000 francs; Holland, 60,000 francs, and Switzerland, 30,000 francs.

A friend traveling abroad wrote a postal card in London and committed it, without addressing it, to a post-office box. Upon the card he said: "I am engaged to dine, to-morrow with — at —." With this clue the carrier went the next day to the house where our friend was to dine, and obtained from him the address he had neglected to put upon the postal, which in due time he received. In this country that postal-card would have gone into the Dead-Letter Office.

An ambitious young lady was talking very loud and fast about her favorite authors, when a literary chap asked her if she liked Lamb. With a look of ineffable disgust, she answered that she cared very little about what she ate compared with knowledge.

EDUCATION.

What it Is and Is Not.

What is education? and what is that branch of it which is termed the higher education? Most people will answer that the ordinary education of the young, such as is supplied by our public schools, consists in teaching the elements of such subjects as experience has shown to be most useful in the practical business of life; that is to say, reading, writing, and arithmetic. The human being who has mastered these formulas is endowed with the capacity of acquiring information other than oral; he can also, if so minded, make others acquainted with his ideas without the necessity of uttering them by word of mouth; and the accomplishment of the third formula—arithmetic—will give him all the mechanical aid that is possible to be given to protect him against rogues and swindlers. But the mere fact of being able to spell, pronounce, and link together words in connected sentences will not necessarily give him the power to memorize, to reflect, to weigh, to appreciate understandingly what he reads; neither will the ability to use the pen fluently and gracefully endow him with the faculty of composition; nor will the power to add up glibly a column of figures necessarily prevent him from paying his grocer two prices for sugar, or from getting ruined in a stock "deal." What is commonly known as "education" will give a human being all the known mechanical aids that can be of service to him in his progress through life, and in his dealings with his fellows; but it can no more supply him with brains than thought can add a cubit to his stature. No amount of education can do this. In fact, the higher you go the worse it gets. We have known Fellows of Colleges who had the Trinomial Theorem, the Differential Calculus, and quantitative and qualitative analysis at their fingers' ends, who, in the material interests of life, could have been "bought and sold" by a bootblack. There are thousands of well-educated, intelligent men knocking about upon the surface of this planet, "sparring" for a living, their chances in life materially injured by the fact that they spent their early years in the aggregation of such knowledge as is not in demand in the communities where their lot is cast. The ability to construe Thucydides or Æschylus, or to appreciate Plato, is not a legal-tender for bread and butter in any country, except where the possessor of such useless scholarship can earn a paltry stipend by "passing it on to the next," or can so "tickle the ears of the groundlings" with it as to furnish a political leverage in lifting him to office. What is called the "higher education" deludes many simple people into the idea that it is the "open, sesame," the "golden key," which will unbar the door guarded by

Those twin jailers of the daring heart,
Low birth and iron fortune;

And so make efforts, and, perhaps, pinch themselves of comforts, to send their progeny to a university, where he probably learns as much lewdness as Latin, and as much gambling as Greek. The chances are that in the end they will succeed in making a poor scholar, and spoiling a good blacksmith. The world is too full of so-called "educated" men. It has come to be another name for a useless, shiftless, unpractical imbecile, whom the world at large pities, because in this abnormal being it recognizes a creature brought to this pass by no fault of its own, but of the social system whose want of progressiveness is continually throwing such white elephants upon its hands, and expecting it to provide for them. We dissent from the theory that this is "education" at all. It is most emphatically not education. True education does not consist in cramming the plastic brain of the young human animal with a farrago of facts, an olla-podrida of every possible branch of knowledge, a jumble of jargon, till an immense white forehead protrudes like an unripe squash over a poor, little, puny frame, apparently threatening it with imminent destruction if by any chance it should get shaken loose from its supporting stem. True education consists in training and exercising the mind—as wrestling, running, or leaping does the body—for the future reception of mental pabulum through life. It should not aim to make a man a walking encyclopædia, or a granary of facts; but it should aim to give him the ability to discern true knowledge when he sees it; to discriminate between fact and fancy; to be able to seize the salient points of a book, an oration, or a lecture, at once and without hesitation; to appropriate the wheat and to reject the chaff; and when he requires authorities on points of fact, to be able to put his finger on just the authority that is wanted, and to find the page at once without having ever glanced at the book before; to be able to discourse intelligently on any subject; to entertain with equal ease a Congressman or a coal-heaver; to be, in fine, "all things to all men." If to this he can add the ability to swing a pick-axe or a sabre, to shovel sand, work on a threshing machine, swim, dive, run, tell lies with a serene countenance, and kiss a pretty girl without insulting her, then we should say, and not till then, that he was a tolerably well educated man—that is, for California.

But how shall we arrive at this acme of culture? We answer that if the mind is well-trained in principles, as distinguished from facts, which are the fruit of principles, it will guide itself, and the body with it, to the attainment of the highest good compatible with human nature. The ancient Greeks knew this well, and our planet has never borne a race, nor, probably ever will again, comparable to them in beauty, vigor, and elasticity of body; clearness, acuteness, and depth of mind; nobility and elevation of soul. Yet their facts were few. They had no books to read; no authorities to consult; no ancient languages to study; no mountains of science, honeycombed in every conceivable direction, to pass over or get through. Yet they left us a language more graceful, euphonious, and elegantly and vigorously constructed than can be paralleled by any other tongue, ancient or modern. They left us writings in this language, splendid with the imagination of poets and philosophers, sailing with "the pride and ample pinion" of Pindar "through the azure deeps of air," sounding the depths of metaphysics with Plato and Aristotle, or building up a scheme of geometry with Euclid. They left us temples which for symmetry, and purity of design, stand alone upon our earth; they left us statues, vases, and marbles, singular and unapproachable in beauty. This did a little people whose territory would be lost in the three southern counties of California. They were first in war as well as peace, withstanding an empire greater in area and more populous than the United States. How did they do all these things? They did them because they had the true ideas of education, the true ideas of life. They taught principles and not facts. It is useless to say that our civilization is different; that our manners, customs, and habits of life have altered; that the necessities of modern times bind us with bonds and chains stronger than iron; that we cannot if we would. That kind of civilization can never be permanent which elevates mere matter at the expense of soul. This elevation of matter dragged down Assyria, Egypt, Greece itself, and Rome, among ancient nations; has degraded China and Hindostan more recently, and is now degrading the solid Aryan race. Nothing can stop it but a complete and thorough iconoclasm of our existing system of education—a radical revolution of ideas.

A correspondent of the Graphic relates the following, which, if not suggested by the story of the Sibylline Books, at least strongly suggests that story. One day about noon Jay Gould made his appearance at Commodore Garrison's office.

"See here," said Gould, "will you take $1,800,000 cash for your Missouri Pacific Railroad stock?"

"Well," replied the commodore, "I might have done so yesterday, but to-day I ask $500,000 more than that for it."

"You do, do you? Well, good day, Mr. Garrison." Gould turned to walk out, when the commodore said: "Look here, Gould, it is $2,300,000 I ask for that stock to-day, to-morrow it will be $2,800,000, the next day it will be $3,300,000, and every day it will increase in price just $500,000."

"All right, Garrison; good day," replied Gould, and out of the office he went.

Sure enough, the next day Gould came again to the commodore's office and asked him what he would take for the stock.

"Two million eight hundred thousand dollars, cash, Mr. Gould; it has gone up $500,000 since yesterday," replied Garrison.

Gould went out. The next day Gould came again. The price was then $3,300,000. The next day in came Gould again. From his manner, the commodore thought he meant business. However, the commodore kept quiet. Gould asked: "How much for that stock to-day?" Garrison replied: "Three million eight hundred thousand dollars, cash, Mr. Gould." "I will take it, Garrison; it is a sale. Here is my check for the money. Give me a bill and receipt; pass over the whole business; it's mine," replied Gould.

The commodore looked at Gould, and the two millionaires stared at each other for a moment, when Garrison said: "I don't want your check, Mr. Gould; I want gold, cash." "All right; come over to the sub-treasury." So Gould and Garrison started. At the sub-treasury Gould paid Garrison $3,800,000 cash, in gold certificates, and the sale was completed. This is the true history of this great sale, which is considered the largest cash sale to any one man ever consummated.

The naked human body (says a writer in the Contemporary Review) which the Greeks had trained, studied, and idolized, did not exist in the fifteenth century. In its stead there was only the undressed body, ill-developed, untrained, pinched, and distorted by the garments only just cast off; cramped and bent by sedentary occupations, livid with the plague-spots of the Middle Ages, scarred by the whip-marks of asceticism. This striped body, unseen and unfit to be seen, unaccustomed to the air and to the eyes of others, shivered and cowered for cold and for shame. The Giot-tosques ignored its very existence, conceiving humanity as a bodiless creature, with face and hands to express the emotion, and just enough mal-formed legs and feet to be either standing or moving. Further, beneath the garments there was nothing. The realists of the fifteenth century tore off the clothes and drew the ugly thing beneath, and brought corpses from the lazar-houses, and stole them from the galleys, in order to see how bone fitted into bone, and muscle was stretched over muscle. They learned to perfection the anatomy of the human frame, but they could not learn its beauty. They became even reconciled to the ugliness they were accustomed to see, and, with their minds full of antique examples, Verrocchio, Donatello, Pollaiuolo, and Ghirlandajo, the greatest anatomists of the fifteenth century, imitated their coarse and ill-made living models when they imagined that they were imitating antique marbles.

At the end of 1860, though the municipal district of Berlin had been considerably extended, it did not contain much more than five hundred thousand inhabitants. During the sixteen years that followed, however, its population was almost doubled. This has not been the case with any town of the same size except New York. Since 1877 the population of Berlin has been over one million, and it is now the largest city in Europe after London and Paris.

The Sultan of Zanzibar has "experienced a change of heart," and missionaries can now forward their Bibles and flannel shirts to the heathen in equatorial Africa without fear that he will confiscate the boxes of the Gileads. And yet the conviction must force itself upon the Caucasian brother that the "man and the brother" in Africa is happiest without either Bible or flannel shirt, for he will neither learn from the one nor wear the other, as his time is chiefly taken up in knocking down coconuts or jumping through jungles in search of grasshoppers for his frugal meal.

To carve a turkey (which should always be laid with the breast uppermost) place the fork in the breast and take off the wings and legs without turning the turkey; then cut out the merry-thought, cut slices from the breast, take out the collar-bone, cut off the side pieces, cut the carcass in two, and divide the joints in the legs. The bird is then to be eaten and its bones given to the poor.

Princess Louise is having a clearing made in the woods of Rideau Hall, and a veritable blackwoods shanty constructed upon it. It will be finished by the time she returns to Canada.

LITERATURE.

Of Octavius Perinchief, which he describes as "the minute record of the inner life of a man who was gifted, cultivated, and sick," a reviewer says: "Sickness may be the primary cause of one-half of human activity." Certainly it is to the physical lassitude and resulting mental vacuity superinduced by the thawing-out process, to which the world is indebted for the spring crop of poetry. The spring poets are like rattlesnakes under flat rocks; the moment they feel the sun's heat affecting their torpor they begin to untangle and give off their affluents.

In The Mouth and the Teeth, Dr. White avers that "twenty million teeth, annually, are sacrificed in the United States." Some of them are found sticking in people's backs, we learn.

M. Flaubert's "philosophical romance" may be expected in the spring, along with the bluebirds and early asparagus.

On a sheet of Egyptian parchment Prof. Blass, of Kiel, is said to have discovered a fragment of a play of Euripides. If it is a fragment of a play we already have, the statement is unimportant; if not, we don't believe it.

The Wives of the Great is the title of a new work announced in London, written by Mr. Barry Compton.

Wives of great men all remind us
We can "shake" our wives in time,
And, departing, leave behind us
Tongues to publish all our crime.

To their Household Edition of Dickens's "Works" Chapman & Hall have now added Foster's "Life" of him. He certainly supplied some of the "materials."

Anticipating the discussion of the subject in the Chamber of Deputies, M. Alexandre Dumas is to the fore with a book on divorce. You can fancy how he treats the matter; though why a man who believes in the divine right (or rite) of wife-killing should want divorce is not easy to understand.

E. C. Stedman, "the poet-broker," is getting rich. He makes more in commissions than he loses on his poetry.

Dr. Holland is sick, but Scribner's doesn't show it. Clearly the assistant editor has not been apprised of his chief's inability to work.

Wallace Bruce has written up Yosemite in verse, and the book is illustrated by Smillie. It is reviewed by the eastern journals, but Mr. Bruce does not display the criticisms to his friends. Commendable modesty in Mr. Bruce.

A mousing critic has detected Montaigne stealing from the Koran, and Wilkie Collins stealing from George William Curtis. Montaigne was the sounder thief.

"Clemens," said Artemus Ward sadly to Mark Twain, "I have done too much trifling; I am going to write something that will live." "Well, what for instance?" "A lie."

The Isis Unveiled of the Theosophical Hierophantess, Madame Blavatsky, is having a good sale, the title sounds so naughty.

A hiatus in the autobiography of Gavarni, the caricaturist, was caused by his mistress, who, he explains, "profanely twisted two years of his life into curl-papers."

Mr. Isaac N. Arnold, a distant relative of the renowned Benedict of that ilk, is whitewashing the memory of that illustrious man—the foremost West Pointer in our military annals.

Dickens was something of a statesman, "as well." In May, 1863, he wrote: "A German friend, just come home from America, maintains that the conscription will succeed in the North, and that the war will be indefinitely prolonged. I say 'No,' and that however mad and villainous the North is, the war will finish by reason of its not supplying soldiers."

Ariosto "for children" is the latest outrage in the juvenile way, the outrager being a Mr. W. A. Hovey. We begin to respect Brother Owen, of San José, who preaches the pre-natal suppression of children; though no one else ever respected him, that we know of.

"Norse literature," says a reviewer, "has been added to by Prof. Rasmus B. Andersen's translation of the 'Younger Edda.'"

The Younger Edda quoth! Why,
That must be baby verse,
O'er which one sees the leering eye
Of Andersen, its nurse.

Literary people hunt in couples: the wife of M. Alphonse Daudet has published a volume of sensational tales.

An Involuntary Voyage, published by the Harpers, is by Lucien Biart. It is highly Verne-sque.

Twysford & Griffith's recently published Records of York Castle contain a curious story of Isabella Billington, who in 1649 was sentenced to death for crucifying her mother, an unfilial action imperfectly condoned by the after sacrifice of a cock and a calf as burnt offerings to the deceased.

The Emperor of Austria has conferred the gold medal for science and art on Mlle. Camilla Ruzicka Ostoic, for a new Turkish and German dictionary, which this learned young lady has recently published, with translations of the Turkish words into Roman characters. Ostoic had already distinguished herself in the Oriental languages at the Imperial Orient.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

Since my last writing there have been five more Patti concerts, with no very important change of programme, and—as far as the artists are concerned—nothing to change or modify the opinions expressed last week. Mr. Ketten, whose engagement I understand was at an end, and who—owing to differences with the management—did not care to renew it, has left the company and returns shortly to Paris. His performances of Friday, Saturday, and Sunday had the same popular success as the former ones. They included a number of compositions of Mendelssohn, Chopin, and Weber. Of these his rendering of Weber's Invitation was by far the most satisfactory; in the introduction there was a strong tendency to overdo, but the rondo was beautifully played—neatly, correctly, and with beautiful tone. Mme. Patti, who is recovering from the indisposition against which she struggled at the beginning of the season, is singing delightfully and renewing the triumphs to which she is accustomed.

I scarcely know whether to be more amazed at the mingling of ignorance and impertinence or amused at the stupidity of the soi-disant critics of some of our dailies, who—probably no two of them having ever heard Madame Patti before, or knowing anything about the matter if they did—have been assuring their public that her voice is "much impaired," is not "what it formerly was," etc., etc. The fact is—and it is clear to any one who knows the least about it—that Madame Patti has gained both in voice and warmth of style since last she was in this country; she has added volume and quality to her middle voice—naturally somewhat at the expense of the extreme upper register—and has improved in every direction, until her singing—as we hear her at present—is very near perfection. That she has not great warmth of tone is very true; it is a quality that such voices as hers never have. But it is a beautiful voice, handled with the consummate skill of a great artist; and to one who knows what good singing is, her perfect method must always be a source of delight.

Mr. De Munck has added but little that is new to the répertoire of his first nights; a romance of Saint-Saens and one by Vieuxtemps, besides a tarentella of Dunclecker and the Papillons of Popper have been the chief novelties. These he has played with the same exquisite tone and perfect execution that made their instantaneous impression on the night of his début. Of the entire company, it is Mr. De Munck who has become the prime favorite. Mr. Toedt has been good. He has given us songs of Rubenstein delightfully, as well as "In Native Worth," of Hayden, a charming song of Franz, and plenty of ballads. With his lovely voice and pure artistic style, Mr. Toedt has a great future before him, and in this benighted land may become a messiah of song-singing. Signor Ciampi has also strengthened the impression of his first singing and gained in popular favor at the same time; the songs of Faure he sings especially well.

It never rains but it pours. The nine Patti concerts of these two weeks may, after all, be regarded as only a gentle shower that precedes a perfect deluge of good things in store for public and critics, beginning on Monday night with the first appearance of an artist of world-wide reputation, and a first night of a new opera company in a new opera—new, at least, to this city, and seldom hitherto performed in this country. Of Wilhelmj I fancy there is nothing to be said, excepting only that he is here, and that he will be heard for the first time on Monday evening at the California Theatre. He is one of the greatest violinists in the world, with a reputation second only to that of Joachim, and yet I should not be much surprised if he does not make any very profound impression in San Francisco. We do not generally treat violinists very well in this city; indeed, it seems to me that the better the violinist the less we care for him. Wieniawski (who, I learn from a private letter, is dying in a hospital at Moscow) got the cold shoulder, excepting from a Sunday-night audience. Sauret, who at once on his return was ranked as one of the finest artists in Europe, awakened scarcely any interest here. Camilla Urso was all but snubbed on her return visit; even Remenji, bad as he is, was a losing speculation. That Wilhelmj comes at all, surprises me; I hope he will not regret it.

The opera will be Maillart's Dragons de Villars, sung at the Bush Street Theatre by the new company collected by Miss Emilie Melville, which, besides the fair entrepreneur, includes Miss Annis Montague, who has an excellent reputation as a soprano; Messrs. Turner and Vernon, tenors; Mr. Peakes, basso, and several other artists of repute. The Dragons is full of charming music, and will be a welcome change in the répertoire of English opera.

Mr. Henry Ketten—who had determined to leave at once for Paris—has been prevailed upon to remain long enough to give several piano-forte recitals—two at Sacramento during next week, and two in this city the week after—which will undoubtedly prove very interesting. Mr. Ketten has so many attractive qualities as a pianist that I shall be heartily glad to hear him in a programme in which he can follow his own fancy, playing classical as well as lighter compositions—above all in one of those improvisations in which he is said to be very remarkable. The Handel and Haydn Society is also preparing a concert of which Rossini's Stabat Mater is to form the pièce de résistance. If this could be arranged while Mme. Patti is still with us, with, perhaps, Mme. Zeiss-Dennis as contralto, and Mr. Toedt (whose first success in Boston was made in this work) as tenor, we should assuredly have something fine to look forward to, and probably a great success as well.

About the death of Charles Glover Pond, which occurred in this city on Saturday last, I find it very difficult to write; he himself—one of the most modest of men—would probably have wished that nothing should be said. We were boys together; he one of the most brilliantly talented youths I have ever known, one to whom nothing was difficult, nothing unattainable. What most men slave for cost him little more than the desire to do; technically as well as intellectually his mind seemed to come to him by intuition. He became a true and teacher.

GANYMEDE'S CUP.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 16, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—The first event on the social tapis this week was the INAUGURAL BALL

in honor of

HON. GEO. C. PERKINS,

Governor,

The Legislature and State Officers.

Free, to all who could muster up ten dollars. Doors open to every refugee from justice. One would think that a great, glorious, and prosperous State like California could afford to give an entertainment to its Representative and State Officers once in four years, and invite people worthy to meet on such an occasion. I was "respectfully invited," and paid my ten dollars regretfully, handed over five dollars to the C. P. R. R., another five to the hackman, and presented the same amount to a Sacramento hotel. I have not the time to do the last-named institution justice; it would take an entire letter for a prelude, even, to that miserere. But I struggled through the dirt, determined to be "o'er a'the ills o' life victorious," and reached the much-contended-for Assembly room, where our worthy Governor and his wife received each guest with a gracious word, a pressure of the hand, a bow or a smile, that made all happy. After admiring Mrs. Perkins's toilet of ivory-white satin, beautifully made, and elaborately trimmed with point appliqué, looped en panner with crimson flowers, I took a seat in the gallery that I might look down upon the assembled beauty, wit, and wisdom, and contemplated the satin shoulders, tantalizingly visible through the mist of eau de lys, powder, and rouge; necks over which a superabundance of false curls quivered nervously with endeavors to protect and in some way atone for the lack of other covering. I devoted myself some time to this alluring study, which I found easier and more edifying than dancing; occasionally a deep sigh attracted my attention, which I suppose was attributable to loss of breath, since there had been dancing for an hour or more.

Isn't it amusing to watch the different attitudes assumed by people who dance? So few gentlemen know how to make a lady appear graceful. They hug their fair partners like grizzly bears. Others hold them uncomfortably tumbling out of their arms, as though they were afraid of them. Others hop round their partners. Then there are men who kick, men who work the arms like a walking-beam, men who knock knees, men who jump, and men who stumble, all looking as solemn and stupid as an old owl at midday. I wonder that the dancing fraternity do not learn the gavot, the minuet, or some of those old artistic dances that have something to recommend them, and cease this rushing and tearing through rooms like decapitated hens. Possess your soul in patience, and I will tell you about some of our friends.

Mme. —, with the historic diamonds, wore a velvet gown. She looked very grand. From time to time, as she conversed with her friends, she brought waves of fresh air to her face with a large fan. Mrs. H. A. Weaver, one of Sacramento's most popular ladies, wore an écru satin, artistically and becomingly made. Mrs. Henry Scott was much admired, and no one more deservedly so, for she is affable and kind to all. Her toilet was elegant, and her diamonds, in gold crescents, very becoming. You remember pretty, graceful Mrs. Foye, who went over to Europe three years ago, with our thoroughly elegant Mrs. Burrage, and returned jabbering French like a native. Well, she displayed to the very best advantage one of Worth's wonderful compositions of blue satin and point lace. Mrs. Chas. McCreary, of Sacramento, wore another Parisian toilet, and received the attention that her winning manners are sure to secure to her. Mrs. Arnold did not dance, but was surrounded by a bevy of friends, old and new, vieing with each other in paying court to her charms. It was a pleasure to see Mrs. Asbel Upson in society again, for she was always a universal favorite.

Among the other pretty dresses, I observed Mrs. John Carroll's black velvet, embroidered in oriental beads; Mrs. James Carolan's black velvet, covered with some kind of most effective trimming, very becoming to her beautiful complexion; Mrs. Dr. Harvey, of Galt, was dreamy and spiritual, as usual; Mrs. Judge Caldwell was in cream-colored satin autumn leaves, one of the most admired toilets of the evening; Mrs. Rutherford was radiant in a maze of blue; Mrs. Irving, Mrs. Johnson, and bright, pretty Mrs. Birdsell were all beautifully dressed. Among the young ladies, Miss Jennie Lindley, Miss Jennie McKune, and Miss Phelps, of San Francisco, were the most admired—all young, modest and charming; "who could help but love them well?" Miss Cotter charmed all who met her; Miss Durden was her same natural self, sans all artificial adornment. I noticed particularly Miss Georgia Wyburn, Miss Sadie Dorrance of Stockton, Miss Ada Johnson of San Francisco, Mrs. Gallatin (very stylish), Mrs. Volney Spalding (dressed in her usual good taste), Miss Gee, the Misses Bonte, and Miss Jennie Dunphy. Some of these ladies' costumes were things to be seen in order to be appreciated; life is too short to describe such elaborate toilets.

Among the gentlemen there were young attachés, secretaries, expectant auditors, future statesmen—who appeared to be consumed by the flame of intellect—would-be orators, still beardless officers who have never seen and never want to experience a campaign, and an innumerable number of bald heads, shining like billiard-balls under the light of chandeliers, or concealed beneath wigs either too red or too black. And this is about all I know of the "Inaugural Ball." For further particulars see Tuesday's Call, that makes a mistake in saying the Misses Mathews are to marry "English noblemen." Mr. Stafford, who is to make Miss Clara happy, occupies a position relative to a militia officer in our little country, and Miss Daisey's fiancé no longer fights for his Queen, in uniform.

A quiet wedding took place on Thursday evening last in Oakland, the contracting parties being Mr. Walter Beck, son of D. L. Beck, of this city, and Miss N. Simpson, an accomplished young lady, well known in Oakland society. Cards are to be sent. Ada Ven appears to know all about our distinguished young English visitor. Does she speak as one whose information is authentic? I recall a line sung to the air of an old college song, "and things are not what they seem." Young ladies, beware. A bridge of sighs is not wanted in this "dry" city. The "silver wedding reception" given by Mr. and Mrs. Traylor last evening, at their new and elegant home on Broadway, was enjoyable. I have not time to tell you about it this morning. GANYMEDE.

Wants More Light.

EDITOR OF THE ARGONAUT:—That sweet savage, Ada Ven, declares it a social sin to make New Year's Day calls in an evening coat. Having committed this crime a few days ago, together with a multitude of other offenders, I am naturally indisposed tamely to endure this censure from a critic who never wore a coat of any kind—except a petticoat. I hold that she is altogether wrong, but it is not my purpose—"unaccustomed as I am to public speaking"—to argue it out with her; I leave the dangerous task to those better qualified. I'll wear whatever the ARGONAUT, after a calm and statesmanlike review of the whole controversy which I expect to ensue, may pronounce "the thing." Except in calling on Ada Ven—which, if I am not mistaken, I have the honor frequently to do—her prejudices shall be respected at any cost, and I will wish her a happy new year next time in a shooting-jacket, an overwhelming ulster, or a linen duster, as she may prefer. Just now I should like to ask her a few questions: What is the custom in Paris? What in London? New York? Jackass Gap? If the custom in these great centres of fashion is dead against us, must we have a new deal in our own? Shall we not permit ourselves the luxury of free will in matters of this kind, letting our habits of good society—including the steel-pen coat—be the independent outgrowth of our own preferences, tastes, and conditions—of indigenous and spontaneous origin—"racy of the soil"?

I am a Pre-native Son of the Supergolden West, imperfectly informed as to what is done east of the Sierra, and perhaps not adequately reverent of foreign precedent; but I am amenable to instruction. Only show me that I am different from the wise men of the East, and ought to be like them, and I shall take pleasure in conforming to the better standard, even to the length of paying my respects to Ada Ven with snow-shoes on my feet and my head in a grain sack. But the instruction must come from men. No woman shall decide for me the cut of the clothes in which I am to pay my devotions to other women. I won't have it.

A. B. C.

The theatres have done very little worthy of special mention during the past week. Benefits have held the reins at the Bush Street, and the various excellencies and deficiencies of the Folly Troupe have been re-repeated to average houses. Hermann and his over-advertised cannon act have been making much ado about very little at the Standard. As the great magician said, last Monday night: "The house is too small for the full effect of this great act." Monday night the "cannon was fired"—that is, the regular explosion took place, but the "human projectile" remained in the cannon until the smoke had cleared away. Then the spring consented to work, and pretty Miss Pixley was tossed out upon a blanket, suspended by a netting from the upper stage boxes, and was greeted with a good deal of applause and some politely suppressed merriment. The Colville Company at the "Bric-à-Brac Theatre," will give place next week to the Melville English Opera Company. The first performance will be Maillart's romantic opera, Friquet. At the California, Mr. Samuel Colville will introduce Wilhelmj to the San Francisco public on Monday evening. The "world's greatest violinist" will appear on Wednesday and Friday evenings also, and at the Saturday matinée. On Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday evenings the Folly Troupe will appear in burlesque, appearing, probably, in Oakland, on the "off" nights.

Clara Morris will begin her third California engagement at the Baldwin next Monday night. There has never been an actress on our boards who has received more spontaneous and unqualified approval, and she will doubtless draw full houses during her stay.

Our State Central Committee might have been engaged in better business than in the endeavor to defeat the son of the late Senator Morton for an appointment in California. Could honorable, non-office seeking Republicans be polled upon this question, nine out of ten would vote to give to the son of the great War Governor of Indiana any office for which he is competent. Drawing State lines in appointments to office against a son of Governor Morton is small business, and altogether unworthy of our Delegation in Congress and our State Central Committee, every mother's son of whom wants a place for himself.

The United States District Court at Philadelphia has decided that an article copyrighted in America does not protect it from reprint in this country after it has been authoritatively used in England. The case comes up on a printed edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, by J. M. Stodart, of Philadelphia. Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, are authorized to reprint this valuable work by the Edinburgh publishers, who are its owners.

The Emperor William of Germany says: "If we do not change the direction of our policy, if we do not think seriously of giving sound instruction to youth, if we do not give the first place to religion, if we only pretend to govern by expedients from day to day, our thrones will be overturned and society will become a prey to the most terrible events. We have no more time to lose, and it will be a great misfortune if all the governments do not come to an accord in this salutary work of repression." The New York Star adds: "This talk about repression shows how completely the two Emperors, misled by stern and arbitrary advisers, have failed to realize the true significance of these events. To remove the symptoms, they must attack the causes. To try to make all little boys good at the outset by giving them a religious education is well enough in its way; but to bestow a larger measure of political freedom upon grown-up citizens, who have been driven by repression into discontent, and from discontent into reckless rebellion, would be more to the immediate purpose." And there is wisdom in the language of each; but the senior authority lacks the compelling dogmatism of his American adviser.

There is but one remedy that cures all diseases of the blood, stomach, liver, kidneys, bowels, nerves, and urinary organs, and that is Hop Bitters. Ask your pastor or physician.

One peculiar characteristic of Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites is its power of decomposing the food in the stomach, rendering digestion and assimilation more perfect. This partly accounts for the rapidity with which patients take on flesh while using the article.

The best managed street railway company in San Francisco is the California Street cable line. It is doubtful if management or comfort could be more perfect. The route is so popular that ladies frequently walk from the hotels to California Street, and ride by this line to the hill, rather than by the nearer lines, which run with so much less smoothness and regularity.

The "LITALEFF EDITION" of classic and modern music is unrivaled for cheapness, correctness, and beauty. Holbrook & Lewis, agents, 23 Dupont Street.

Some of the new evening gowns have sleeves that are perceptible at a considerable distance, and the change from the very narrow strap worn last year is a blessing to nervous women who suffered tortures while seeing their friends dance in gowns that seemed likely to drop on the floor at any minute.

The sweetest and softest of current stories is that of the lady who cured her husband of losing handkerchiefs by embroidering his initial upon them with her own hair, thus making them so precious to him that he carefully guarded them and never lost another.

"Slippers come but once a year," is the thankful ejaculation of the popular clergyman.

A gentleman was about to pour the last thimbleful of wine into his glass, when his wife, who is superstitious, exclaimed: "Don't, darling, don't! If you drink the last drop of that wine, you'll be married again within a year, and I love you too well for that." And then she emptied the wine into her own glass and swallowed it eagerly.

The death is announced, at the age of eighty-seven, of Mr. Granville Vernon Harcourt, a former M. P. He was the son of Archbishop Harcourt, and an uncle of Sir William Vernon Harcourt, M. P. He was for fifty years Chancellor of the Diocese of York, and in the course of his duty pronounced judgment in the celebrated Voysey case.

Mr. Ramsey, the new Secretary of War, is described by a writer in the Times, of Chicago, as tall and very heavy, with gray hair and short side whiskers, large blue eyes, and broad, good-humored face. He has a bluff and kindly way of talking, and receives the callers at his new office as if he were glad to see them.

THE GAME OF DRAW.

Gambling is wicked. There are few things more reprehensible than to lose at gambling. One of those few things is to "squeal." A man who "squeals" is regarded among gamblers as the man who turns State's evidence is regarded among criminals. But it may be necessary to explain that "squealing" means to complain of your losses and demand their return. The law provides that money lost at gaming may be recovered by suit on proving the fact. Dick Wiechel, a well-known sport, entered suit against Joe Meyer and John Miller to recover about two hundred dollars, which he alleged they had jointly won from him at various times within the past six weeks. The suit was dismissed in one or two courts, but finally came up for trial before a jury in Squire Roberts's court. M. C. Baum appeared for Wiechel, and John Brownlee for Meyer and Miller. Wiechel was sworn and put on the stand, and began to explain to the court, jury, and counsel, not to speak of a curious audience, the mystery of the game of draw poker:

"Well, you see," said he, "the players sit around a table, and the man next to the dealer puts up his ante—"

"Hold on," exclaimed Mr. Brownlee. "If your Honor please, I don't understand—"

"Nor do I," said the Court warmly. "I can scarcely believe that even men sinful enough to play at cards for money would put their own female relations upon a table for sport."

The jury groans aloud.

"I don't mean that," said the witness. "When a man puts up his ante he puts up a certain amount of money as an earnest of play. Then the cards are dealt. Those who want to come in—"

"Oh, I see," said the Court, with a bland smile; "it resembles the old game of 'smitten,' where the young men are kept out of the room—"

"No," snapped the witness, "it ain't that. When a man 'comes in' he puts up twice the amount of the ante, and is entitled to a draw."

"It is something like a lottery, and this money purchases tickets?" suggested Mr. Brownlee, with a look of profound curiosity.

"No; a draw means that if you have 'come in' on a pair, you have a right to another deal of the cards. We were playing jack-pots, and there was a good-sized pot on the table."

"Who placed that pot on the table?" inquired Mr. Brownlee, sternly.

"Why, all of 'em," answered the witness.

"Who were all of 'em?" persisted the counsel, with a grim determination. The Court was leaning anxiously over the table.

"All that were playing," said the witness.

"Give the names of all playing," shouted the counsel, while the excitement in court went up to fever pitch. The Court was leaning on both elbows, with his spectacles on; the jury pricked up their ears; while one professional, who was getting a little incapable, adjusted his open hand to his ear.

"Must I give the names?" pleaded the witness.

"Yes!" thundered the counsel.

"Well, there was ———, and ———, and ———, and ———, besides Meyer and Miller and myself." The names having been ejected, the Court slid back into his chair, the jury sank back on their spinal points, counsel stopped to rest, and the audience sighed as if greatly refreshed. We would give the names, but they are in so many morocco-covered autograph albums and on so many tailors' bills that we think it unnecessary.

"You see in playing jack-pots you must bold as high as jacks to—"

"Ah, yes," said Mr. Brownlee, smiling to the Court, whose lips smiled back while the jury grinned responsively. "This game is a harmless one. This comparison of 'as high as jacks' doubtless refers to Jack the Giant Killer and the Bean Stalk."

"Jack and the ———!" cried the witness. Holding jacks means that you must hold cards as high in denomination as two jacks in order to open the pot."

"That is, take off the lid of the pot," explained Mr. Brownlee, patronizingly, to the Court.

"Take off a monkey's mother!" cried the witness, with profound contempt. "There's no pot on the table—the money up is called the pot, and the man who holds jacks can require the others to bet him or to drop out."

"Drop out of the window or out into the next room?" asked the counsel, blandly.

"Are you a givin' me taffy?" asked the witness.

"Taffy?" wonderingly.

"Yes, taffy, and don't you forget it—I don't take it on a stick."

Counsel argued with the Court that the plaintiff charged Meyer and Miller with having jointly won his money, and yet here were three or four other persons admitted to have been in the game. He demanded that Wiechel prove the particular dollars and cents lost at specified times. This could not be done, and, at defendants' demand, the jury gave a finding for the defendants.

Over by the Museum of Antiquities, not many years since, sojourned a lady of English birth and some beauty. She has a residence in the shady groves of the Evangelist, commonly called St. John's Wood, London, and she has a shady chateau with the high title of "Beauregard" in a more southern section of France, and though her name is Miss E. Howard she is called the "Countess E. H. de Beauregard." This lady was the first, fast, i. e., early and sterling friend of the late Emperor Napoleon. When Louis Napoleon contemplated the coup d'état, this lady pledged her fortune in his favor and for his success. In 1851 he was financially crooked, and this lady straightened him out by paying his protested bills at Montant's, the money-changer of the Palais Royal. On the 25th of March, 1853, Louis Napoleon, who never forgot a friend, remitted to Miss Howard, in London, his first obligation of 1,000,000 francs. The English receipt for this I remember to have seen a copy of, and it says: "Received of his Majesty Napoleon III. the sum of 1,000,000 francs, in full acquittance and discharge of all my rights and interests in the domain of Civita-Nova, on the frontier of Ancona." The signature, E. H. de B. Again, in 1854, Miss Howard receipts in the same way to M. Mocquard, the honest and simple-minded private secretary of the Emperor, for 50,000 francs, being the third of similar payments since the 1,000,000 mentioned, or since the 1st of June, 1853. Altogether, from March 25, 1853, to January, 1855, Miss Howard received the neat little sum of 5,449,000 francs from the Emperor of France. Was this the returned "loan" of a lady in England, known but little in France, and knowing less herself of the French, who desired to help the success of the coup d'état? In Rouen you hear many rumors, and strange to say, in New York at this moment, you could learn the entire story of this fast and first friend of Napoleon. From Gore House, Jermyn Street, London, to the now doomed Tuileries, in Paris, there is a mysterious number of chapters in the life of Louis Napoleon yet to be perused by the public. Perhaps this one, of the financial ventures of Miss Howard, would be as interesting as any modern story extant. The daughter of an English squire rejected the hand of Louis Napoleon on one occasion, and perhaps Miss Howard rejoiced thereat. But when the fair Eugénie accepted it, the "Countess de Beauregard" demanded millions of francs before the marriage bond was signed.

It was unexpectedly announced in a little German town that the Emperor was coming that way, and would stop a few minutes at the station. When the hour came the train stopped, and the Emperor was welcomed with all the customary demonstrations. The burgomaster suddenly remembered that he had seen a splendid bouquet in a vase upon the buffet of the waiting-room, and was inspired by a genial thought. He rushed to the buffet, seized hold of the bouquet, in spite of the eager protests of the head waiter, and presented it, with a neat and brief speech, to the beloved ruler of the German people. The whole episode was the work of a few seconds. When the train again started, the Emperor looked more closely at his gift, and while admiring the fresh flowers he came upon an ornamental card in the centre of his nosegay, on which was written the mysterious inscription: "Petzold sinem Chef" (Petzold to his Chief). The Kaiser knew that he, the receiver of the magnificent bouquet, was the chef, or chief, of the German Empire, and of all its citizens; but who in the world was "Petzold"? Was it the surname of the busy burgomaster? Had he so high a conception of the dignity of a mayor that he thought he might fitly omit his Christian name and official title when offering a gift to his fellow in public office, the Emperor? The solution came from the King of Saxony. The Emperor, says a Dresden paper, told the latter of the mysterious riddle which had puzzled him on his journey—"Who is Petzold?" The King made inquiries, and it turned out that Petzold was the surname of the head waiter of the station; that the day on which the Emperor stayed was the birthday of Petzold's employer; and that the bouquet was a birthday present which the head waiter proposed giving him.

It is only within the last twenty years that the true uses of fashion plates have become familiar to the American people. At the present day it is estimated that every American woman consumes an average quantity of five fashion plates and seventeen paper patterns per annum. The latter are as Greek to the unlearned man, and foolishness to the wisest of his sex. They are, in appearance, large sheets of thin brown paper, covered with scores of intricate and interlacing curves, and full of straight lines and angles intersecting one another in the most confusing and maddening way. But in these mysterious hieroglyphics lie hidden the secrets of skirts and the promise and potency of waists and talmas and gussets of the utmost magnificence. Women can read them with an ease that would put Champollion and his ablest disciples to the blush. She can translate them into silk and poplin and calico without making a single error of scissorial syntax, and without the slightest hesitation in that intricate system of punctuation in which "gathers" and "yokes" and "tucks" take the place of commas and periods. With the help of these patterns the Oshkosh woman clothes herself in a style materially different from that prevailing among the lilies of the field, but much more satisfactory to her personal wishes. Shallow philosophers have often wondered how it is that a new bonnet which breaks out in New York on a given day will be found in St. Louis three days later, and will speed over the whole country with a rapidity that leaves the best time made by a cholera epidemic far in the rear. It is the enormous circulation of paper patterns which works this seeming miracle, and to it alone is due the uniformity of dress which characterizes our twenty millions of women.

A good story is told about Farmer Treadwell, of Carson, and Sharon, in the Carson Appeal. The writer has never seen the story in print, but it is so good that it ought to have been, and may have been years ago for all he knows. Sharon once built a saw-mill on some Government land, and ran it three years on Government timber. This was in early times, and wood-sawyers were not always particular to secure a proper title. After sawing up all the wood in sight Sharon abandoned the mill, and immediately old Farmer Treadway, who had an eye on the property, entered the land in the regular way and came down on it like a thousand of brick with a United States patent. Presently Sharon began to move the machinery of the mill, when Treadway served him with a notice to keep his hands off. Sharon paid no attention to the old farmer, and the next thing he knew he was sued for $8,000. Treadway showed his documents all correct, and the jury awarded damages in full. After the suit Treadway walked up to Sharon and remarked: "Bill, you may be pretty good at minin', but you're a ——— shiftless land sharp. I ain't mucb on quartz ledges, but when it comes to realities I'm a terror. No hard feelin', Bill? No hard feelin', I hope?" The crowd roared, and Sharon good-naturedly set up the drinks.

Worth is favoring the introduction of purple, and has sent out some elegant costumes of that color with fur trimmings. Bonnets of light purple velvet or satin are recommended by the milliners to accompany black satin gowns. American women as a class can not wear this color at all, and if they be wise they will avoid it. Worth finds his own profit in sending out gowns that will be bought because they are his, but which will be thrown aside after a short time as unbecoming.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

The Billigoat.

Tell me, sweet goat, with eyes so fierce and red,
Before whose wrath strong men in terror flee,
And when they see thee lower thy awful head,
Make haste to mount a post or climb a tree,
Why does it fill thy soul with rapture sweet,
To butt a man or chase him through the street?

And tell me, gentle goat, if ask I may—

For 'tis an awful mystery to man—
Oh, how dost thou contrive to get away
With an old stove-pipe or an oyster-can?
And when thou swallowest whole an old hoop-skirt,
Does it not tangle up in thee and hurt?

O, goat, thou ever art alert for prey!

Turn but thy noble head and thou wilt see

A son of China walking o'er the way.

He would look lovely swarming up a tree.

Go, glorious goat, and with him have some fun,

And meanwhile I'll get off this fence and run.

Rejected his Suet.

A butcher loved a tender maid,
To woo her were his designs,
And he sent her copies of gushing verse,
In fact, real tenderloins.

The girl, alas! he could not gain,
She would love him as a brother,
But when implored to marry, said,
"Tripe, please, and find another."

He knew then that his hopes were vain,

But as he left her, said:

"Since you have caused me such distress

I'll haunch you when I'm dead."

He tried in drink to drown his cares,

And there found no relief,

But daily grew more woe-begone,

You never sausage grief.

At last his weary soul found rest,

His sorrows now are o'er;

No fickle maid now troubles him,

Pork reacher he's no more.

Backslid Again.

He bowed his head when the preacher bestowed

The benediction on all

Then walked from the hall to the vestibule,

As his mind did the sermon extol;

But a moment later his piety fled!

As he cursed the condemnable feller

Who'd left him a rag-covered skeleton

In place of his new umbrella!

Up, Boys, and At 'Em.

Outlooking from the pantry shelves,

Row after row, in trim platoons,

A silent wall of jelly jars

Awaits the dip of vandal spoons.

What man of us but, looking back,

From present duty often swerves,

To glory in the subtle raids

He made to lick the sweet preserves?

To a Slippery Sidewalk.

From praising you all men refrain;

None sing of you as fair, divine,

Although like smoothest porcelain

You shine.

What hosts of women, boys, and men

Along your surface lightly skip,

With smiles of peace and joy, and then

They slip.

The polish of your breast is bland

As smiles that o'er a maiden flit;

On you all men would rather stand

Than sit.

The halt and lame you e'er appall,

For you they hardly thank the fates;

Upon your breast the happy small

Boys skates.

Only a Can.

Only a can, an oyster can,

Emptied of fruit by the grocery-man—

Battered and rusty beside the street,

To be kicked and stamped by the passers' feet.

Only a dog, a mongrel cur,

With a head that looked like a chestnut burr,

Asleep between the hitching stones,

With dreams of "valleys of dry bones."

Only a boy with wrapping twine,

With a face that showed a deep design;

And when that deep design was done,

The can and mongrel cur were one.

Hard Lines.

Limping along on Christmas morn

A tramp his thoughts expressed:

"Oh, if I were a turkey now,

I might be better dressed,

"And once in all my sad career

Be sagely stuffed; alas!

These people never give me sauce

Who freely give me 'sass.'"

Silence.

Over the breath of the snow,

Silence is stretched in deep;

The winds are faint and low;

Still are the Heavens deep.

On the beach the billows hush,

Dreaming of shores of spice;

And the small-boy makes but a muffled splash

And he falls through a hole in the ice.

I'm called "Little bucket-shop,"

"D— little bucket-shop,"

Though I could never tell why;

But still I'm called "bucket-shop,"

"Crooked old bucket-shop,"

"Dad blamed old bucket-shop," I

LADIES

All know how unsatisfactory Foreign Black Silks are in both cutting and wearing shiny. We give you a reliable test below that will give you a perfect guide in selecting silk material for actual wear.

JOHN D. CUTTER & CO.'S

RAVEN BLACK AMERICAN SILKS are now being retailed by the following established firms:

Doane & Menshelwood, San Francisco.

M. W. Henderson, Portland, Oregon.

O. A. Hale & Co., San Jose.

H. C. Taft & Co., Oakland.

THE TEST.

Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulteration, and will either cut or wear shiny.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

Wonder if the times are hard? Every body says so. Never a day, nor half a day, passes that some great, stalwart, broad-chested, able-bodied fellow does not come to the ARGONAUT office wanting work, wanting money, wanting charity, wanting something, and tells us a heart-rending and piteous tale of unavailing efforts to secure work. If we have had one we have had a hundred applications for our "influence" to secure a position in the Street Department, on the wharves under the new administration, on the police, anywhere. Some have wives and children—we think they get wives and children on purpose to make a more effective argument, a more unanswerable appeal. We demand: What right has a poor devil to have a wife, and then go into the manufacturing of children in order to arouse our sympathies for their deplorable condition? We do not feel like saying to anybody: "What in the devil did you get a wife for unless you had an assurance that you could support her? What right had you to get children unless you knew where the bread was coming from to feed them?" This seems cruel and inhuman, but there is sense in it, after all. We do not like to see women suffer and children starve; but we do not think any the better of a man that will go forth to increase and multiply at our expense. Children are not necessities, they are luxuries; matrimony is not indispensable; and we resent the pretense that every poor, impecunious loafer should indulge himself in the superfluity of a wife and babies at our cost. It would be a brazen beggar who should walk in and say: "I demand alms to support a horse and carriage. My horses have not had a feed of oats for a week, and there is not a pound of hay in the barn; and I have not driven in the park for a month." We should say to him: "Go to the devil! Sell your horses, and go on foot." You can not say to a man, "Divorce your wife and drown your children"—that would be brutal and cruel. But after all, we ask, what excuse has a day-laborer to marry a Biddy, and, while getting a house full of babies, demand of us money to maintain them? We did not ask him to marry; we do not want any more children; we are not in haste to populate the country. This class multiply like rabbits, and we believe the clergy encourage them to do so. It makes more Catholics, more Democrats; but as we think there are Catholics and Democrats enough in all conscience, we protest against the whole business. The more especially do we protest against this up-coming generation of pauper-begotten and pauper-reared class because it won't work—it won't carry the hod any more, it won't wash any more. It votes and plays the piano; it demands office; it agitates; it strikes; it forms ward clubs; it drinks whisky; it hangs around corner groceries; it manages primaries and ward elections; and its increasing numbers, increasing idleness, and political profligacy menace the stability of republican government, the permanence of free institutions, and the existence of society. Perhaps we have no right to complain that these people will be Democrats, and will agitate, and will get married, and will get children; but we have a right to protest against their right to beg of us, and harrow up our sensibilities by tales of want and suffering, starvation and poverty, that we have done nothing to bring about. This condition of things is the more annoying when they demand that their children shall be educated at our expense in music, drawing, mathematics, and languages, to the end that they may be more worthless, more incompetent, more upraised above their condition than their very objectionable parents.

Nor do we see any good reason for immigration societies. We can understand why speculators in city lots and owners of unimproved lands might desire to see a large wave of people infloing upon this coast; we can understand why it is for the interest of the Central Pacific Railroad, and for the gas company, and the Morning Call to bring from Europe its starving millions, to ride in their cars, consume their products, and contribute small advertisements; but we ask, What is the necessity for any more people of this kind? If farmers with money would come from England, Ireland, or Germany, it might do; but to invite the immigration of a pauper class to come and occupy our free lands, which in a short time will be demanded by the natural descendants of our fifty millions of people, seems altogether absurd. We do not need any more paupers, nor politicians, nor traders, nor idle, unproductive people. We do not want any more idlers in our cities, nor tramps upon our country roads. Our prisons and asylums are filling up too rapidly, and nearly all our criminals and paupers are the result of an unnatural and unhealthy foreign immigration. Yet we are forming immigration societies, sending out documents and pamphlets, inviting Scandinavians, Dutch, Germans, and Irish to come and eat us up, to come and overrun us at the polls, to make laws for us. We never heard of any other people doing this thing. France endeavored to colonize in Algeria and elsewhere; the Dutch have sent colonies abroad; the English relieve themselves of their own redundant population by inducing them to emigrate to Canada or Australia; but it is alone left to the United States of America to invite criminals, paupers, idlers, and unskilled laborers from all over the world, to come to our country; and when they come here we are guilty of the unparalleled folly of making them citizens. We have experienced the doubtful benefits of the famine immigration from Ireland following the year 1830, and now we are endeavoring to repeat ourselves, just as though the time would never come when our lands would be exhausted and overrun, and just as though America need never herself fear famine. This business is being overdone, and the time is not far distant when we will reap a harvest of tares from the foul foreign seed that we are now sowing broadcast over the land. It is this excessive and abnormal immigration that is causing hard times; and it is from this foreign class that all—we say all—of our political disturbances arise. It is by this class, and this class alone, that the safety of our republican government is menaced. If we could arrest foreign immigration for one generation—thirty years—at the end of that period we should have solved all of the social and political problems that are now agitating us. We should put off to the distant future any possibility of agrarianism, and all danger of class conflicts. That these dangers do now threaten us no thinking man dares deny. It is our misfortune, and the fault of our republican form of government, that our public men not only dare not attempt to legislate in this direction, but, as a rule, dare not even give utterance to a sentiment that is universal, and expression to a fear that is entertained by every rational and reflecting mind. The man who would go to Congress or to a State Legislature, who is ambitious to fill an office, does not even whisper the suggestion that we have enough and too many foreigners among us, because it at once arouses against him this class prejudice, and every impudent and ignorant naturalized citizen at once marks him for political vengeance. The press, so boastfully independent and so garrulous of its fearless and manly attitude, is upon this question an arrant coward. To this foreign tyranny it is an abject and cowering slave. It dares not give utterance, it never has given utterance, and it never will give utterance to one bold, manly, American sentiment. There is not a leading daily commercial journal in America that has the boldness to utter opinions at variance with the sentiment of any alien class. The Catholic, Irish, German, and Jewish interests are so great that no newspaper has the courage to express opinions at variance with theirs. The press in San Francisco is simply pitiable in its abject and cowardly servility. Noticeably prominent in this direction are the Examiner and the Call—the one for political, the other for financial considerations. The Chronicle and Call have illustrated the depth of degradation that may be attained in rivalry for the support of the meanest and vilest class of foreign vagabonds. These two journals have depreciated the property values of San Francisco to the extent of millions by their encouragement of the sand-lot mutiny, and all for the mercenary desire of increased circulation and advertising patronage.

And now, while we are on the subject of newspapers, let us consider the proposition involved in Senate Bill No. 1, introduced by Mr. Johnson, of Sacramento, entitled, "An act to compel the retraction of false and defamatory articles in newspapers." It provides that upon the publication of any false or defamatory statement, the person offended may compel the retraction by a proceeding in the courts—before a jury, if demanded—inquiring into its truth or falsity. The burden of proof is upon the publisher, to maintain its truth. If the court finds against the journalist he must print his retraction and pay the costs and counsel fees of the injured party. It is a summary proceeding. An appeal may be had to the Supreme Court. The press of the State, by an almost unanimous voice, has placed itself in opposition to this bill. Some have treated it facetiously; some with that loud and blatant indignation that is characteristic of disreputable journalism; some have heaped personal abuse upon its author, assailing him and his motives with most vile calumnies. Only here and there throughout the State has any newspaper treated the question with dignity, or its author with respect. As for ourselves, while we see some things to criticize, we find but little to condemn in the proposed law. If a journalist maliciously publishes defamatory accusation against an individual, he ought to be compelled by law promptly to maintain its truth, or be compelled to retract it, and he ought to pay the costs and counsel fees necessarily expended in compelling him to do that which any gentleman would do willingly. If, as is quite possible, a defamatory article finds its way into a newspaper by mistake or accident, or the editor has been imposed upon by some designing person in his employ, he should have enough of self-respect, and enough of honest pride, and enough of manliness, justice, and generosity, to print the retraction when convinced that he has done a wrong. The first section of the act confines the process to "original" articles—i. e., articles originating in the journal, and not copied from some other. This is a proper restriction. We are not quite certain that the act might not be abused, and that supersensitive persons might not collude with unscrupulous attorneys to annoy newspapers. It might be well to demand of impecunious persons, those against whom a judgment for "costs and counsel fees" would be of no value, that they give bonds. It might be that actors and musical persons would deem just and severe criticism "false and defamatory," and that they would resort to legal process to advertise themselves to the public notice. It might perhaps limit the editorial writer in the use of those adjectives and strong superlatives of expression in which he sometimes delights; but this would improve the ordinary newspaper style, and it might bring dignity, decency, and modesty of expression where we now find vituperation and scandalous language. It seems to put a censor over the press, and subject it, as an institution, to the supervision of the courts. We are not altogether certain that the character of journalism would not improve under a healthy and intelligent censorship. We are of the opinion that the liberty of the press would not be seriously jeopardized; but it is possible that its licentiousness and license might be restrained. Section 10 of the law we would amend by withholding from the injured person any other than the remedy of retraction. If he sought that remedy he should be content with it, and not be allowed also to proceed by indictment and civil action. The person deeming himself defamed might use the "retraction" remedy as a feeler to prospect the strength of his enemy's position. It would not be at all proper that he should bring a criminal action, a civil action for personal damages, and also a process to compel a printed retraction. We commend this to Mr. Johnson, and suggest that section 10 be amended. There may be other amendments that a more careful reading would suggest; there may be objections to this law that have not presented themselves to our mind; but that the present most vicious and diabolical system of journalism should be allowed to continue is altogether inadmissible. The newspaper business is bad and rotten. As an institution it is mercenary and insolent. It is a reckless, audacious, malignant, and lying thing, that delights in intimidating the cowardly, threatening the weak, blackmailing the rich, and with abject humility bowing down to the strong. It assails private reputation, it attacks the virtue of women; and while there are journals of high and honorable character, the indulgence and delays of the present laws make dishonorable and indecent journalism possible. It gives to the exceptional blackguard who has type and ink the power to injure honest men, and before the long delays and the great expense attending proceedings in court enable the injured person to vindicate his character, the wrong and the injury may become irreparable. What the citizen demands, and has a right to demand, when falsely accused and unjustly defamed, is a prompt and speedily published vindication in the sheet that has wronged him. It stamps the lie promptly in the very mint of its coinage, and chokes the utterance back down the cowardly throat that uttered it. We think well of Senator Johnson's proposed law.

On Monday last a mechanic was at work gilding the tips and ornaments of the iron fence that encloses the very elegant residence of Mr. Dan Cook, on Nob Hill. "Shoddy!" exclaimed an individual on the dummy of the rail-car. The writer turned his face, and saw a man with a clean shirt, an intelligent face, a paste diamond on his breast, and a cheap but gaudy amethyst ring upon a hand that gave no evidence of toil. "An envious and shallow-pated fool!" said the writer to himself. Why should not Mr. Dan Cook give employment to gold-beaters, and gilders, and painters, to adorn and make beautiful his residence, if it pleases him? It affords labor to working men, and pleases those who think an iron fence with gilded ornaments more beautiful than the wooden and paintless abominations that enclose unoccupied and unsightly lots. There is something to be said in favor of men who build fine residences, drive fine equipages, and spend money liberally, that can not be urged in favor of usurers, misers, and money-sweaters who live only to accumulate, and toil only to hoard.

Olla-Podrida visited the Golden Gate Park on Saturday afternoon. It was a gorgeous day, and the Park was alive with all sorts of equipages—the tailor's apprentice, with hired nag from the livery stable; the grocer's family, with staid horse and strong wagon; solid old Paterfamilias, Mrs. Familias, and ever so many little Familiasses, stowed away in the family carryall; fast men, sending their spankers along at a flying pace, in defiance of the ten-mile-an-hour rule; aristocrats, in gorgeous turnouts, with servants in livery—all going it, gulping down great draughts of ozone, inflating their lungs with ocean air, enjoying the broad Pacific view, and bringing up at the Seal Rock House, where Foster dispenses cordials and other restoratives, a little wine for the stomach's sake, and a fragrant weed to tone down the nervous excitations that come from a scamper through the Park or a gallop by the sea. This is better than to mope at home, growing cross, growing fat, growing mean, as one grows old.

The Ohio idea in current politics is expressed by the formula: "To be brilliant is to be unorthodox." Secretary Sherman is not exactly brilliant—though he certainly is magnetic—and so it is perhaps requisite that he be orthodox. But Mr. Garfield is a man apart from the regnant scheme of Ohio statesmanship. He is at once brilliant and orthodox, and when it becomes necessary to merge the latter in the former quality, he can fortify his position with more logic, mixed with less sophistry, than can any other man in the President's happy family.

A Southern Congressman has recently said: "The South is rapidly beginning to appreciate 'the old flag and an appropriation,' to forget old memories, to sedulously seek the advancement of her material interests, and to regard one word of the present and future as worth a hundred pages of the past."

IN THE GOLDEN AGE.

The sad winds, the cold winds, are sighing,
Where, weary and panting for breath,
The old years, the dim years, are lying
With silence, and darkness, and death.

"With wild war, and red war, and weeping,
With carnage and trumpets we came;
And swift steeds, and dread steeds, went leaping
Mid slaughter, and famine, and flame."

So sing they, so moan they, as, roaring
Through tempest, and thunder, and night,
The great waves, the storm waves, come pouring
Earth's barriers of granite to smite.

Who hears them? Who fears them? They perished
Their glory and greatness have fled;
The mad hate, the hot hate, they cherished,
On poisons and sorrows was fed.

The keen swords, the sharp swords, hang idle;
The ramparts are grassy and still;
And rich loves, and pure loves, now bride
Man's stubborn, fierce longing to kill.

By hard toil, and strong toil, and striving,
Through dangers, and vengeance, and gloom,
The bright lands, the wide lands, are thriving,
And growing in gladness and bloom.

With sweet clang, and loud clang, the chiming
Of knowledge and peoples sweep by;
And vast thoughts, and high thoughts, are climbing
The shining blue splendors of sky.

Oh, weak hearts! oh, faint hearts! your shrinking,
Your mourning and slander must cease;
For long days, and clear days, are drinking
Bright vintage of wisdom and peace.

The grand earth, the fair earth, is pregnant
With promise, and purpose, and might,
And brave souls, and true souls, are regnant
By daring, and battle, and right.

MY FRIEND'S FRIEND.

An Incursion into the Unknowable.

CHAPTER I.

I was sitting in the Tivoli—not in ancient Tibur, nor by the rocks of Mount Catillo, but in the Eddy Street Tivoli of San Francisco, beside the pasteboard grotto in the northeast angle of the big hall. I was sitting in the Tivoli, listening with closely shut eyes to the ebb and flow of an orchestral fugue, when a woman's voice pierced the subtle meshes of the music and spoke my name. It was a strange voice, and as I turned quickly I saw that the face also was strange.

"I beg your pardon," I said.

"There is no need," replied the woman, who by this time had seated herself at the table in front of me, "I knew you from your photograph. You are Harry Kipp, are you not?"

"Yes, I am Harry Kipp, but where did you see my photograph—if it's a fair question?"

"In Mr. Hale's rooms, in New York. You remember Laurence Hale? He went to school with you in Oakland."

I did remember Laurence Hale; he had been my classmate, chum, and correspondent; he had gone to the dogs in New York, "they said," and I had lost trace of him for half a dozen years. But I tried not to express any especial surprise, and said: "Yes, I remember Laurence; is he well?"

"Well?" said the woman, passionately; and then she added, quietly, "He is dead."

"Dead—you don't say so!" I said; and I could have choked myself for the trite callousness the instant it was spoken.

"Yes, he is dead," and after a moment's pause, in which her eyes wandered toward the ceiling, she repeated with a smothered sigh—"Dead," and there passed over her face a shadow of infinite sadness, almost despair.

"Was it very recent? When?" I asked.

"Last September," she replied; and as she turned her face toward mine again, I noticed that the momentary gloom had vanished—only two tears lingered tremblingly on her long lashes.

"Pardon me," I asked, "but what caused his death?" She raised her eyes to mine with a quick, sharp look.

"It was—heart disease—I believe," she answered slowly, hesitatingly; not with the hesitation of embarrassment, but rather as one studies the effect of an announcement of which the speaker alone knows the true significance.

I looked at the woman from under my mask of anxious inquiry. Was she my dead friend's wife, his mistress, or merely a platonic friend? What was she doing in this place alone? Yet her language and her features were unmistakably those of a cultured lady; her dress was of some plain black stuff, and she wore delicate white ruching around her shapely throat and about her wrists.

It was the strange something in her eyes which mystified me. She had large hazel eyes, glorious in repose, with just a suggestion of how fascinating they might be if lighted at the torch of love. Yet they had once or twice flashed with a hard, steel-like glitter that repelled, yet magnetized, and left me wondering with a curious, uncomfortable feeling if there were not behind them a troubled, even distracted, mind, and a conscience ill at ease. Perhaps I looked what I thought, for she said, after a few moments of silence:

"I know you are thinking it strange that I am here alone, that I should speak to you as I have spoken, that I should have known Laurence so well, and more than all you are wondering what relation I bore to him; but—life is so full of changes—and I do love music; do you not?"

She asked the question with a slightly perplexed smile, such as women often unconsciously use to confuse our questioning, and lead us into other by-paths of converse.

"Listen to that strain," she continued, "is it not lovely? It sounds like one of Beethoven's sonatas. It has been well said that the passionate chords, the soothing notes, the dramatic intensity and kaleidoscopic changes of a sonata are not unlike many lives; but then all lives do not end in peaceful cadence as—"

A tall, pleasant-faced, light-haired man had touched her arm.

"Where have I seen this man before?" I thought.

She rose with a strange look in her eyes, the strangest I ever saw, and without introducing the intruder bade me good evening.

CHAPTER II.

A few evenings after, I went alone to see Diplomacy. It was the "Keene-Piercy Revival" at the Standard.

"Love her! I hate her!"

As I walked away from the theatre door the leopard-tones of the "Countess Zicka" were ringing—literally ringing—in my ears, and there was a cooling sense of freedom in the foggy outside air: freedom from the spell of those wonderful, wicked eyes, and that intense, vibrating voice.

"Love her! I hate her!"

Unconsciously I was repeating the sentence to myself. I turned from Bush into Stockton. A woman was standing under the gas-lamp. I almost brushed against her as I turned the corner.

Surprised at seeing a woman alone at such a place and time, I paused for a moment. To my astonishment she spoke my name, and said: "We meet curiously, do we not?"

I started at the sound of the voice; it was my strange acquaintance of the Tivoli.

"Yes," I replied, stupidly; and then recklessly: "May I not take you home?"

"Do you mean your home?" she said in a surprised tone, stepping to my side, "for," pathetically, "I haven't any of my own."

"I will take you to a hotel," I said, as coldly as possible, for I was thinking of my widowed landlady, and my widowed landlady's widowed daughter, and the widow who boarded with them, and the possible misconception of my good Samaritanism should I march up to the front steps only a few minutes before midnight with a lady on my arm.

Her reply was rather startling: "Can't you take me home, and go to a hotel yourself?"

"I will take her home," I thought, and I did.

I knocked at my landlady's door, with the assurance of a favored lodger, and said: "I have a lady in my charge who is too timid to go to a hotel. Won't you take care of her for me to-night, please?"

"What did you say her name was, Mr. Kipp?"

I was leaning awkwardly against the circular hallway baluster, just in front of my landlady's door. That expeditionary lady had robed herself in one of her charmingest, most spirituelle wrappers, and her slippered feet had passed her portal without my notice. My friend was sitting under a gas-jet directly in front of her. I stared stupidly from face to face. The lady came to my rescue. "I am Mrs. P-a-i-g-e—Page with an i, madam. I am a little timid, and when Mr. Kipp told me how very good you were, I felt as though it would be nicer here than at a hotel."

My landlady's breakfasts are always delightful. I may have all the cream I wish for my coffee, and never a smile the less from the opposite end of the table. In the morning following my midnight adventure our breakfast was especially nice. I debated with myself for half an hour whether I should go down stairs or "down town" for breakfast. Somehow I dreaded facing my landlady's candid eyes, and the sidelong glances of my landlady's daughter.

The pretty four-year-old baby of the household decided me. She climbed upon my shoulder from the perilous haluster-rail of the hall stairway, as I passed, and ordered me to carry her to the breakfast table. I obeyed, and—exceeding my instructions—remained for my cup of coffee. My friend of the midnight meeting was already at the table. She was talking animatedly to her hostess. I listened, and with cumulative attention. It was a subject in which my landlady was less specially interested than I—they were talking about the suffrage rights of women. My landlady's political creed was a variable formula, adaptable to the shifting conditions of the atmosphere, and the virtue, wickedness, and indifference of servants. She believed, in a general way, that the halloo is about as dangerous a missile as the bullet in the power of the vicious and the ignorant. And I took no little credit to myself for my apt tuition.

I had listened to a great many earnest women, to their private conversations and their public protests, but I had never before listened to one who made rant as picturesque and twaddle as poetic as did Mrs. Paige—not even my dear, good landlady could quite do that. There was nothing novel in my strange friend's theories, but everything novel in the way she treated them. I became strangely interested—so much so that my untouched muffin froze to death on the untouched plate, and the amber translucence of the fragrant Java at my elbow grew filmy with clotting cream.

To quote from the profoundest of modern observers: "Among all forms of mistake, prophecy is the most gratuitous." I had said to myself, even after I was seated at the breakfast table, "I will be discreet, I will avoid entanglements, I will see my strange friend no more than is strictly necessary." But the children, having said all the "cute" things they knew, had vanished from the scene; and my landlady's widowed daughter had, shaken the folds of her ravishing wrapper about her tiny feet, and had rustled heavenward to the nursery and her daily stint of pinafore making and billet-doux answering; and the landlady was looking just a trifle anxious and hored under her stereotyped smile—which it is scant justice to say was stereotyped—it was engraved in the highest style of the art; and the servant had cleared the table down to the edge of my frigid breakfast, before I noticed that it was nine o'clock.

A moment after there came a quick ring—one of those unmistakably impatient jingles—and just then I caught my strange friend's eyes. There was in them the startled, pathetic wonderment of a hunted hind. The next moment the door opened, and admitted the same man whom she had followed out of the Tivoli.

Without a word he walked into the little parlor, whose half-open folding doors offered a full view of the cosy dining-room where we were seated. He bowed to us, yet his eyes never moved from the white face of our guest, who, half risen from her chair, was watching, with blanched lips and dilated eyes, his every movement. The silence was momentary, yet of that overpowering, stifling character which seems to oppress one's very soul; that comes not oftener than once or twice within the experience of a lifetime.

Without averting his gaze he howed again and stepped lightly backward toward the door.

"Where have I known this man?" I thought.

My strange friend followed, step by step, as if some invisible power controlled her mind and dictated her every motion. Her hat and cloak were lying on a parlor chair. She put them on in silence. A moment later they passed down the steps, and in another instant the door of a waiting carriage closed behind them. As it drove down the street we caught a brief glimpse of her face. The light and vivacity had gone. What we saw was a tremulous, troubled picture, full of passionate longing and the infinite pathos of repressed tears.

CHAPTER III.

It was Carnival week, and I was sitting in the southwest gallery of the Mechanics' Pavilion, watching through an enormous pair of glasses the alternate tableaux in the Goethe and Schiller and Egyptian booths. Being the fortunate possessor of a seat, I was enjoying the selfish ecstasy of full possession. The curtain had just fallen for the third time on one of the most realistic scenes within the Egyptian canvas.

A lady at my elbow touched my arm with her fan: "Some friend of yours handed me this, and pointed to you as she passed. She is lost now, in the crowd moving toward the refreshment hoth."

I looked in the direction indicated, but the visible hacks in the motley stream of jostling humanity lacked individuality.

"This" was the following fragment of rhyme, penciled without signature on the torn margin of a Carnival programme:

"If the daughter of ancient Pharaoh
Could wake from her long, long sleep,
And into the booth Egyptian
For a moment pause and peep,
She would turn to her endless slumber,
And her dreams would be far more fair,
For the sight of the lovely princess
Who represents her there."

The handwriting was altogether strange. I wondered, fruitlessly, in a bewildered sort of way, who could have written it. For a moment I thought of returning it to my lady neighbor, but I enjoyed the luxury of possessing a little secret, even if it were a secret which I did not understand.

"It must be some friend of mine who is also a friend of the Egyptians," I thought; "at least she is a person of discrimination," for I was an enthusiast in the same direction.

It was very warm in the gallery that night, and the patriotic nostrils of the æsthetic Oaklanders quivered with mingled emotions amidst the jostling odors of Arah the occidental. I was neither a patrician nor an Oaklander—I was only a reporter; but even my educated sense rebelled, and, resigning my chair in favor of an adipose matron, I descended to the main floor. It lacked about an hour of closing time. The gorgeous drop-curtain of the Egyptian hoth had been drawn up after the last of the evening's tableaux. Pharaoh's daughter and her lovely handmaidens were clustered in graceful, unconscious groupings. A few of them were near the front of the stage, chatting and laughing with friends and acquaintances upon the crowded floor. I elbowed my way to the railing in front of the hoth, but the special Egyptian whom I sought was not present. I turned to thread my way back to the Italian hoth, in the west gallery, where I was sure I should find her. In the midst of the throng the diagonal convergence of two heavy-weights from Petaluma caused me to pause a moment in my meandering plunge.

"Do you approve of my verses?" The voice sounded close at my side. I turned. It was my mysterious acquaintance of the Tivoli, my strange midnight guest, the fair, fascinating autocrat of my landlady's breakfast table—"Mrs. Page, with an i."

The inscrutable light in her eyes, the peculiar smile that flitted about her mouth, thrilled me like a faint touch from a Leyden jar. As she laid her hand on my arm and said, "Let us walk about," I had no power to resist.

Walking about resembled some of those intricate games of skill which the old Hindoos elaborated into abstruse mathematical puzzles. At first there was neither opportunity nor need of speech on my part. We went where my companion listed—that is, we struggled toward various objective points, and reached them by labyrinthine paths. All around us were men and women outwardly very like ourselves. Women as fair as the one whose arm was linked with mine, men wearing countenances as imperturbable as I flattered myself mine was, were passing, jostling, elbowing us at every turn. I wondered vaguely if they were passing through an experience at all like mine. I began to ask myself why I was doing this—why I followed even the glance of an eye, when at heart I longed to be away from the heat, the dust, and the turmoil of the crowd. The effect I felt, and it startled me, but the cause I could not divine. Was it that, through the mesmerism of this woman's nervous organism, her mind communicated directly with mine, controlling my actions by an indefinable, but none the less certain, subjection of my mind to hers? I had never believed that such an abnormal state of the nervous system could exist, and yet I could not but believe that I was practically demonstrating the theory of Reichenbach's "od force," and was but a passive agent of some impalpable energy, allied to electricity, magnetism, or what not, which through the fairest of mediums was making me the variable shuttlecock of her fancy.

Suddenly she turned and said, swiftly, with an odd look in her eyes as she spoke: "Mr. Kipp, do you believe in the doctrine of Quesne?"

"I—I—don't know," I answered, confusedly; and then, "why do you ask?"

"Oh, I hardly know," she answered, with a slight laugh, that somehow jarred strangely; "but it does seem queer, doesn't it, that a universal fluid should be equally diffused through all animated life, and owe its force to that very physical being?"

"How so?" I asked, groping for a clue to the startling accuracy of her sudden insight.

"Why, don't you understand that then the stronger would always irresistibly control the weaker, and we poor women would then have no will of our own?"

"Passing strange," I thought, "if this woman, whom I have scarcely met before, can actually read my thoughts. Who is she, what is she, that can so unaccountably control my masculine volition through the sorcery of her glances—the magic of her intonations? Does she merely play a part, exulting in her power, that she should taunt me with the platitudes of Quesne? Is she quite sane?"

Like a gleam of lightning from out a murky sky, the

MATTERS PERUVIAN.

As Reported by a Lady of San Francisco.

LIMA, Peru, Nov. 10, 1879.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—In my last letter I wrote about the ladies chiefly. But of course I had a good deal to do with men. Negotiations with the gentlemen of Peru for any business purpose are exceedingly difficult. They are proud, and always tacitly assume that they can do just what they never intend to do. They evade a decision by saying, "Come tomorrow." A man often says that he has an estate of one million coffee-trees away up somewhere in the interior, when in reality he has nothing but the suit he wears and the cane he flourishes.

The Peruvian Government having committed the unparalleled folly of going to war not only with an enormous national debt, but with a bankrupt treasury, hundreds of families are now suffering in Lima, without any means of earning a living, or any possibility of leaving the country. The English Government provides for her subjects, and sends those who are in destitute circumstances back to England. The United States makes no such provision for her citizens. In the towns that have been bombarded, property has been destroyed, and families escaping with their lives have found, neither assistance, homes, nor protection anywhere. Men from the United States who hold government positions have not received a dollar of their salaries for months, having to keep their families on what they had laid up, and at the same time to keep up the semblance of wealth which is so essential in the eyes of the Peruvians. Some of these officials have for some months been pawning their watches and other articles of value. Every one holding property or doing business in Peru is heavily taxed for the war. Of the American residents in Peru, Mr. J. K. Backus, Superintendent of the Callao, Lima, and Oroya Railway, seems to hold the most secure position, and I can say of Mr. Backus what can not be said of all the Americans in Lima—that he is a gentleman. Mr. Backus lives in a palacio—a grand Spanish dwelling, with marble-tiled corridors and courts, and marble stairways, while spacious halls and drawing-rooms are furnished and embellished in princely style.

The Convent of San Francisco has a history, of which the following is an incident: The grounds of the convent now enclose a large space in the city, which, with an additional square, was obtained from Pizarro, who was then King of Peru. The monks asked him for some ground for their convent. He replied that they might have all that they could fence in during that night. In the morning the walls were found inclosing not only the open space that they had asked for, but including many of the houses and streets of the city. The citizens appealed to Pizarro for redress, but he said that he could not revoke his word. To satisfy them, however, he bought their houses and gardens, and gave them to the convent. No city in the world—not even Rome—contains so many or such large convents as Lima. One may walk for blocks in the city along the walls of convents. As one ends another begins.

It is a fact that these buildings abound in immense treasures. A history of the convents of Lima, and a description of the wealth they contain, would fill many volumes. The churches with their beautiful domes and fronts, with exquisite ornamental carvings, constitute the chief ornamental work of the city. The images that they display on fiête days, with their gorgeous robes and sparkling gems, the carvings, paintings, statues, and frescoes, baffle description.

The girls of Lima are generally educated in the convents. They excel in making artificial flowers and worsted work. A normal school was recently opened, for girls, by the Government, and is now prosperous. Women are allowed to take a degree for midwifery on completing a three years' course of study and passing the examinations.

Every day in the year is dedicated to some saint in the Roman Catholic calendar of Peru. On about three days out of every seven, the ringing of the bells announce some grand fiesta. At midnight rockets are fired from the dome of the cathedral where the saint is to be adored. In carnival time, instead of the streets being filled with a fun-loving populace, the houses are closed, the street-cars stop running, and the streets are deserted, except by those who go out for rude sports. For weeks before the Carnisima, baskets of eggshells are kept for sale all through the city, a small hole having been made in the end of each shell, and the inside drawn out. At the time of the carnival, men and boys think it high fun to carry their pockets full of these shells, which they have filled with water, and throw at every one that passes. Boys increase the mischief by squirting dirty water from syringes on the people in the streets. Women and children often conceal themselves in the balconies and engage in the sport. Sometimes they pour buckets of water upon the passers-by, thoroughly drenching them. The carnival lasts three days, and the churches open on Ash Wednesday.

The night before last Easter Sunday a destructive fire broke out in Lima, consuming the grand monumental arch which was erected by the Spaniards in 1752. The clock which was set in the arch cost 15,000 soles in silver. This was completely destroyed. Beneath the clock, in letters of gold, were the words, "Dios y la Patria" (God and the Country).

Pizarro, the Spanish conqueror, laid out the city of Lima, in 1535, and founded it in the name of the City of the Kings. At the same time he laid the first stone of the Grand Cathedral, which was to serve the double purpose of a church and of his own mausoleum. The original building was nearly destroyed by the earthquake of 1746. It was restored and has been completed at a cost of half a million dollars, making the most magnificent church in South America.

When we visited the tomb of Pizarro we were conducted by a sacristan, carrying a lighted candle. He led the way down into the gloomy vault, and, in the further corner, raised a dusty curtain, exposing, in an open niche, a skeleton, covered with an old cloak. "Francisco Pizarro!" he exclaimed, and snatched off a few fragments of the cloak, which he banded around as relics of the hero. The teeth, fingers, and some of the bones of the skeleton have also been carried away as relics, and it is said that different skeletons have performed the same office from time to time.

THE OPPOSING SEX.

An art note says Cabenal is painting Jephtha's daughter. That's because she's dead. A live girl paints herself.

Pretty girls are very thick in Morocco. The Moors don't consider a girl pretty until she weighs over two hundred.

The latest fashion is for young ladies to carry small daggers in their stockings, as a Texan carries pistols in his boot-legs.

A timid Rochester girl, who was robbed by a pickpocket on the street, took the purse away from him and kicked him clear around the corner.

Silver jewelry is now fashionable, and many a trade dollar will be melted to adorn some pretty girl's ears or throat. Ugly girls will not wear silver jewelry.

In most cities ladies have pet dogs, but Baltimore ladies seem to be specially fond of cats. It is estimated that there are over nine hundred pet grimalkins in Baltimore.

A young woman in West Baltimore, after suffering from severe pain in the region of the heart, coughed violently and released from her left lung an oyster pearl as big as a pea.

Olive Logan says, in one of her letters, that if it wasn't for her modesty, she would inform the public that she has engaged herself to translate Bret Harte's writings into French for the Paris Figaro.

A woman at Ulysses, Neb., wrapped her baby in a sheet and left it in the warm ashes by the fireplace while she went to visit a neighbor, and when she returned the infant was burned to a crisp.

Coeducation of the sexes has its disadvantages at Ann Arbor. Lately a young lady there married a boy student several years younger than herself, and who had been placed in her care to bring up in the way he should go.

A lady who has had her period of celebrity in Paris—Mme. Louise Lucène—has just attained her hundredth year. Under the First Empire her salon was as brilliant as that of Mme. Récamier, whose intimate friend and rival in beauty she was.

When Mme. Emile de Girardin wrote her Lady Sartefte, some one said to her: "What imagination you must have had to have found the résumé of all the vices that you incarnate in your sad heroine." "My imagination had nothing to do with it," replied quietly Mme. de Girardin. "I simply summed up all my best and most intimate lady friends."

The Queen of England is now the greatest Mohammedan sovereign in the world, in respect of baying more Mohammedan subjects than any other power. These are found chiefly in India, over which the Queen rules. There are not so many Mohammedans in Turkey as there are in the East Indian dominions of her Majesty.

The Crown Prince and Princess of Germany, with their three daughters, are staying at Pegli, on the Gulf of Genoa. The Princess, who is an excellent artist, finds plenty of subjects for her pencil in the immediate neighborhood, and a plethora of ragged and hungry but picturesque beggars adds to the artistic attractions of the place.

Poor Christine! Apparently royal women of Spain have a copyright secured to that adjective. Poor Carlotta! Poor Mercedes! And now this rude interruption of a honeymoon by attempted assassination. One wonders, when the Spanish bullet sang a solo past her frightened ear, if she did not for an instant wish herself out of feverish Spain, with its dastardly pastry cooks.

Some of the most enthusiastic flirtations of this century are between women themselves. Not a few of the sex are gay, witty, sparkling, and even sometimes profound in their conversations with each other, and nobody frowns or rebukes them; but if they should chance to be as charming to gentlemen, public criticism might seek for the springs of the woman's gayety in a far less noble aspiration than that which actually moves her.

A ballet girl, writing to London Truth, says that she is aware that actresses never get beyond the outskirts of fashionable society, and that if they are invited to parties and balls it is only that they may be stared at and make a reputation for eccentricity for their hostesses. But she adds that actresses can from the stage see into theatre boxes when the audience can not, and that the ladies and their "spoons" frequently conduct themselves in a very remarkable manner.

The fans carried this season are so pretty that their owners do not need to practice Mr. Addison's fan drill to be attractive. Who could resist the beckoning of a fan made from the plumage of the dove's breast and flecked with the little sapphire feathers from the peacock's head? Who would not be the lucky fellow whose hair is treasured under the glass set in one of the sticks, back of the little mirror in which his lady's face is reflected in the pauses of the music at the opera?

Lady Rosebery is of imposing, almost imperial, presence, and her face, distinctly Eastern in type, shows good health, good sense, and good feeling. The earl and countess were married in 1878, and their daughter, only two months old, is none the less "Lady" Sybil Myra Carolina Primrose, and at the reception given to Mr. Gladstone was greatly petted and kissed, till a solemn footman announced that "Lady Sybil is wanted." This recalls an anecdote of the time when commissions in the British army were sold to women and children. "What noise is that?" some one asked. "Oh, it's just the major crying for his porridge."

Swinburne says: "The very crown and flower of all her father's daughters—I do not speak here of her human father, but her divine—the woman above all Shakespeare's women, 'Imogen.' As in Cleopatra we find the incarnate sex, the woman everlasting, so in 'Imogen' we find half glorified already the immortal god-head of womanhood. I would fain have some honey in my words at parting—with Shakespeare never, but forever with these notes on Shakespeare; and I am therefore something more fain to close my book upon the name of the woman best beloved in all the world of song and all the tide of time—upon the name of Shakespeare's 'Imogen.'" slumbering doubt flashed into formulated thought. Strange, was it not, that the thought brought with it a certain sense of relief? We had drifted, without concert of impulse, into the "Little Trianon." "Is she quite sane?" As if in answer to my thinking, she turned her face to mine, and our eyes met. In mine she doubtless read mingled perplexity and relief. In hers I saw frank honesty and pleading winemess. Almost as plainly as words, they said: "Do you really believe it?" and the momentary suspicion, and its selfish solace, vanished like one of the swift changes of a dream.

But the strangest part of the experience was yet to come. She was the first to speak:

"I can tell by your eyes, Mr. Kipp, that you are not a psychologist. I believe I am. I can not explain just why I think so—I hardly know whether I rightly understand or interpret the word—but I know," with bitter emphasis, "that some organisms—that is the word, is it not?—are so sensitive that their minds—or souls, if you will—are controlled, overmastered, owned almost, by other and stronger organisms. I know—Oh, Mr. Kipp, let us go out: I am almost suffocating."

The change in her voice was so startling that instinctively I followed the direction of her eyes. She was looking toward the "Castle of Holyrood"—the Walter Scott booth—which was almost directly opposite. The red curtains of the booth were drawn back, leaving the stage in full view. Upon the lowest step of the platform stood a tall, light-haired, pleasant-featured man, gazing with the calm scrutiny of studied carelessness upon the passing throng. It was Mrs. Paige's mysterious guardian. She half rose from her chair. I touched her arm, and by a supreme effort of will compelled her to resume her seat. An overmastering conviction was slowly gathering substance and semblance and form, as I gazed across the shifting breadth of human eddies to the calm, careless, magnetic face of the stranger in the "Castle of Holyrood." "Where have I known him? Who is he? My God! I know she is insane, or I am. It is Laurence Hale!"

Again she bad half risen. This time I grasped her wrist, unmindful of the eyes around us, unmindful of everything except the one controlling impulse to learn all, then and there. Involuntarily, I spoke the last words aloud—"It is Laurence Hale!"

With a suppressed cry, she tore herself loose from my tight grasp, and stood before me with dilating eyes and quivering lips. Her voice was a whisper, but her tones had the thrilling distinctness of a full-toned bell at midnight, as she said:

"Oh, no, no, no, no, no!—it is his wraith!"

Yes, it was "suffocating." I put her trembling arm within my own, and together we stole like felons from the hall. A score of half-formed schemes made for the fair unfortunate a woof of protecting shelter, ere we gained the street. I had friends—rich, influential, chivalrous friends—who for my sake would place a barrier of perfect concealment between this woman and her persecutor. But who should I ask, and how? A carriage, with the door open and the steps down, was drawn up just ahead.

"This way, sir," said a voice at my elbow.

I thought I recognized the driver, and in another moment had placed my companion in the carriage. I was about to enter myself, when some one pulled me violently aside. Before I could free myself, a tall, light-haired, pleasant-faced man, wearing for the nonce the mocking smile of the tempter of Faust, sprang into the carriage and closed the door with a bang. The driver was already in his seat. The carriage was turned sharply eastward, and I heard the rumble of the wheels for an instant, and then that was merged in the rumble of a hundred other wheels—and that was all.

CHAPTER IV.

For a week after the Carnival I was in a state of continuous mental bubble. There was little or nothing to be done at the office, so I spent most of my days and nights prowling about the streets and visiting the hotels, hoping I might meet either the mysterious Mrs. Paige or her still more mysterious guardian, and determined to "have it out" with each or both. My training as a reporter made me anxious to probe the mystery surrounding these two persons, and discover at least the superficial relations between them. But the week wore itself out, and my quest had been altogether fruitless. I spent Sunday with some pleasant acquaintances at one of the hotels. One of these acquaintances was going East on the following morning, and I promised to be at the boat to say "God speed."

In the morning I went over the ferry with the rest of the good-bye party. I left the car with the others only just as the train was moving away.

At an open window, in the car behind the one I had just vacated, sat Mrs. Paige. Our eyes and our glances met simultaneously. I shall never forget the look she gave me. She was leaning slightly forward and held a handkerchief to her lips. As her eyes met mine, her face twinged with a suppressed spasm. She coughed slightly, and with a sudden gesture threw the tiny handkerchief out of the window. I caught it as it fell. But the face at the window was no longer visible. A wild scheme flashed into thought, and I caught at the guard-rail of the passing car. As I sprang forward, my foot struck some irregularity in the wharf. I hesitated for an instant, and the next moment the last car had passed.

Strangely enough, I had forgotten the handkerchief. I opened it and looked at the monogram. The letters, in scarlet silk, were the initials "V. P. L." and beneath them was a crimson stain, still fresh and unmistakable. I wonder—yes, I wonder.

RICHARD RULE.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 10, 1880.

A young lady at a ball was asked by a lover of serious poetry whether she had seen "Crabbe's Tales." "Why no," she answered, "I didn't know that crabs had tails." "I beg your pardon," he said, "I mean, have you read 'Crabbe's Tales'?" "And I assure you, sir, I did not know that red crabs, or any other kind, had tails."

When we see a pretty female foot we naturally conclude that it belongs to a pretty girl—on the principle that all is well that ends well.

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

GANYMEDE'S CUP OF COLD NECTAR.

"Lucent Sirops tinct with Cinnamon."

DEAR ARGONAUT:—After hearing Ada Ven say that "all our fashionable people" were attending the Patti concerts, Antony and I economized in the use of candy and cigars sufficiently to enable us to secure choice seats, but were disappointed, as we hit upon Patti's off night, and after paying our Saturday's bills, including club fees, etc., there was not money enough left to go in style. So I took in a seventy-five cent seat at the matinee, groped my way through the dark corridors, and finally stumbled into one of those blue instruments of torture invented by the builders of the Grand Opera House, and there I poised a full hour "in the dark," but not "alone" (having several hundred companions in misery), waiting for Signors Toedt and Ciampi to entrance us with their wonderful soul-stirring notes, Ketten to mystify, De Munk to amuse, and Patti to disappoint, for none of us were "young singers" in pursuit of "valuable hints." If this smacks of criticism, "pluck it out;" I have no aspirations. What I really want to say is a word about the discomforts of our matinees. Goethe-like, we want "more light;" we want the entertainment to begin somewhere near the time advertised; we want the Talking Fiend put to death upon the stage in the sight of all present, as a gentle warning to those with similar inclinations. We want a special police stationed within calling distance, to whom the Talking Fiend can be reported, and handed over to justice at once, that those who love music may be allowed to enjoy it in quiet.

More than one of Herold's delightful concerts have been marred by one or more of these petrous-hearted fiends. We now have a promise of a continuation of these concerts next month, and wish to enjoy them to the extent of our capacity; and if the execution of the fiend is not allowed, and no other way suggests itself, we shall "spot" him and publish his name. I will no longer have my soul harrowed and my angelic temper ruffled. Last Saturday's fiend was short in stature, blackly dressed, with moon-shaped face upon which sat a big nose, under which waggled a long tongue. She carried a little black bag. If she torments me again you shall have her name, or I'll pin this little anecdote on her black bag.

"What a nuisance!" exclaimed a gentleman at a concert, as a young fop in front of him kept talking in a loud voice to a lady at his side. "Did you refer to me, sir?" threateningly demanded the fop. "Oh no; I mean the musicians, who keep up such a noise with their instruments that I can not hear your conversation."

The silver wedding of Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Traylor was just the sort of affair Antony and I most enjoy; just what one might expect in the home of two such genial, mirth-loving people as mine host and his good wife. Rev. W. H. Scott, D. D., who first joined their hands in matrimony twenty-five years ago in the old Bassett House, repeated the ceremony, and a gentleman present made a few happy remarks appropriate to the occasion. Singing, dancing, story-telling, and jokes were indulged in ad libitum. A most inviting supper, which we managed to enjoy without a menu to guide, much to my comfort. A menu has such a smack of hotel and restaurant odor, is so suggestive of waiters' fees and visions of unpaid checks. I have heard C. W. S., and other slipper-gatherers, say they kept menus as souvenirs of happy hours.

Would it not be better to lavish the money on the programme of dances?—have them on satin, embellished with flowers, lace, what you please? It seems to me the association would be more pleasing, lasting, and agreeable than that of a menu which "no fellow can find out." I'm led to this conclusion by the fact that at one of our late entertainments there were present several French officers. The hostess looked among her guests for ladies who could speak French, and out of the three hundred assembled, not six could be found who understood the language sufficiently for even a ball-room chit-chat. But the menu was in French all the same, which neither hosts, guests, nor servants understood. But all appreciated the delicate little boulonnais which Mrs. Traylor presented to each gentleman.

The Bohemian Club was well represented by H. I. Tbornton, Paul Neumann, F. M. Somers, and many others. The hostess appeared in an elegant robe of black velvet; Mrs. Joseph Austin looked the invalid in her becoming white toilet, but none the less interesting. By her side was one of San Francisco's greatest beauties, Mrs. Joseph Marks; and gifted little Miss Lizzie Strong accepted the homage paid to her talents with the retiring modesty that indicates the true artist. She goes to Europe in the spring to devote a year or more to hard study. Miss Mary Van Reynegom was becomingly attired in grenadine, and never looked prettier. Mrs. David McClure, wife of one of our prominent lawyers, was much admired; so was lovely, bright Bessie Sedgwick, who was accompanied by her father and mother. Charming Mrs. Homer King was becomingly dressed, as usual. Mr. and Mrs. MacCrellish were accompanied by their niece, Miss Mamie Woodard, a pretty blonde, who charms all she meets with her pleasing natural manners. As I passed through the rooms I noticed Mr. and Mrs. Irving Scott, Mr. George Prescott, Mr. and Mrs. Vanderslice, with their daughter, Mrs. Johnson—whose dress of écru striped satin was greatly admired—Mr. and Mrs. Clay M. Greene, and Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Ladd. Some of Mrs. Traylor's most intimate friends disregarded the "no presents," and brought choice remembrances; the most artistic and noticeable was a set of china plates, painted and embellished by the donor, Mrs. Frank Unger, who was present in a white crape dress trimmed with violets.

Mrs. Dr. Sawyer's musicale last Monday evening was not unlike the play of Hamlet with the "melancholy prince" left out. For Miss Jennie was not able to sing, being troubled with that indescribable something that affects the throat and voice of all who attempt to sing in this climate. Mrs. Sawyer's sister, Madame Burton, gave us some very fine music. Miss Marsden and brother played duets, and later in the evening Ketten flashed in and electrified us all with his remarkable playing. Altogether the evening was a pleasant one, the invited guests numbering about forty, among whom were Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Fry, Miss Kate Bishop, Mrs. Grattan with her charming daughter, Miss Bessie, Mr. and Mrs. Michael Castle, Mr. and Mrs. Harold, and a sprinkling of French officers.

San Francisco "teas" are assuming the proportions of everything else on this coast, just a little larger and more "swell" than anything ever heard or read of before. Think of one hundred and fifty ladies smiling over that draught par excellence for talkers. Gautier says: "There is nothing which sooner shakes off the weight of humanity or predisposes one for that clearer vision of things invisible to the vulgar eye" than tea, green tea. But my experience is that at such entertainments the "conversation's rather flat." We want the men to brisk us up. But I was not at Mrs. C. G. Hooker's. Ada Ven was, and will doubtless tell you all about it.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 19, 1880.

The New Magazine.

Like a covetous bee coming out of a flower, its legs overloaded with golden pollen, the Californian for February has made its appearance. Even a hurried examination is sufficient to show that in the disposition and economy of its materials the editor has acted, with judicious foresight, on the truth that, while the first number of a periodical is bought from curiosity, the succeeding ones are increasingly dependent on their merit; for this second one is distinctly superior to the first, in variety, character, and literary grace. There is less of mere story-telling; typically it is of sounder and wider interest; the poems are fewer, their poetry better. The services of "the mob of gentlemen"—and ladies—"who write with ease" what is read with difficulty and discomfort—whose equipment is a loaded pen and a light mind; who, with regard to the laws of literary art, respect nothing because they know nothing—have in this number been more sparingly accepted; and in place of their free-handed outgivings are several papers validly conceived, abundantly enriched with learning and the fruits of learning, strong with the strength of restraint, and copiously embellished with the ornaments and graces of style.

One rather regrets the noticeable absence of the amateur, because it confers upon him a prominence which he will mistake for distinction and misrepresent as notoriety. Among the names in the table of contents, there is not one that we recognize as that of a person inexperienced in the art of writing. There are but two articles in the body of the magazine unsigned by the writers' real names, and in these the touch of the practiced pen is sufficiently obvious. Of the absolute merit of the book as a whole, as of the relative excellence of its parts as compared one with another, we do not choose to speak; but as matched with its predecessor the February number must be affirmed to have forged a clear length ahead. If the next shall mark as distinct an advance we do not know what is to become of the editor's modest but altogether uncalled-for explanation that he intended making, not a "literary" magazine, but a "popular" one. He is doubtless the best judge of the sense in which he preferred to use those terms, and of the difference he meant that they should imply. There may be another and better road to popular success than the literary one, but no monthly unillustrated periodical, we believe, has as yet discovered it.

Two stock-brokers, Messrs. Noble and Sherwood, have a "misunderstanding" which appears to turn upon a question of veracity. The Board has declined to decide between them, but Dick Wheeler, of the Alta, is less daunted by the difficulties of the situation, and declares without hesitation in favor of the disputant who brought the matter before the public through the newspapers. That is characteristic of Richard, certainly, and to that extent his decision is valuable and instructive. But we really do not think it will hurt Mr. Noble, and are convinced that it will not remove the presumption against the justice of that side of a private quarrel which seeks alliance of the public press.

It is very suspicious, this sudden attachment to Roland Reed displayed by the Bohemian Club. I don't believe it is appreciation of art so much as its accessories; and the accessories in the case of the Colville Company are unusually pretty. Reed is a very clever young comedian, a genial companion, and altogether a worthy object of Bohemian regard. But when those whole-souled Bohemians find themselves in the theatre night after night, thoroughly enjoying the fun of Robinson Crusoe or Piff-Paff (always very close to the stage), I never see them looking so much at Reed as at—well, somebody else. They are liberal with their comments—and they all love cats. Go to the owl, Bohemians! consider his glare and be wise, if you can!

The recent installation exercises of the Caledonian Club were altogether creditable to the management of that flourishing society. Many of the chieftains appeared in plaid and tartans, and the average of manly symmetry and vigor and wit was in ample evidence, both upon the dancing floor and around the banquet table.

SOCIAL SACRAMENTO.

DEAR EDITOR:—More punch! more pleasure! more wine! more women!—and all because a tall darkey rang our door-bell one bright morning, and, with an excruciating bow, handed us a little square piece of pasteboard bearing these magic words:

"MRS. JAMES I. FELTER requests your presence at the fiftieth birthday anniversary of her husband, Thursday evening, January 15, 1880, 619 Tenth Street, Sacramento, California. R. S. V. P."

Which opened the door for us to all this loveliness! If any one in the city has the knack of entertainment to perfection it is this same Mrs. Felter. She smiles so pleasantly, and welcomes you to all her beautiful home affords in such a charming manner, as to put you at once at your ease. And then there are five young editions (I suppose I am at liberty to say editionesses) who play the hospitable hostess fully as well as their lady mother. There is also one hopeful son, named Will, who does not find Sacramento sufficiently seducing to take up his permanent abode here, and so wanders to a colder clime, viz: San Francisco, but who does find his mother's parties, and the ladies who frequent them, sufficiently seducing to show his blonde head here when his mother gives one of her delightful soirées. The house was beautifully decorated with smilax and flowers and all those pretty green things that make you wonder of what they are made and what ingenious hands contrived them. The conservatory was a perfect bower of verdure, of choice plants, birds, and aquaria. The supper was delicious, and Peterson in his happiest mood. We ate in English (thank Heaven!), as follows:

Oyster Patties.	Raw Oysters.	Roast and Boned Turkey.
Wine and Champagne Jelly.
Eastern Ham.	Smoked Tongue.	Beloucr.
Chicken Salad.	Orange Ice.	Assorted Relishes.
Bavaria Cream.	Charlotte Russe.	Assorted Fancy Cakes.
Et c.	Et c.	Et c.

And after we had exhausted the "programme," we felt very much like the small boy at the orphans' Christmas tree, who, after having eaten all that was possible, besides filling his pockets and apron, cried because he could not hold any more! The most amusing event of the evening was the presentation to Mr. Felter of a silver medal, on one side of which was engraved "J. J. Felter, 50th Birthday, January 15, 1880, Sacramento, Cal." And on the reverse side, "New York, January 15, 1830." John Carroll made the presentation speech in the following manner: "Ladies and gentlemen—I am to present this young boy with this medal, and Judge Denson will make the speech." And the poor Judge, in spite of all his entreaties, was dragged into the room, and compelled to make it.

Mrs. Felter received us in an elegant combination dress of old gold silk and brown velvet, and diamonds. Miss Felter and Miss Clara Felter were charming in pink crepe; Miss Alice in blue, and Miss Belle in rose-colored silk; Mrs. Hamilton (née Felter) black silk court train, embroidered in chenille. From San Francisco we noticed Mrs. B. B. Redding, Mrs. H. T. Scott, Miss Hamilton, Mrs. Rutherford, Mrs. Spalding, Miss Wilkins, Miss Pearson, and Mrs. Grubenberg. Galt was represented by Mrs. Dr. Harvey, Elk Grove by Miss Laura Graham, and Stockton by Mrs. Reed, and several other ladies whose names we did not learn. As there were some three hundred invitations issued, of course it is impossible to give a complete list, and we will only say that we noticed Mrs. ex-Governor Irwin (beautiful, as she always appears), Mrs. Geo. Cadwalader, Mrs. Arnold, Mrs. John McNeill, Mrs. Wright, Mrs. John F. Sheean, Mrs. I. M. Hubbard, Mrs. Judge Denson, Mrs. Birdsall, Mrs. W. B. C. Brown, Mrs. G. W. Chesley, Mrs. Gallatin, Mrs. Foye, and Mrs. J. F. Glover. You will notice by the number of madames that this was a party given to the married people, but we understand the Misses Felter are to give a young people's party in about two weeks, and we are confident it will be quite as comme il faut as that of the older folks.

On Saturday evening we had the pleasure of attending one of Mrs. J. D. Carroll's happy dinner parties, given in honor of the San Francisco ladies whom we had already met at the Felter party.

BETSY AND I.

Reception to the Greek Bishop.

The greatest ecclesiastical establishment in the world is that of the Greek Church, counting sixty-five millions of members through the whole East. The Patriarchs of Constantinople, Antioch, Alexandria, Moscow, etc., each rule over hundreds of bishops and dioceses. The split with the Western church took place in the eighth century, and since then the Greek Church has had no affiliation with the Church of Rome. It has, however, intimate intercourse with the Church of England, and of course with the Episcopal Church in this country. Previously to the transfer of Alaska the Greek Church in Russia had sent out to that country a bishop to provide for the spiritual wants of their members on this coast. He was "Johannes, Bishop of Alaska," but made his headquarters in this city, whence he visited the different section of the country. Two years since he was recalled, and a few months ago the present incumbent was sent out. He seems to adopt no territorial title, but styles himself "Nestor, Bishop of the Russian Orthodox Church." He is a Russian nobleman, formerly in their navy, which he left to take orders, entering a monastery, from which he was taken to make him a bishop. When in full dress he wears a number of decorations and orders received from the Emperor of Russia.

He has lately returned from a visit to Alaska. There are, we understand, about two hundred and fifty members of his church in this city, and many more scattered through the country. Their chapel is in Greenwich Street, near Stockton. Last week the Right Rev. Bishop Kip held a reception at his house in honor of Bishop Nestor, to which all the Episcopal clergy of this city and Oakland were invited. About twenty-five were present. The reception was from three to five P. M. Besides the bishop's family, the clergy only were present. A couple of hours were spent in social intercourse, which gave Bishop Kip an opportunity of presenting the clergy individually to Bishop Nestor. Just before they separated the clergy collected in the library, where the doxology was chanted by them, and then, at the request of the Bishop of California, Bishop Nestor gave the apostolic benediction, in the form of the Greek Church. Thus ended a social gathering as enjoyable in itself as it was marked by its singularity in this country.

THE DECLINE OF HIS "BOOM."

Evidence on Evidence's Head Accumulates.

If there remains among our readers any sensible person whose mind is open to conviction as to the policy of Gen. Grant's third-term nomination, we beg of him to patiently continue reading, from week to week, such items as we gather from Eastern journals. We use the term "policy" advisedly, and we declare that it is our conviction that the leaders of the Republican party, the office-holders, the jobbers, the ring thieves—all of whom are now for Grant—will not dare to press his nomination before the next Republican Convention. When all the officials in esse and in posse, all the camp-followers, and all who are looking to the loot and plunder of the political battle-field, all the national bank and great corporation people, and all those timid souls who fear the people and demand strong government, shall be fully advised of the fact as it exists, viz.: that a majority of the unselfish, non-office-holding, intelligent, moral middle class of Republicans do not want him for President, and won't have him, and won't be frightened by the clamor of the "whoop-up," nor driven by the "boom," nor hoodwinked by entertainments given in his honor and fulsome speeches made in his praise, they will subside. We venture the prophecy that Gen. Grant will not be a candidate when the convention meets at Chicago, and that all the black-and-tan party pups that are now circling around him with their mellifluous yaws, will be barking in unison over some other man in the moon. All that these mangy and morally diseased party curs desire is the chance to steal in office. They want Grant—not because he is an honest man, not because he served his country, not because he is great and pure and modest and honest—but because they think the chance to steal is better under him than any other Republican.

Charles Nordhoff telegraphs from Washington to the New York Herald:

"The political significance of Senator Cameron's position as Chairman of the Central Republican Committee has been so persistently misunderstood that it is worth while to make the truth plain. Mr. Cameron is not a Grant man, but a Cameron man. The Pennsylvania delegation to Chicago, if Mr. Cameron can control it, will be a Cameron delegation, to be swung into line for that candidate, be he Blaine, Sherman, or the ex-President, who appears to have success on his side. What Mr. Cameron hopes for is that he shall hold a cabinet position under the next administration, and his relations with the three prominent candidates are such as to make him confident that either is nominated and elected his desire will be gratified. He is a personal friend of the ex-President, he is related by marriage and on very friendly terms with Secretary Sherman, and as he has taken care long ago to reconcile his differences with Mr. Blaine, he is on extremely cordial and intimate terms with that gentleman, and spent two or three weeks last summer in Mr. Blaine's house in Augusta. Mr. Cameron is a man of the world. It does not matter to him who is President if he can secure his own place. But it is easy to see that, having his own end in view, he will not make the mistake of committing himself unseasonably to any one candidate. Mr. Cameron would prefer a third-term nomination if he were satisfied it could win in November, but he has no notion of nominating a candidate who would be beaten. Whatever personal preferences he may have among the candidates, he will sink them rather than hazard the party's or his own success. His first object is the selection of such a ticket as will carry the country in November. If he should see that the renomination of the ex-President for a third term is likely to damage the party—that it would weaken it in some of the doubtful States, and that another candidate would be a stronger and safer man at the head of the ticket—Mr. Cameron would certainly cut adrift from the third-term movement and support the strongest candidate. He is in a good position to do so, for he is as sure of his place in the cabinet under Sherman or Blaine as under a third-term."

The Utica Herald is an influential Republican organ which does not worship Senator Conkling as the party idol. Its editor is ex-Congressman Roberts, and this is how he views the tokens concerning the Presidency:

"The signs are unmistakable that Gen. Grant can never receive another Presidential nomination at the hands of a Republican Convention without first encountering an organized and determined opposition which would be fatal to his cordial and united support by the masses of the party in 1880. Two classes of people are still clamorous for Grant. One class includes the traders in politics, who hope to see in his return to the White House a return of their day of harvest, so rudely interrupted; the other and larger class includes the army of moral cowards, the timid folk who are still oppressed by the nightmare of the civil war, and think that Grant is needed at Washington to repel some new imaginary attack upon the Capital, which only he can conquer. It will be a sad day for the United States when a combination of these two classes can boast that it has dictated the Government of the nation."

Says the Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial:

"The departure of Gen. Grant for the South, joined to Philadelphia developments, can have but one interpretation: He is a candidate for the Presidency—precisely as much so as John Sherman or James G. Blaine. The boomers throughout the country have been duly notified. The silence of Gen. Grant is no longer mystery. It simply gives consent. There are many sincerely friendly to Gen. Grant who regret this, believing that his glory must now fade, especially as it is evident that he is in the hands of the most cunning and unscrupulous of our politicians, and that his nomination would make the Republican party a mere personal concern. The Southern trip amounts to a public advertisement that Gen. Grant's longing for home scenes and friends, of which so much was said while he was abroad, was of singularly brief duration, and that a week of the repose—said to be so essential—at Galena was quite enough. The truth is, Gen. Grant goes South on an electioneering tour, and to be out of the way for a few months while the boom booms. After he satisfies his deep curiosity about Cuba and Mexico, he will return to find an organized series of booms from New Orleans to New York. It does not seem to have occurred to the managers of this expedition that the public interest may depart and the whole thing become ridiculous on their hands."

Mary Clemmer, the well-known correspondent, writes as follows:

"The claims of Ulysses Grant to be made a third-term President of the United States are preposterous and fictitious. The country has paid him, ten times over, for all that he ever was or did as a soldier. Had it not, his last civil administration would have annulled the last lingering fraction of a debt. Are the crowds adoring the 'great soldier' now? Not at all. They are running after the man who, for two years and seven months, has made a public spectacle of himself around the globe, for the glutting of his own vanity and for a political end. The world has had cause to grow weary at the sight of Sarah Bernhardt's name, at the tales of her reputed coffin and skeleton, of her fatherless children, of her fabulous dresses, her much-vaunted 'art'; but that is but a drop in the bucket compared with two years and seven months of solid Grant, 'to be continued' till relenting fortune lifts before the eyes of the people a new fetiche. So monstrous a greed for self-adulation—when has the world seen it before? It must have been in a prehistoric age. If he would subside in Galena long enough to give the human race a rest, and slight relief from the sight of his name, it might, at least, be grateful; but no, having squeezed Europe and Asia of their last 'ovation,' now Mexico and Cuba must be seized. They will do better than nothing till the moment of his triumphant reappearing after the meeting of the two National Conventions next June. No matter which one, if it will only subvert the Constitution and make Ulysses Grant for the third time President of the United States. At the beginning of the war he was indifferent in which army he fought, whether Union or Confederate; and now either party will be satisfactory if it will only make him President. Nothing could suggest with a keener odor the old Grant régime than the names of the men who sit down to dinner with him in Philadelphia to-day, the first day of the Grant 'ovation,'—viz.: Borie, Boutwell, Pierrepont, Cameron, Roberson, etc.—every man sure of Grant's reelection and of his own lost fleshpots. What is the matter with the people? Only this: the majority don't think. They feel. They live less in facts than in persons; less in principles than in pagents. They want not the man of truth, but the man who will please their fancy, fill their imaginations. The man who would serve their country best, who would place its Government on the surest basis, is not a 'magnetic' man, nor a fictitious man, nor 'the greatest soldier of the age'; therefore they will have naught of him. They must hug a hero—at least, in their minds; and as they live in an inglorious age when heroes are not, they seize a fetiche, and, wooden though it be, hug that."

The lies that are told concerning the certainty of Gen. Grant's nomination would make Ananias and Sapphira blush. Only the other day a correspondent of the Chronicle asserted the possibility of Blaine's taking the second position on the ticket with Grant. Blaine might take a hot stove, or a cold, or a sheep, but he will never play Vice-President to Gen. Grant. "Gatby," writing to a Cincinnati journal, says:

"His friends go so far as to resent as an impertinence the candidacy of others. A story was put out last week that Sherman had given in his adhesion to Gen. Grant. It was started with the view of impressing him that it was high time he was out of the way of the Chariot. Sherman promptly said he was a candidate; would stick to the last, and was on principle opposed to the third term. Another member of the Cabinet opposed to the third term is the Secretary of the Navy; and it is noticed that, while Gen. Grant called on Evarts (who is a boomer), he did not call upon Sherman or Thompson."

Gen. Grant was not received with uniform cordiality by the Southern people. Notwithstanding the fulsome reports of his progress, files of the Southern papers, which have since arrived, contain numerous protests against lionizing the whom they call their "former oppressor." The Macon (Ga.) Telegraph, for instance, says:

"During the passage of Gen. Grant through the South, while we would have him treated with all due courtesy and respect, it ill becomes our people to lionize their former oppressor. We are glad to record, therefore, that the General's progress through Dixie has by no means been like that of a conquering hero. Straws show how the wind blows, and the fact that the only point thought worthy of a special visit in Georgia or Carolina was Beaufort is not devoid of significance."

The Hartford Courant says:

"People might be advised to keep cool, and not to lose their heads over the notion that their only escape from Grant is to take Blaine, or that their only escape from Blaine is to take Grant; keep cool and look over the ground for themselves, and be ready to make their conclusions felt in the State Conventions that nominate delegates to the National Convention. It would not be a bad plan if each State should present in Convention a different name to choose from—one of its own citizens if it have a man strong enough and well-known. It is not seemly that we should all be scared in advance like a flock of sheep. We might as well be provided with a number of good candidates, for even the most prominent men are mortal, and Grant is about to trust himself on the Southern railroads, and Blaine may be disabled again on the very eve of the contest. Nobody is impervious to accident except Tilden; the Republicans have no such man."

The New York Star, speaking of the formidable anti-Grant organization in the State of New York, says it is a strong, concerted, and thoroughly organized movement, extending throughout the city and State, embracing the old Blaine-Bristow friends, numbering among its active workers leading men and influential journals. The anti-Conkling element will of course be the active movers. An anti-third-term Republican meeting will shortly be convened in the city of New York, and prominent Republican politicians will take part in it. The Star mentions the names of ex-Judge Dittenboefer, Col. George Bliss, ex-Assemblyman Andrew J. Campbell, William Haw, Jr., Henry C. Robinson, ex-Judge Fithian, Christopher Pullman, George W. Rose, ex-Admiral Cooper and Billings, ex-Mayor Vance, and other Republicans representing the different Assembly Districts in which they have influence with their party. A correspondent of the same journal says:

"I have talked with many Republican merchants, brokers, lawyers, and small business men in regard to this matter, and I find that they are almost unanimously opposed to the third-term scheme. They uniformly declare that they see a danger in it that threatens disaster to business interests, as well as to the material prosperity and integrity of the republican system of government. I have no doubt that as soon as the anti-Grant clubs, or whatever they may be called, are formed, you'll find thousands of such men—men who never before identified themselves with political organizations—uniting with them."

A telegram to the S. F. Call contains the following from Chicago. After summarizing the general drift of political probabilities, it says:

"By far the greater number of Republicans express a preference for Blaine, who is especially strong in Iowa, Minnesota, and Nebraska. The next strongest candidate is Sherman, who even in Iowa crowds Blaine pretty close, and in Wisconsin and in parts of Illinois. In Indiana and Ohio, and in a number of Western and Southern States, Sherman has a following that is silently working with much more effect than noise. A surprising number also express a preference for Hayes, despite his declaration that he would not be a candidate; these are understood to be all for Sherman for the second choice. Grant takes the third place in nearly every return. His strength seems to have been greatly over-rated by his friends and among the people at large, who have been misled by the honors paid him as a general and a distinguished traveler into believing the people were rising in a spontaneous demand that he be their President. In the West he seems to be destined to secure only a moderate support. Washburne has been named as a second choice for the Grant men, and undeniably has some elements of strength, but much less than his political adherents could wish."

Some New Yorker, who spent a recent season in San Francisco, has been doing some excellent gush in the New York papers anent the superiority of our lacteal advantages. He suggests that New York, being a big city, ought to have as pure milk as any other fellow. The writer admits that the immense consumption of milk in Gotham is a temptation to eke out an insufficient supply; but he contends that judicious legislative interference might compel conformity to a standard of excellence indicated by the lactometer. The New York editors reply in chorus: "It is a good scheme, but then legislators and water are both so cheap."

In New Orleans, just now, the dailies are in crying need of young men who can gush. The Crescent City is about to undergo an authors' carnival.

TWO TEAS.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 23, 1880.

MY DEAR HELEN:—You will doubtless remark that our social transitions are indeed sudden; the brilliant festivities of the evening seem almost entirely superseded by a species of entertainment injurious to neither health nor morals. I allude to "teas," which are now the order of the day. I have recently attended two, with a view to selecting such items as I thought would most interest you. Mrs. Louis Haggin was politic enough to have her "tea" on Saturday, thereby insuring the attendance of a number of young gentlemen. I met your old acquaintances, Mrs. T. B. Haggin, Mrs. Tevis, and Mrs. Carroll McAfee; also, Mrs. Moses and daughter, for the first time since their return from Europe, where they were so long absent. Mrs. William Howard has also returned from Europe, and was present. Miss Poett, Mrs. de Guigné and her sister Miss Parrott, though the latter may possess all the sweet attributes of the lovely flower whose name she bears, cannot pass unnoticed. Mrs. Lake was accompanied by Misses Helen and Annie, whose literary proclivities are so well known. Mr. and Mrs. May presented a singularly handsome appearance. General McDowell was accompanied by his daughter, a young lady who has hosts of friends, and possesses that rare gift, a beautiful and exquisitely cultivated voice. Mrs. and Miss Fall, the Misses Selby, and Mrs. Sillem complete my list of acquaintances among the ladies present. Mr. Marye, though he disclaims attending fashionable gatherings, was as usual one of the first gentlemen I saw. What an unconscionable swell he is! Mr. Balfour and Mr. John Parrott Jr. were also there. I almost forgot that perennial beau, Mr. Godeffroy, with whom time has dealt so leniently. I verily believe, from present indications, that he will, like the gods, "immortal and unchangeable remain."

Mrs. Hooker's "tea" followed on Tuesday with another brilliant assemblage. Mr. and Mrs. Hooker had their respective admirers, and I heard regrets expressed that the connubial happiness of the former should be so apparent. The light of day was excluded, and the gay strains of music rose above the hum of conversation and merry laughter. Who could help enjoying a cup of tea, or any other beverage, when received from the hands of such charming ladies as Mrs. Sillem, Miss Crockett, and Miss Van Clief? Among the guests during my stay were Mr. and Mrs. Fore, Col. and Mrs. Eyre, and Mr. and Mrs. Goad. This last named lady wore a superb costume of black embossed velvet and black satin trimmed with exquisite embroideries. I observed also Mrs. Crocker and daughter, Mrs. Barolihet and sister—fortunate in possessing the gifts which have distinguished Mrs. B.—and Mrs. and Miss Flood. Were I a young man, how gladly would I assume all those bonds of both church and state.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men
Which, taken at the Flood, leads on to fortune."

Mrs. and Miss Fall, accompanied by Miss Taylor (a brilliant brunette from the "Old Dominion"), were present. Many inquiries were made as to who she was and whence she came; Mrs. McMullin and two daughters, Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Sanderson, Mrs. Phelps, Mrs. Martin and Miss Matthews (niece of Mrs. Floyd) are the only names I can recall at this moment. The gentlemen present were ex-Senator Stewart, ex-Senator Sargent, Lieuts. Brown and Metcalf, Mr. Hopper, Mr. Sheldou, Mr. Balfour (he must have a penchant for "teas"—I have seen him at three), Mr. Field, nephew of Judge Field, and Mr. Carter Tevis and brother—as usual, the former was most assiduous to several of the ladies present. His devotion, however, can scarcely awaken hopes in the hearts of the most confiding, as he has ever displayed the instinct of the butterfly—boving around first one and then another of our loveliest flowers, and just as we expect him to alight he takes his flight and returns no more.

Rumor says that a well-known young lady has now the credit of having checked his roving fancies for a longer time than any of her predecessors. Hoping this mild refection will sustain you until I can furnish something more stimulating, I am yours affectionately, ADA VEN.

"My dear sir," said Mr. John Bright to Mr. John Welsh, "do you honestly believe that Protection protects?" "Pray don't talk so earnestly, Mr. Bright," replied the recent minister; "you might be beard in Ohio. Protection has certainly protected John Welsh, and our church has done manfully in the Bible and hymn-book line for the down-trodden in Timbuctoo—in whom you and yours are equally interested, you know, Mr. Bright. And then I never believed in Jingo Dizzy, you know."

Obscure Intimations.

REMINISCENCES, Berkeley.—We shall consider it in due season.

Dies irae, dies illa
Non solvet scriptum in favilla.

STATION B.—We shall have the pleasure of replying by mail.

BIBLIOPHILE.—How are we to know where these lines are to be found?

There was a sound of revelry by night,
And Belgium's capital had gathered then
Her beauty and her chivalry, and bright
The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men.

Perhaps they are in the "Burial of Moses." If not, some of the gentlemen who favored us with copies of that poem will probably supply us with the remaining stanzas of the one in which these lines occur. We don't think much of them, anyhow.

CXIII.—Sunday, January 25.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Pepper Pot.
Baked Rock Cod. Mashed Potatoes.
Beefsteak à la Française.
Green Peas. Parsnip Fritters.
Baked Pigeons.
Vegetable Salad. Mince Pie.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Oranges, and Bananas.

TO COOK BEEFSTEAK A LA FRANÇAISE.—Take a sirloin steak, pour over it two large spoonfuls best sweet oil, and let it remain overnight. Then, in the morning, pour the oil into a frying-pan with some finely chopped parsley; pepper it, and until the gravy dries up and the steak becomes rather brown. Then, take the pan over the steak as sauce. Garnish with slices of lemon. As butter is not known in the southern states of Europe, oil is used in lieu of it, and this Parisian practice of using oil is borrowed from countries.

THE REFORM OF CRIMINALS.

If there be any question upon which even presumed authorities on the matter are more at variance than upon any other, it is how to reform convicted criminals. At present, this subject is "agitating the public mind" for the hundredth time, and, to judge from the contrariety of opinions expressed, the question is as far from settlement as ever. It is no new information to be told that the management of San Quentin is not a success, either as reformatory of the inmates or to remove the burden of their support from the taxpayers. We refer to this subject in order to lay before our readers some of the conclusions reached by a royal commission, appointed not long ago to inquire into the working of the penal institutions of Great Britain. The report by that body states that the methods hitherto in vogue for reforming convicts have proved an absolute failure. That fact has long been patent to all readers of criminal statistics and trials. The former are more carefully prepared on the other side of the Atlantic than in this country; and, as a rule, an indictment against a prisoner records the number of his previous convictions, with mention of the crimes and sentences. It is this circumstance which frequently leads to unjust comment by the American press on the apparent severity of the punishment inflicted in Great Britain for trifling offenses. For example, a laundress was recently condemned to seven years' penal servitude for stealing a shirt, and a railway porter to a like incarceration for pilfering a common sweeping broom which he used at the station. In both cases previous convictions were charged and proved against the condemned; hence the severity meted to them. It is this very repetition of crime which proves the fallacy of attempting to reform convicts by any existing system in practice for that purpose. If prison life were conducive to the reform of those who undergo it, there would be a steady decrease of criminals. But, instead of that being the case, statistics show that that pestiferous class are constantly increasing in a greater ratio than the augmentation of the general population. Instead of jails and State prisons being generally depopulated, as would naturally be the case if convicts were reformed therein, old prisons and penitentiaries have to be continually enlarged, and new ones erected for the vastly increased accommodation demanded.

What the report alluded to recommends as the first and paramount requisite, before any reform can be effectually attempted, is the classification of convicts. This should not be based so much on the character of the crimes and length of the sentences of prisoners as on their age, education, and former habits and status. The man who, in a fit of rage, for some real or imaginary affront or injury, fires at and wounds another, and receives a seven years' sentence, may be an infinitely better person at heart than the burglar who is condemned to only three years' incarceration. So the cashier who, under extraordinary temptation, embezzles his employer's money, should not be associated with murderers and highwaymen. It is true that the dishonest clerk, if outwardly less repulsive than the low, cowardly burglar, may at heart be as bad a man; but that is the exception, not the rule. Where novices in crime, and those of previously good habits and character, and men whose whole lives have been dishonest and a war against the rights of society, are huddled together indiscriminately, the result can not be doubtful; the whole becomes a mass of leavened guilt, and is literally unreformable. The only objection made to the classification of convicts is the additional expense it would entail. This is a question for the consideration of the representatives of the people. To incur such extra expense at the outset might prove wise economy in the end. There are no statistics which show how much a community loses by theft and embezzlement; but, if the figures could be arrived at, they would probably prove that a saving would be effected by reforming, at almost any cost, a considerable portion of the criminal class, rather than to turn them loose, unreformed.

There is another matter—which the report notices—which should not be lost sight of in connection with any efforts made for the reformation of convicts. It should never be forgotten that even a condemned malefactor is a human being, and he ought to be treated as such. Treat a man as a brute, and you make him a brute if he is not one already. A good reformatory system should contain other factors besides that of severity. No doubt a State prison is, and ought to be, a place of punishment for those who violate the laws of the commonwealth. Society demands that they shall be punished, but not that they shall be treated with cruelty and barbarity. The punishment ought not to overstep the privation of liberty, ignominious raiment, labor for ten hours a day, coarse food, and a hard bed. To maintain what is termed the discipline of a penitentiary many petty annoyances are practiced, which tend only to vex and irritate the prisoners, and is antagonistic to reformation. Thus, they are not permitted to speak even in a low tone of voice; they are forbidden to look to the right, or the left, or over their shoulders, or even to raise their eyes from their work. These and all other purely vexatious rules should be abrogated; so likewise should the lash and whipping-post, and similar remnants from barbarous ages, while small indulgences should be allowed for meritorious conduct. Education—to be given in evening school after the manual labor of the day is over—should be part of the reformatory system, as ignorance is admittedly one of the parents of vice, if idleness be the other. An evening school would keep the prisoners' minds better employed than in lonely brooding in their cells during the long hours before retiring to rest. In some English prisons enforced idleness is the punishment for breach of the rules; to be permitted to labor is considered an indulgence. Mere brutal, unreasoning severity has been tried long enough, and it has proved a signal failure. A more humane treatment, which would not utterly destroy all self-respect and hope in a man, is demanded. What is the outcome of the privation of hope? Despair. And despair is a terrible feeling to create. The keepers, as a rule, are ignorant, stony-hearted, brutal men, who rejoice in acting as petty tyrants. Such keepers are totally unfit for their positions. For this class, civility, mildness, complete self-possession, good temper, and firmness are the chief requisites. It will thus be seen that the whole punitive system and general prison arrangement and management require to be reformed before the prisoners can be reformed. The subject is a serious one, and merits the consideration of our legislators.

BALD-HEADED MEN.

TO MY SISTER READERS OF THE ARGONAUT:—I never yet have seen the woman who has not the strongest faith in first impressions. No rule is without its exceptions. This is not to be relied upon in the case of a bald man. The first Bible lesson I recall is that tale of two she-bears devouring an immense number of children—fifty, I think, for telling an old bald-headed man to "go up." We are told he afterward did this; but the children's advice was premature, hence their fate.

During my childhood my acquaintance with specimens of this genus was confined to my observations in church. Every Sunday found me in my corner of the pew, apparently intent on the services, actually watching the several bald men in the congregation. Each shining pate was a study; and, although they were guilty of various idiosyncrasies, invariably dropping to sleep, I regarded them as the special protégés of Divine Providence. Well, then I was a child, and "saw through a glass darkly." Judge my astonishment, when I began attending the theatre, at beholding a conspicuous number of these embryo archangels, as my childish imagination had designated them, ranged close up to the footlights. With what intense avidity they followed the play! How their cheeks glowed over the pretty faces and forms on the stage! No more idea of going to sleep than of parting their hair! Then, when brother John told me that those "old duffers with the skating-rinks on their heads" were the principal patrons of the ballet, the scales fell from my eyes. I began to fear Divine Providence would not take all the bald under its protecting wing. Now, after years of experience, let me whisper in the ears of my fellow-women a few words of advice:

This style of hair-dressing seems peculiarly adapted to deceive woman in regard to the real character of the man. You will find them bald from twenty-five upward. It gives a dignified, benign appearance. Back of dignity we expect solid intellect. Mark my words, you'll find him a superficial, conceited fellow when young, and stupid and stubborn when older. Then you will imagine him possessed of all the cardinal virtues. I weep while I write it. Your imaginings are vain; never was man so ill-supplied. First impressions are become a delusion and a snare, for there is naught that is good in a bald-headed man.

SAN RAFAEL, January 13, 1880.

AUNT JANE.

Mr. Tilden's Mastiff.

The New York Star tells this story: Mr. Tilden, along with all his other fendish habits, owns a dog. It is the most resonant, tireless yowler of its kind. The kind is mastiff. It was brought from Mr. Tilden's home at Yonkers to enliven things at Gramercy Park. The unperturbed condition of Gramercy Park seems to have been a thorn in the side of Mr. Tilden. He had the power of making things lively everywhere else, but the aristocratic placidity of Gramercy Park defied him. So he brought down this dog. The very first night of the experiment Gramercy Park enjoyed a new sensation. Nearly all the ladies in the vicinity of Mr. Tilden's residence are nervous, middle-aged ladies, who had never heard anything more dreadful than the lamb-like yap of a Bedlington terrier which wanted its warm bath. When, therefore, Mr. Tilden's dog opened in the back yard, and proceeded, as Milton puts it, to disembowel the night with outrageous noise, the sacred retreats of Gramercy Park shook with horror and amazement. Private accounts say that nothing exactly like the linked hellishness of that dog's demoniac performance was ever heard anywhere, and it was calculated that in less than two hours of effective work every old lady and gentleman within two hundred feet of the dog focus was up and in slippers. Sashes went up; light and entirely innocuous bootjacks rattled down into Mr. Tilden's back yard; policemen were called; protests were hurled from night-capped taxpayers at back windows, and light and airy anathemas, entirely appropriate to the Gramercy Park lips, fell like dew upon the owner of the dog. It does not appear that Mr. Tilden was among those disturbed. It is even intimated that he went to Yonkers and slept, and gave orders not to feed the dog. But this sounds very much like partisan malice. The upshot of it all was, that on Monday morning Mr. C. C. Starkweather made a complaint to the Board of Health, and then ran for his life before the reporters could catch him. Diligent inquiry and much ringing of bells in Gramercy Park resulted only in stately and frigid denials of all knowledge of this or any other dog, coupled with warm deprecation of any desire to complain of Mr. Tilden. From all of which the intelligent reporter concluded that either Mr. Tilden's dog had been poisoned, or that the annoyed neighbors desired to suppress Mr. Tilden and his animal without having it known.

The publication of a dying sailor's story in a New York journal has aroused a new interest in the fate of the ship Patriot, lost ever so long ago, with the daughter of Aaron Burr on board. Mr. Joseph P. Bull, of that city, has given a version of the matter founded on the confession of one of the murderers of the Patriot's crew and passengers: "The Patriot sailed from Charleston, South Carolina, for New York on December 30th, 1812. Before he sailed, three men called upon Capt. Overstocks, saying that they wished to come to New York, but were too poor to pay their passage. They begged to be allowed to work their way on board the Patriot. Capt. Overstocks not only took the men on board and set them to work, but put them under pay. One was made cook, and the other two were put before the mast. All went well until the third or fourth night out, when the Patriot was off the New Jersey coast. Mrs. Alston was anxious to reach New York, and asked the captain when he thought the vessel would arrive. The captain told the lady that, if the weather continued favorable, they would arrive at the Sandy Hook light before morning. The night was clear and the stars shone brightly. The captain and most of the crew went below. The men who had been befriended by Capt. Overstocks were on deck. The mate was on watch. Soon the men on deck were joined by the cook and one or two of the ship's original crew. About midnight a plot that had been matured among the trio from Charleston and part of the regular crew was put into effect. The mate was knocked senseless upon the deck and thrown overboard. The hatches were then battened down, and all below were imprisoned. The pirates then secured all the silver and valuables on board, and scuttled the vessel. She went down with colors flying. The pirates, with their booty, pulled ashore in the long-boat, and secreted the valuables in the woods. The next day there came on a heavy snow-storm, and the pirates having neglected to mark the place where they had hidden their spoils, were never able to find them. The loss of the Patriot was for a long time a complete mystery. Aaron Burr fitted out an expedition in search of the vessel on which his daughter had sailed, and the coast between New York and Boston was scoured, but no trace of the missing vessel could be found. The first indication of her fate was the recognition of two of the Charleston pirates in New Orleans. Suspicion was fastened upon them, and they were arrested. One of them confessed the story told above, but neither said anything of making the passengers and crew of the vessel walk the plank. Both were convicted of piracy and hanged."

The London Globe undertakes to point out the distinction between "good breeding" and "good form," the latter expression being comparatively little heard in this country. What is known as "good form" may be taken to consist of that strict observance of every monstrous mandate of fashion which is the chief work of loyalty to the social lawgiver, while the secondary and probably unintentional effect is to show what a wholly artificial and preposterous system "society's" code of good manners is. "Good form" is not to be confounded with good breeding or wholesome etiquette. It is a spurious ideal set up by the idolaters of mode. Good breeding indicates a due regard for the unalterable laws of the entire human family; "good form" is the slavish reflex of the caprice of the hour. Good breeding has no concern with the arts of dissembling; "good form" bristles with flagrant hypocrisy. Good breeding does not incite cynicism or habitual distrust of mankind; "good form" only reaches perfection in the person of the hollow man of the world. Good breeding needs no infusion of scandal to assist its development; "good form" shows to great advantage in the assassin of character. It is so common and mischievous an error among those who gaze upon the puppets of fashion from a distance, and are dazzled by the reflected graces of society to mistake the one for the other, that it is necessary to disentangle the deftly woven threads. Imitators notoriously pounce upon the faulty aspects of their model, no doubt because vices are more obtrusive than virtues, and those who prostrate themselves before the splendors of the upper ten seize upon and emulate the glitter of "good form" in the fond belief that they are adorning their manners.

The ways of social self-culture in New York are manifold and easily practicable. Take music, for instance. To be able to talk about it, it is by no means indispensable to read works on music, still less to listen to much of it. All that is needed is the acquaintance of some versatile impresario, or some good musician. This class of men have lately grown to be very pleasant companions. Most of them are quite willing to play a game of whist or poker—especially poker. Association with them is thus freed of all tediousness, while its utility is incontestable. The other day an Irishman of social aspirations and sentimental impulses came accidentally across a first-class pianist, and was induced to accompany him to Joseffy's concert. He never knew nor cared anything about music before; but to-day he can be heard talking of B-flats, Chopin's preludes, broken cadences, and Liszt's rhapsodies, as if he had been dealing in them all his life long.

Mr. Stanford has done the State a graceful and patriotic service in bringing to this coast the nucleus of an arboretum, which promises to be, in the best sense, both comprehensive and valuable. Palo Alto, Mr. Stanford's Santa Clara estate, is believed to be admirably located for such an experiment. Soil and climate and facilities for irrigation are extremely favorable; and the experiment of growing foreign and domestic trees will be pursued under exceptionally favorable circumstances. After the arboretum is fairly established, it will be thrown open to the general public—say the daily papers—and the example of Mr. Stanford is almost sure to influence others. California has greater need of an intelligent forest system than any other State in the Union; and perhaps this experiment may open the eyes of those most interested.

From Prof. Goode's "Natural and Economical History of the American Menhaden" we learn that this excellent and thoroughly respectable fish is variously known under the following aliases: Pogy, poggie, bony fish, hard head, moss-bunker, white fish, old wife, bug fish, bug head, chebog, ale wife, green tail, yellow tail, and fat back. By a singular oversight—which illustrates the poverty of current topic literature in the mental regimen of the applied scientist—Prof. Goode neglects to inform his readers that the Pacific coast Menhaden is locally known as Ike Kalloch.

Poker-players who are going South for the winter will be pleased to hear that, according to a late decision of the courts of Tennessee, white and colored gentlemen may join each other in that fascinating but expensive amusement. The courts held that the "result of the war" had made all men free, and that an old statute which subjected to fine and imprisonment whites and blacks who gambled together, must be considered repealed. So that our genial African fellow-citizen now enjoys all the privileges of the "Heathen Chinee."

To the editor of the Hour, a lady suggests a needed social improvement—"A Card Exchange and Clearing-House! As it is impossible for a person to manage social etiquette now without immense loss of time, why not have Johnson take all the names on the list, and, referring to those who wish it, make a red mark against those who have called and wish to call, and a black one against those who cut or are cut, and thus finish it all?"

A London lady has ordered a Watteau enameled snuff-box set in diamonds, to be added to her muff, thus reviving the modes of a hundred years ago.

HOW TO BE COMFORTABLE.

A writer in La Vie Parisienne relates how a Parisian belle keeps warm in the winter season, and he warms the reader a trifle too, perhaps:

"An hour before you get up your maid will light your fire, and then screen it with a silver framework lined with rose silk, which will temper the heat and give to the whole room a sort of rosy morning light, that warms while it illumines. Then she will bring you on a silver plate-warmer your cup of chocolate, hot and foaming, which you will drink from the warmer itself, munching the while your rusks, served on a little gold toast-rack, kept hot in its turn by a little live charcoal, sprinkled with vanilla to perfume the air. After you have taken your chocolate you will snooze again for a couple of hours. Then you will put on a déshabillé of pink satin lined with swansdown, enveloping the whole body from head to foot. The waistband and the fastening of the neck of this garment must be in velvet, so as to be warm to the touch. You may now pass into the bath-room, the atmosphere of which will be kept at an agreeable temperature by little gusts of rose-scented vapor pumped through an aperture in the wall. The next part of our subject is a delicate one; but honi soit qui mal y pense. It is now time to draw on the stockings, lined with warm flossy silk, long and perfumed, and gartered with Russian sables clasped with cat's-eye stones set in diamonds. The boots are to be lined with swansdown, and trimmed with Russian sables as well.

"Our precious product of high civilization is now in her dressing-room. This is to be made comfortable by means of an immense foot-warmer, some two metres square, which is to form a kind of second flooring all about the dressing table. The blinds may be colored to represent 'the ardent rays of the sun,' and the padding to keep out the draught is to be trimmed with natural flowers. This will make the place look and feel like a summer bower in the depth of winter. The maid may now 'fumigate the nape of the neck' with a little burnt benzoin, to make it supple—a most characteristic provision, for without a supple neck how could a French person possibly get through the duties of politeness for the day? We must not forget the hands. These may be kept warm by holding in them two little vessels of enamel filled with warm water, and shaped like apples—rather in bad taste in this direction, as tending to remind our Parisienne of the frivolity of taste by which her sex first came to grief. The promised advantage of this arrangement is, that it gives the hands that attractive rosininess which warmth alone can impart. For the middle of the day the Parisienne simply continues all these precautions by avoiding, as though it were laden with the breath of pestilence, every touch of cold air. The rusks that form her morning meal might be baked in her drawing-room, and the carriage in which she takes her drive is hermetically closed. She may realize winter by seeing the street-sweepers blowing on their fingers—through the windows.

"It is bedtime, and we are once more in the hands of our guide: he, however, stands discreetly in the background, until his interesting patroness has assumed the vêtement ordinaire. He then comes forward to recommend a second garment—a sort of ulster of white plush, trimmed with ostrich feathers at the neck and wrists—which is to be worn as an overall. The nightcap, of white satin, should be trimmed with feathers of the same bird, and, for additional warmth, a little turtle dove may be fastened above the left ear. The very hands are to have their nightcap—gloves of pink kid, lined with plush, and fastened by elastic (in pink chenille), so as not to check the circulation. The bed is to be heated by the fumes of burnt lime, flowers, and violets. These agreeable and calming emanations replace advantageously the old-fashioned warming-pan. Enfin, you will drink, just before going to sleep, a light crème de Sabailon, nice and hot, made with two fresh eggs and a small glass of Madeira. By carefully following these directions one may hope not to suffer too much in the winter time."

The glamour of romance which has enshrouded poets for generations is being rapidly dissipated. Mr. W. W. Story has a poem in the last Atlantic which gives him away completely. It is all about a sleigh-ride that he had with a girl some years since. Passing over the highfalutin part of the effort, which relates to the walls being "o'ersurfed with snow," we extract the business portion of the idyll, which reads as follows, and shows that, although a poet, Mr. Story was also one of the boys:

As closely you nestle against me,
While around your waist my arm
I have slipped—'tis so bitter, bitter cold—
It is only to keep us warm.

We talk, and then we are silent;
And suddenly—you know why—
I stooped—could I help it?—you lifted your face,
We kissed—there was nobody nigh.

Many an old man, as he reads these verses this morning, will feel as if he were a boy again—and then take measures to prevent his daughter's going sleigh-riding with any young fellows.

Perhaps the Old Year did a kindly and well-considered act in taking with him, as he went, George, the Count Johannes. New York, and the whole country as well, will miss one of her picturesque celebrities, but it was a pitiful sort of celebrity, a fantastic caricature that provoked laughter, which the world is just as well off without. The well-known figure, with its crushed tragedian airs, with the drooping moustache, the wig of suspicious blackness, the lock of hair carefully astray over the brow, and the insignia of his title conspicuously worn on what the Sun accurately describes as a "dark black" scarf—all this was laid away at last in a coffin almost as good as Mr. Stewart's. We go back to try and find something genuine in the man's life. "I was a real turtle once," said the Mock Turtle to Alice, in Wonderland. And the Count Johannes was a real actor once. You will find him in the Dictionary of Actors, and also of Authors, which is more distinction that will befall most of us.

If it is a settled fact that a woman must always have the last word, about when may a squabble between two women be expected to end?

NOTABLES.

Some of Whom are Likewise Nobodies.

Perhaps the most comfortable cabinet council upon record is that which Walpole describes as having been held in Pitt's bedroom when Pitt had the gout. The great Minister at such times used to have the bedclothes piled upon him, but to have no fire in the room. One day he summoned the Duke of Newcastle, and read him a lecture. The Duke was, "as usual," Walpole says, "afraid of catching cold." He "first sat down on Mrs. Pitt's bed as the warmest place; then drew up his legs into it as he got colder. The lecture, unluckily, continuing a considerable time, the Duke at length fairly lodged himself under Mrs. Pitt's bedclothes. A person from whom I had the story, suddenly going in, saw the two Ministers in bed, at the two ends of the room; while Pitt's long nose, and black beard, unshaved for some time, added to the grotesque nature of the scene."

The following New Year's story was told about Don Cameron when he was Secretary of War. Four of the most reputable newspaper correspondents had hired a swell carriage, and when they were making up their list one of them, a Philadelphian, insisted on putting down the name of the Secretary of War. "No matter if you don't know him," said he to his associates, "I am well acquainted with him. He'll be glad to see us, I know; and his daughter will undoubtedly have some pretty girls to receive with her." So they all went to Cameron's, where they were shown into the drawing-room, faultlessly arrayed, with immaculate white kids and exquisite button-hole bouquets. The Secretary advanced to receive them, and shook hands with his acquaintance, who introduced his three friends; but the Secretary did not escort the party across the room to where his daughter, with a bevy of belles, stood in full dress. A pause ensued, and then said Cameron: "You newspaper fellows must find it rather muddy to-day running round getting items." The "newspaper fellers" beat a hasty retreat.

General Sam Houston, then a member of Congress from Tennessee, and General White, of Nashville, agreed that on "September 23, 1826," they would "fight a duel on the Tennessee line; time, sunrise; distance, fifteen feet; weapons, holster pistols." Houston got out of bed at 3:40 A. M. on the 23d, and, sitting in his night-clothes, moulded two bullets. As the first fell from the mould a dog named "General Jackson" raised a triumphant howl under the window. When the second bullet dropped, a game-cock crowed long and loud from a neighboring tree. Houston, who was superstitious, cut the figure of a dog on one bullet, and that of a cock on the other. The principals stood at their posts on the second and to the inch. White's lead cut a whistle through the sharp air, but Houston stood unhurt. At the same instant the bullet with the dog mark passed clean through White's body, so that a silk handkerchief was drawn from one side to the other. After the duel Houston selected as his coat-of-arms the famous "chicken cock and dog."

Caleb Morris, a famous London preacher, was often robbed of his sermons. In company with a clerical friend, he attended a chapel at a watering place, and the pastor, a young man, preached. At the conclusion the friend said to Morris, "Extraordinary sermon, quite wonderful." "Think so?" was the reply; "you know whose it is, of course?" "His own, I hope." "No; mine." "Dreadful! but he is young; let us warn and save him." To the vestry they went. The young man was penitent—everybody "found out" is penitent—and confessed. When Morris claimed the sermon the preacher was indignant, and broke out: "I knew you were coming here this morning and I determined to give you something good, so I preached a sermon by the president of our college, Dr. —." The sermon was Morris's, and the preacher had robbed a thief.

At a dinner party one night I sat next to the late Mr. Charles Landseer, who told us, among other things, that his brother, Sir Edwin, was once looking at his own pictures in the South Kensington Museum, and, seeing some dust on one of them, leaned over the barrier and wiped it off with his handkerchief. Instantly the policeman on duty was upon him. "What are you a-doing of?" said the force, "a-touching that there picture?" "Why," answered Sir Edwin, smiling, "I've often touched it before!" "Have you, though?" cried the indignant peeler; "then more shame for yer!—you come along wi' me!" And he walked off the unresisting painter to the officers of the Museum, who of course recognized the culprit and condoned his offense.

Baron Gustave de Rothschild of Paris has a splendid mansion on the west side of Avenue Marigny, opposite the Elysée. The baron's next-door neighbor was Debrousse, the wealthy railway contractor. Upon Debrousse's death his mansion was put up to be sold. The upset price was $400,000. It was a new house and cost a great deal more than $400,000, for the architect was ordered to make it comfortable, without regard to cost. Baron Rothschild gave $400,000 for it, and instantly had it pulled down to give his mansion a larger lawn.

The Prince of Wales's income will probably be diminished some $100,000 by the hard times, while they make no difference to his mother, whose $5,000 a day comes in quarterly in hard cash. This does not include large revenues from other sources.

An English paper tells the following anecdote of Prince Bismarck: The German chancellor once said, in one of his familiar discourses: "In politics I act as I do out duck-shooting—I put my foot on one boulder, and do not take it off till I see my way to another. When I do, I step on the new boulder and leave the old one behind; and so on until I am out of the marsh."

Of the discoverers and conquerors of the New World, Columbus died broken-hearted, Roldin and Bobadilla were drowned, Balboa was beheaded, Cortez was dishonored, and Pizarro was murdered.

Tennyson and Carlyle are very fond of pipes, and seem bound to end their days in smoke.

THE OTHER POETS.

Winter Snow.

I.

The cold, cold snow! the snow that lies so white!
The moon and stars are hidden, there's neither warmth nor light:
I wonder, wife—I wonder, wife—where Jeanie lies this night?

II.

'Tis cold, cold, cold, since Jeanie went away;
The world has changed, I sit and wait, and listen night and day;
The house is silent, silent, and my hair has grown so gray;
'Tis cold, cold, cold, wife, since Jeanie went away.

III.

And tick! tick! tick! the clock goes evermore,
It chills me, wife—it seems to keep our child beyond the door;
I watch the firelight shadows as they float upon the floor,
And tick! tick! tick! wife, the clock goes evermore!

IV.

'Tis cold, cold, cold!—twere better she were dead,
Not that I heed the minister, and the bitter things he said—
But to think my lassie can not find a place to lay her head.
'Tis cold, cold, cold, wife—twere better she were dead.

V.

The cold, cold snow! the snow that lies so white!
Beneath the snow her little one is hidden out of sight.
But up above, the wind blows keen, there's neither warmth nor light,
I wonder, wife—I wonder, wife—where Jeanie lies this night?

—Robert Buchanan.

A "Godly Ballant."

Ane was a woman whose hert was gret;
Her love was sae dumb it was maist a grief;
She brak the box—it's tellt o' her yet—
The bonnie box for her hert's relief.

Ane was there whase tale's but brief,
Yet was ower lang, the gait he cawed;
He luikit a man, and was but a thief,
Michty the gear to grip and haud.

"What guid," he cried, "sic a boxfu' to blaud?
Willfu' waste I canna beir;
It micht haen been sellt for ten poun', I wad—
Sellt for ten poun', an' gien to the puir!"

Savin' he was, but for love o' the gear;
Carefu' he was, but a' for bimself;
He carried the bag to his hert sae near,
What fell, i' the ane i' the ither fell.

And the strings o' bis hert bang doon to hell—
They war pu'd sae tight aboot the moo;
And hence it comes that I hae to tell
The warst ill tale that ever was true.

The hert that's greedy maun mischief brew,
And the deil's pu'd the strings doon yon'er in bell;
And he sauld, er' the agein' mune was new,
For thirty shillin' the Maister himsel'.

Gear i' the hert it's a canker fell—
Brithers, letna the siller ben;
Troth, gien ye du, I warn ye, ye'll sell
The verra Maister er' ever ye ken.

—George MacDonald.

New Year's Eve.

All nights are New Year's Eves for those who see
Time but a picture of Eternity.
For them there is no old, there is no new;
End and beginning undivided flee
As in a flowing stream to human view.

Time would not be, but for the well-known flight
Of days and hours—of morning, noon, and night—
Of springs, of summers, and of winters cold.
Time is the stenograph that man must write,
A symbol faint of mystic speech half told.

—C. P. Cranch.

Better Luck Another Year.

Oh, never sink 'neath Fortune's frown,
But brave her with a shout of cheer,
And front her fairly—face her down—
She's only stern to those who fear!
Here's "Better luck another year!"
Another year!

Aye, better luck another year!
We'll have her smile instead of sneer—
A thousand smiles for every tear,
With home made glad and goodly cheer,
And better luck another year—
Another year!

The damsel Fortune still denies
The plea that yet delights her ear;
'Tis but our manhood that she tries—
She's coy to those who doubt and fear—
She'll grant the suit another year!
Another year!

Here's "Better luck another year!"
She now denies the golden prize;
But, spite of frown and scorn and sneer,
Be firm, and we will win and wear,
With home made glad and goodly cheer,
In better luck another year!
Another year! Another year!
—The late W. Gilmore Simms.

The Troika.

Hear ye the troika-bell a-ringing,
And see the peasant driver there;
Hear ye the mournful song he's singing,
Like distant tolling through the air?

"O eyes, blue eyes, to me so lonely,
O eyes—alas!—ye give me pain,
O eyes, that once looked at me only,
I ne'er shall see your like again.

"Farewell, my darling, now in heaven,
And still the heaven of my soul;
Farewell, thou father town, O Moscow!
Where I have left my life, my all."

And ever at the rein still straining,
One backward glance the driver takes
Sees but once more a green low hill
Sees but once more his loved one's face.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1880.

The capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company is one hundred millions of dollars, of which only fifty-four millions have been issued. Mr. C. P. Huntington is negotiating the sale of ten millions of this stock at eighty cents, to net eight millions, to a syndicate of Eastern bankers and railroad men. This sale indicates no present change of policy or management. It broadens the ownership, and for the first time places the Central Pacific Railroad stock upon the general market. Other sales may follow. It is within the possibilities of the future that enough stock may be given out to result in the withdrawal of the present managers, and to give the control to Eastern men. This, if it happens, will be a calamity to this coast and its business interests, which will not be fully realized until it occurs. Then the grumblers and malcontents will realize the difference in advantage to San Francisco between an ownership that is interested in the growth and welfare of our city and State, and an ownership that will discriminate in favor of the East.

Mr. Strowbridge, constructor for the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, has during the week taken his departure, with a strong force of railroad builders, for Arizona. At Casa Grande, the present terminus of the southern road, there is material for one hundred and fifty miles of road; other material will be pushed rapidly to the front. Mr. Strowbridge is under orders to build at the rate of one and a half miles a day. The objective point is the Rio Grande. The road will be pushed on to New Orleans, unless it meets some road westward bound with which it can make terms of union. It might not be an unbappy result if the great railroad kings should take control of the northern road, and leave to our Californian magnates and Mr. Huntington the management of a competing and independent line. So far as we are advised, the southern road has had no subsidy of money or lands, and has as yet no bonded debt. If Messrs. Stanford, Crocker, and Huntington can build and pay for a transcontinental railroad, holding the same without incumbrance and free from Government interference, it ought to be of incalculable advantage to the city and State where these gentlemen live and where all their interests concentrate.

We would call Judge Tyler's attention to the fact that the law which called the Convention provided in express terms that no compensation should be allowed after one hundred days. If Judge Tyler did not know the law, we now inform him of it; if he did, we demand of him by what authority he proposes to vote money out of the treasury to pay an illegal debt. If Judge Tyler proposes to be generous with his own money we have no objection, but we ask him to keep his hands out of our pockets. We are afraid that some of our legislators think demagogism the surest way to future political honors. We do not think so. Senator Baker's effort to save the treasury from spoliation will be remembered when the money-lenders who got their money through Judge Tyler will have forgotten that Judge Tyler ever lived. The "ignorant rabble," which pays no taxes, and which now rejoices in a temporary triumph, is not a permanent factor in American politics. It is a disease which will yield to treatment, and those shallow pates who think to prosper by pandering to the W. P. C. organization are simply idiots. Senator Baker has been criticised because he referred in debate to Senators who pay little or nothing. We will not consider the question of good taste and parliamentary propriety involved, but we will indulge ourselves in the luxury of remarking that Mr. C. C. Conger pays no taxes, Thomas Kane $1000; J. K. Willson nothing, J. C. Gorman nothing, M. H. King, John S. Enos $13.97, Robert Desty nothing; regard it as a burning shame that the men who make laws, and who appropriate property, and appropriations based upon taxes, should not themselves have some interest in affairs which they legislate. We can anticipate the sophomoric declamation that the utterance of these sentiments may provoke, and we are not ignorant of all the rant and fustian that may be got up over the "poor man" and the "honest man;" but we are not convinced that poverty is the evidence of integrity. Poverty is sometimes presumptive evidence of idleness, vice, extravagance, and folly. It is sometimes a temptation to crime, and not unfrequently an excuse for its commission.

The general tone of the debate in the Senate concerning the repeal of the Rogers Act and the acquisition of Lake Merced was a healthy one. Senators Traylor and Pardee struck the key-note of the whole business: Pardee when he gave his testimony as to the quality of the water, and Traylor when he truthfully said it would not command from any banking house a loan for one-sixth of the amount demanded for it. Honest public opinion in San Francisco undoubtedly demanded a repeal of the Rogers Act. We are not sufficiently acquainted with Senator Zuck, of Santa Clara, to know whether his character raises him above the suspicion of having been "retained by the snake." His argument is so supremely absurd that we are in doubt whether his mental and moral condition demands our censure or our sympathy. Our admiration of Senator Kane increases when we contemplate that heroic personal valor that enables him to defy "a million of men," and that sublime integrity that enables him to shut his mouth when money "was almost thrown into his teeth." If money should ever be actually thrown between his teeth, we wonder whether he would close the facial gap before the coin was corralled in his capacious jaws. We are very suspicious of the kind of bravery that brags, and the quality of integrity that boasts. The repealing act passed the Senate, twenty-seven to twelve.

The Democracy have had dreadful luck in their attempt to steal Maine. It has proved one of those political mistakes that are worse than crimes. The effort was a hold one that prompted Dr. Garcelon, a village apothecary, to endeavor to get away with a State Government. Will the Democratic party never learn wisdom from experience? One would think that its efforts in Louisiana, Florida, North Carolina, and Oregon—its submission to a court of arbitration, and its cipher dispatches—had taught it some lessons of prudence, but it seems not, and the Democracy goes into the Presidential fight groggy on its pins.

The abolition of harbor tolls by the vote of Messrs. McCoppin and Bruce Lee—the two outgoing commissioners—was a wise act, done just at the only time and by the only persons who could turn forty-four persons out of office without a great howl. Those affected are Democrats, going out by change of administration; the disappointment is divided among the hundreds who hoped to succeed. The amount of tolls collected by twenty wharfingers and twenty-four collectors was $123,582, at an annual cost of $58,800. The abolition of tolls will reduce the net receipts of the harbor fund but little. This fund is now ample for all contemplated improvements, and will be increased from the growing commerce of the port; and, as Mr. McCoppin says in his explanation of the motive, if the revenue derivable from dockage is insufficient the Legislature may impose a small tonnage tax. This abolition of harbor tolls is a relief to car-men, teamsters, and merchants, and takes from our water-front the humiliating spectacle of forty-four municipal palms extended for dimes from men who drive drays and do business with shipping. We are informed by those who profess to know that the charges imposed upon ships seeking our harbor are extravagant and burdensome. The true policy is to make this a cheap port for ships, by the abolition of all unnecessary dues. Our Chamber of Commerce could not do the city and State a better service than to suggest intelligent legislation in the direction of a free port.

Of course there will be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth among those expectant politicians who hoped that some of these crumbs might have fallen to their lot—those patriots who love their country as the penitent squaw loved her Redeemer, because of the wine in the communion cup. Some forty of these faithful party servants will be left out in the cold, and some super-serviceable partisan at Sacramento will undoubtedly be called upon to introduce a little bill to restore to the Republican party this bit of patronage that has been so meanly and so ruthlessly snatched from it. In the meantime it will be remembered that merchants and draymen have votes, and that it takes a majority of the elect of both Houses, after printing and three times reading a bill, to impose added burdens on commerce for the relief of impetuous Republican politicians.

In reply to the inquiry of several citizens who have asked, "What is the real inwardness of this contest over the Pueblo survey?" we frankly answer: "We do not know." We read the communication of the City and County Attorney, and it looks well upon its face. We read the accusations through in the Chronicle, and they suggest the possibility of some hidden scheme. When we pronounce the names of the lawyers employed on either side, those of Messrs. Taylor, Jarboe &

Pringle do seem to become the mouth as well as that of Mr. Greathouse. The fact that Mr. Greathouse favors one line of survey does not carry with it the absolute conviction that it is right. There is a great deal of smoke over this business, and there is never a smoke where fire is not. We will endeavor to write more intelligently upon this subject next week.

We have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with that reverend and godly Baptist divine who is acting as Mayor of San Francisco. We have no intimate knowledge of the colored citizen from Africa who has been good enough to minister to his personal comforts and to act as his body-servant—we refer to the gentleman whose name is Ransom. But we have been accustomed for many years to the pleasant face of Mr. John Kerrigan, late of Ireland, who has for three administrations enjoyed the highly lucrative and honorable position of porter in the Mayor's office. We are sorry that this reverend Mayor in God should throw off the Irish Democrat for the darkey of the sand-lot, and are the more sorry that this most reverend and devout of Baptist pastors should treat our amiable friend John of Ireland with indignity by shutting the door in his rubicund face. We commend this matter to the sand-lot for its consideration. It involves a grave question. Ireland has been insulted and the sand-lot has been wounded by the two holy Kallochs who pray in the tabernacle and prey in the City Hall.

James Russell Lowell has been nominated for the English Mission. There are three objections to this appointment. First, Dr. Lowell is a gentleman; second, he is a "dam literary feller;" third, he can not play draw poker, and will have to settle international disputes with the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs by the primitive and uncertain method of throwing round for the first jack. We need at the Court of St. James a trained and skillful diplomatist, like Schenck, who will resolutely stake the interests of his country and rake in the pot with five aces.

We have so much respect for the Hon. William Sharon, United States Senator from Nevada, that we are pained to confess that he has drawn some thirteen thousand dollars from the treasury as salary, and other moneys as mileage, to which he is neither legally nor morally entitled. There was a very good reason for Mr. Sharon's absence from his first session. He could not well have been spared from California and from San Francisco during the period of financial difficulties arising from the failure of the Bank of California and the death of Ralston. Those reasons did not continue, and we know of no others why Mr. Sharon should neglect to perform the duties of an office to which he has been elected, or draw money for labors he does not perform. When millionaires can purchase senatorial positions, and recoup from the Federal Treasury without devoting their time to their duties, there is something wrong.

We are glad of it. It serves Mr. ex-Secretary of State Beck right. He conspired to put William F. White on the Bank Commission to conciliate the sand-lot. It was a mistake. Now the sand-lot, on Sunday, repudiates Beck as Secretary of the Board of Railroad Commissioners, in favor of one Alva Udell. We would rather be a Democratic dog out of office and bay the moon, than an ex-secretary of state hegging the sand-lot for permission to burrow in its dirt.

The bill introduced by Mr. York into the Assembly "to enable female citizens to vote upon all matters relating to the public schools" is both stupid and absurd. It is in defiance of the Constitution, and it would be a mistake and a crime to pass it, if that little difficulty could be overcome. The practical result would be to turn the whole common-school system over to the Catholic priesthood. Simply that and nothing more. No further extension of the elective franchise, if you please, Mr. York, unless under the limitation of a property and intelligence qualification.

That benign Providence which is popularly supposed to watch over drunken men and sailors is being put to a severe test just now upon the city front. Anyone who takes a ramble in the vicinity of the Vallejo Street Wharf, and looks critically at the condition of the planking, will be convinced of this. There are not a few holes, at irregular intervals, through which the black, slopping waters of the bay are visible at a depth of six or eight feet below. These holes vary in size from those in which you could comfortably break a leg to such as would neatly engulf a well-grown child. There is nothing conventional about them. They are good go-as-you-please holes. Perhaps they have existed from time immemorial, and, for all we know, may be one of the sacred traditions of the neighborhood. Nevertheless a stranger may be pardoned for eyeing them askance and giving them a wide berth, and also for hoping that if, in the wise dispensation of Providence and wharves, there must needs be a hole, none but a Street or Wharf Commissioner may "put his foot in it."

The Grant "boom" is on the decline. General Grant will not be nominated. The nation affirms the principle that no man shall be three times President of the United States.

AFTERMATH.

Street preaching is not what it used to be. As the world gets more and more ungodly, those peripatetic vendors of theology, those ecclesiastical free-lances, so to speak, who were wont to tickle the ears of a gaping and unwashed constituency in front of the What Cheer House of a Sunday morning, or at Meiggs's Wharf of a Sunday afternoon, have turned sadly from the venture, and are beginning to admit that the quest is vain. Material interests have, alas! engrossed their attention, and their friends and admirers must grope for the beautiful gates unguided, as heretofore, by their brotherly sympathy. It is a sad commentary upon the gifted creatures who at one time put their hands to the plow and their shoulders to the wheel in so good a cause, that, of the greater lights, Old Crisis now runs a matrimonial agency, and engages in the business of marrying and giving in marriage, while the reverend doctor whose commanding presence, stentorian tones, and apt repartee made him the delight and idol of Sacramento Street and Meiggs's Wharf, has preached his last sermon, to the text of "I have married a wife, and therefore I can not come."

"God," however, says an old adage, "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb;" and that the lambs of Meiggs's Wharf, at least, are having the unholy breezes well tempered to them, a cursory visit of a Sunday afternoon will satisfy. Those venerable planks, consecrated by the whilom tread of the august doctor, and odorous of unswept garbage from the animals there exhibited, now afford a vantage ground for the vagaries of a gentleman of color, who indulges his auditors with sacred melodies and homilies, ad nauseam. It has been unkindly remarked that he is the missing link between the monkey on the shed and the "hoodlum" on the ground, and that the menagerie has gained by his acquisition. This delicate question ought to be referred to the cockatoos, who grace the opposite side of the "house," as natural umpires, in that they possess more brains than the monkeys, more "cheek" than the hoodlums, and more "gas" than the nigger preacher.

To wile away the dragging weeks of his imprisonment Mr. J. C. Duncan is writing a history of San Francisco, in which this unhappy town is represented with great verisemblance as having fallen under the domination of the Chinese, and the whites must go. It is acridly "personal," but the only sufferers are Mr. Duncan's enemies, each of whom in his turn has to "get up and get." As a sample of the work, which is to be illustrated, we present the following lines appended to a cut representing a juggler with cards, cups-and-halls, and other appliances of his profession:

"The tricky Gorham kissed the Mongol rod,
And sought Ah Sin to aid his patent plan—
A new halloon, the Fatherhood of God,
To whirl around the Brotherhood of Man.

"The keen-eyed card-sharp could not make believe:
'You' name not Gorham—say you name Jim Slick.
You sell 'em patents? Maybe up um sleeve
You hold the dehhle, who will take the trick."

"So Slippery Jim—like that old Guillotine
Whose own invention was the last he faced—
Drawn to the Plaza in his own machine,
The chain-gang brotherhood alone embraced."

The Rev. W. J. Smith preached the other evening from the text, "Depart from our coast"—a petition that a multitude of people once addressed to Jesus. The reverend gentleman's "idea" seems to be that the people of San Francisco would like to have Jesus leave California; that "Jesus must go" would be a popular "watchword." It is not so; we would like to have him not go, hut come. He is needed to flog the money-changers out of Pine and California streets, and to dispute with the clergy in the Temple. Our Magdalen need him to forgive them ere they go and sin some more, and our thieves would be glad of his company when they are crucified by the other thieves.

The head of Pinkerton's Detective Bureau was in town, en route to Oregon on business. There is a good deal of business for detectives in Oregon; where criminals do not confess, and go voluntarily into the Legislature, as they do here, they must be hunted out and commissioned as post-masters.

Sheriff Tunstead, of Marin, who hangs a man tenderly, "as if he loved him," has had to perform that kindly service for no fewer than four men during his two terms of office. Altogether there have been a good many Marin people hanged at one time and another, and if the county has not always been as well represented in the Legislature as some other counties, that accounts for it. Mendocino, where sixty-one murders have been committed, and only one man—and he from another county—has been made to swing for the whole sixty-one, can of course have her pick of suitable Assemblies. But the nominating conventions that glean the field after the Sheriff of Marin have struck a streak of hard luck.

Speaking of hanging, we observe with pleasure that more persons enjoyed that advantage in 1879 than in any previous year of the record—one hundred and one gentlemen and no ladies having been legally dispatched, and seventy-four—all gentlemen—lynched. With regard to the last-named unfortunates, it is rather mortifying to our State pride to confess that more of them came to their death in Colorado, and also in Kentucky, than in California. The deceased were mostly hanged, but some were shot, the laws of Utah and Texas permitting the person sentenced to choose the manner in which it will be the more agreeable for him to die. On the whole, the year 1879 takes high rank as a period of good, honest putting to death, of which there can never be too much. Still it is always sad to think what a little education and religion might have done for the remains.

The Legislature appears to be not altogether clear as to whether the Constitution requires that bills shall be read before passage. We are not altogether clear ourselves, but we hope not. It takes a good deal of time to read bills, and the time for speech-making must be correspondingly abridged. The Courts interpret obscure or ambiguous laws by reference to the debates on them, and it seems right that these should be as voluble and prolix as possible, in order to the evolution of more light. Moreover, the bills drawn by most of the honorable members can not be read, and most of the clerks and secretaries can not read.

A correspondent, however, who seems to have given this matter of bill-reading a good deal more thought than we, proposes to help the Legislature "out of the wilderness" by a less simple but more ingenious method. We append his suggestion:

"Let an appropriation be made for the purchase of half a dozen, at least, of Edison's phonographs, which shall be placed in a room provided specially for them. Then, before any bill is introduced, require its author to read it aloud into the 'hopper' of the phonograph. This will prepare the sheets, from which any number of readings can afterward be made in the two houses. Let these sheets be filed with the bills, and then, when a reading is ordered, all the clerk will have to do will be to put in the prepared sheets, and grind away. By this process the thorax of the reading clerk will be preserved intact, and the members will be treated to a reading of all bills in the voices of their authors, brogue and all. See?"

It is interesting to know that "all the great Paris clubs have their own theatres, where the members assume the male characters of the plays produced, while the ladies are drawn from the regular stage." This arrangement is said to give "a charming spice to the representations, especially to the young fellows who do the lovers." It is further "alleged" that "these youths do not always drop their characters when the theatre is out." It is not suggested, however, that possibly they have no characters to drop.

While hunting on the other side of the Bay last Sunday, Mr. Goss, a gentleman unaccustomed to the society of ladies, mistook two girls for one wildcat. Had Mr. Goss been a good shot this would have been of trifling importance, for he would have fired between them; as it was, he put a huckshot through the head of each. As he expresses considerable regret for the misadventure, and was disappointed of his wildcat, we are indisposed to be too hard on him; we would only stretch the neck of him till it should pull away from his body, leaving a stove-pipe hole. We are not naturally cruel, but we love girls, and hate the man of imperfect observation who can mistake any conceivable number of them for a wildcat.

A lady writing for the New Orleans Times is spoken of by Progress as "The George Eliot of the South." There are infinite reasons for terming each of several lady writers of this city "The George Eliot of the West." But the resemblances are more spiritual than literary.

The Plumber and Sanitary Engineer says: "What the poor need above all things is enlightenment. They must be shown that it is suicide to sleep in dark, close rooms. They must learn the value of sunlight, the danger of exposure to damp, the need of proper clothing, and the necessity of moderation in eating and drinking." The high authority might have added, in the language of Mr. William Wellock, that next to good advice the poor need cash.

A Mr. Foster, of Belfast, offers to give fifteen thousand pounds sterling to assist emigration from Ireland to the United States. He writes that he feels sure the Americans will heartily cooperate in his plan for relieving the Irish distress. We will cooperate with Mr. Foster in giving away as much money as he may wish to; hut to his emigration scheme we should prefer an amendment to our Constitution, enabling the recipients of his bounty to vote where they are, transmitting the ballots by steamer.

Philanthropist Foster says: "Here is the money—Depart for the land of corn, wine, milk, and honey."

Says Mick: "If pertaties and whisky don't grow there, 'Fwat good will it do me when shtarvin' to go there?"

The Democrats answer his random suggestion: "What good 'twill do us, my gosssoon, is the question."

It takes an Oakland woman, after all, to exterminate an offending person of the same species. A brace of these ducks engaged in hostilities the other day on the ferry-boat, using their "concealed weapons" with deadly effect. Finally one uncovered her vital parts by making this unfortunate lunge: "Everybody knows that you have a false tongue!" "And that you, my dear," said the other, with a surer thrust, "have false teeth." The inquest elicited no new facts.

There is a class of contributors with whom it is always pleasant for editors to meet. This class combines the excellences of half a dozen classes. It is not voluble and it is cleanly. Its writing is legible and its members do not fawn. What it says is generally worth saying. Its sentences do not require frequent alterations. Its punctuation tends toward conformity with common sense. The class is not large, and all who write for the ARGONAUT do not come within its narrow fold. But of such is the Kingdom of Approval.

The Sacramento Record-Union rightly observes "that it is far more important to California that the Chinese question should be satisfactorily settled than that this or that individual should be elected President." This is our one great, absorbing question, upon which there is no division of opinion. Native and foreign-born, Catholic and Protestant, the rich and the poor, the cultured and the ignorant, the good and the criminal, the toilers and the idlers, unite in agreeing that Chinese immigration must be discouraged. In this respect the sand-lot only echoes the opinion of the most intellectual and cultured class. All politicians agree that the electoral vote of California, Oregon, and Nevada will be given to that Presidential candidate who will promise most in this direction, and who is most likely to keep his promise.

Observing that a resolution had been introduced in the State Senate concerning the payment of his creditors, the late contractor of the Branch Prison at Folsom publishes a card, saying that he has no creditors. We beg his pardon—that is not the question; the object of the resolution is to create some. If they are to be paid by the State under the provisions of a relief act, we presume he will not have the impertinent effrontery to interfere by refusing to audit their bills. What interest has he in this business, anyhow?

Say the Indian Board managers, known to themselves as Christians: "We will nothing have to do with poker-playing soldiers."

Say the men who do the fighting: "Go to, ye nasal broad-brims."

The question of uniting the Mercantile with the Mechanics' Library has been submitted for consideration to a committee of the former. We distinctly favor the proposition. The San Franciscanese lettered male is interested in neither the one institution nor the other, except in so far as it is a nice place to see the young does of his species, who affect the place in quantity, making a mellow scholastic atmosphere of murmurs and eyes and banged hair. The Mechanics' Library must be opulent of these gentle creatures, though doubtless the young mechanichess is of somewhat coarser texture than the young merchantess. But all are nice, and any proposition looking to a consolidation of their charms is eminently worthy of a hearing.

"If I send you a manuscript," writes an imperfectly civil correspondent who thoughtfully describes himself as a theological student, and has the independence to spell "leisure" with an a, "and it does not suit you, will you return it like gentlemen, or simply put it in your waste-basket?" We shall simply put it in our waste-basket.

On dit that the De Youngs, anticipating the passage of Mr. Grove Johnson's retraction bill, are negotiating for the purchase of a newspaper in Nevada. The bill does not apply to articles copied from other journals; so they will first publish their libels in the Nevada concern, then reprint them in the Chronicle, and tranquilly contemplate the serpentine convolutions of the victim—who will commonly be "a party by the name of Johnson."

New Orleans society ladies are thus written at by a generous sister in her description of a recent fancy-dress ball: "There was every sort of war paint, figurative and real—from the rouge ruhned on with a bit of chamois skin, to the hlush which faded and deepened in the rounded cheeks of young girls receiving their first heaux."

The audiphone is an immense success. It has enabled so many demi-deaf people to hear what is said, that the consequent kicking has awakened the community to a sense of its responsibility. Mr. Shinn says—very wisely, for a poet: "No man ought to whisper what may be overheard." We trust the tomcats and other hoodlums will hearken to the words of Mr. Shinn, for in keeping of silence there is great reward—if virtue be its own reward.

The audiphone is of special interest to distant lovers. The young man in Oregon and the maiden in San Luis Obispo may hereafter exchange sigs at less than the rates which are now charged for the telegraphic kiss.

A correspondent desires to know what is the best term of endearment known to modern love-making. The correspondent neglected to furnish us with her name, so it is possible to answer the question satisfactorily. It has been, however, forwarded to Mr. Pickers.

LA CRÈME DES CHRONIQUES.

They were talking over the effects of the severe weather. "Few people can have any idea of the sufferings of the poor and those who have to be out in such frosts," says one; "an unfortunate coachman, I see, was frozen to death yesterday on the box."

"That was rough," says another; "perhaps the fare was in a hurry to go somewhere."

The Prefect of a department in the East has had devolve upon him the duty of presenting to a sapper-pumper, who had distinguished himself at a fire, a splendid gold medal.

"I am happy," said the eloquent magistrate, "to have to present you with this testimonial to your courage and good behavior. I hope that other holocausts may happen, so that you may again be able to display your bravery and devotion."

A lady was "passing round the bat" in a salon for the benefit of the poor.

"This is for your beautiful eyes," says gallantly a beau of the old school, dropping a louis in the collection box.

"Oh, thanks!" says the fair one with a profound courtesy, "and now I want something for the poor," holding out the box again.

M. Barthélemy Saint Marc Girardin has published a French prose translation of the "Chanson de la Chemise," by Thomas Hood, which we take the liberty of translating back into English, with scrupulous, or to speak more correctly, unscrupulous fidelity:

"A woman is seated, covered with tatters. Her eyelids are red and swollen, her fingers are weary and worn. With a feverish baste she pushes her needle, she draws her thread. Stitch, stitch, stitch, in poverty, in hunger, in dirt! And without intermission, in a voice sharp and sighing, she sings the chanson de la chemise. 'Stitch, stitch, stitch, when the cock sings in the distance! And stitch, stitch, stitch again, when the stars shine through the disjointed roof. Stitch, stitch, stitch, until that thy brain floats in the vertigo; and stitch, stitch, stitch, until that thine eyes are burning and troubled. Stitch, stitch, stitch! the seam, the gusset, the band. The band, the gusset, the seam, until that thou fall asleep upon the buttons, and that thou concludest to sew them in a dream!'"

C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la chanson de la chemise.

X, Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, had been cited before the police tribunal for complicity in some financial transactions that were not of a particularly honorable character. He presented himself wearing the insignia of the order.

"Behold, your honors," bellows the public prosecutor, "behold to what a pitch this shameless wretch carries his impudent defiance of healthy public opinion. He actually dares to present himself here before you, a criminal, about to receive condign punishment, with the decoration of which he is so unworthy."

X is found guilty, but takes an appeal, and, warned by his previous experience, puts in an appearance before the superior tribunal with an undecorated button-hole.

"Behold, your honors," bellows the same public prosecutor, "this guilty and slinking wretch, who, recognizing in the depths of his sinful soul that he is unworthy to be associated with honorable men, does not dare to put on the decoration which he thus tacitly confesses himself unfit to wear!"

Aurelien Scholl, the well-known Parisian chroniqueur, is making war upon certain familiar phrases of the dramatic repertory. The following have been placed under the ban: My poor father!—keep it from him!

Ruined—aye, ruined! The rich banker at London to whom I had intrusted all my fortune has fled!

Who am I? Thou wouldst know my name? My name is Vengeance!

Your father is innocent, I tell you, and here are the papers which will prove it.

Lost, my child, lost—and all through me!

But say that you are innocent; tell me that it is false! Do you not see that I am going mad? Nothing! Not a word! She is silent! Oh, heaven! then it is true!

And through all the weary wanderings of my exile, your image, Amelia, has ever been present to my mind.

There are those, you know, who are born to love—and to suffer.

An insurmountable barrier lifts itself between you and me. I am the daughter of a convict.

You should say the daughter of a martyr.

SACRAMENTO, January 19, 1880. N. B. S.

Dickens's Letter to a Boy.

The following letter from Dickens to a little boy, who, it seems, had written him about Dotheboys Hall, will interest the readers of Nicholas Nickleby:

RESPECTED SIR:—I have given Squeers one cut on the neck and two on the head, at which he seemed much surprised and began to cry, which, being a cowardly thing, is just what I should have expected from him—shouldn't you? I have carefully done what you told me in your letter about the lamb and the two "sheeps" for the little boys. They have also had some good ale and porter, and some wine. I am sorry you did not say what wine you would like them to have. I gave them some sherry, which they liked very much, except one boy, who was a little sick, and choked a good deal. He was rather greedy, and that's the truth, and I believe it went the wrong way, which I say served him right, and I hope you will say so too. Nicholas had his roast lamb, as you said he was to; but he could not eat it all, and says, if you do not mind his doing so, he would like to have the rest hashed to-morrow with some greens, which he is very fond of, and so am I. He said he did not like to have his porter hot, for he thought it spoiled the flavor, so I let him have it cold. You should have seen him drink it. I thought he never would have left off. I also gave him three pounds in money, all in sixpences, to make it seem more; and he said directly that he should give half to his mamma and sister, and divide the rest with poor Snike. And I say he is a good fellow for saying so; and if anybody says he isn't I am ready to fight him whenever they like—there! Fanny Squeers shall be attended to, depend upon it. Your drawing of her is very like, except that I don't think the hair is quite curly enough. The nose is particularly like hers, and so are the legs. She is a nasty, disagreeable thing, and I know it will make her very cross when she sees it; and what I say is that I hope it may. You will say the same, I know—at least I think you will. I meant to have written you a long letter, but I can not write very fast when I like the person I am writing to, because that makes me think about them; and I like you, and so I tell you. Besides, it is just eight o'clock at night, and I always go to bed at eight o'clock except on my birthday, and then I sit up to supper. So I will not say anything more besides this, and that is my love to you and Neptune; and if you will drink my health every Christmas Day I will drink yours—come. I am, respected sir,

YOUR AFFECTIONATE FRIEND,

P. S.—I don't write my name very plain, but you know what it is, you know, so never mind.

New York's new society journal, the Hour, says: "In New York, fashion and culture have been divorced. It looks, even, as if they had never been married. We read of the days when Washington Irving, Julian Verplanck, and J. K. Paulding were young men of fashion. We learn, too, that William B. Astor sought the illustrious friendship of Madame de Staël and Madame Récamier, and the tutorship of Baron Bunsen, before accepting the life-long duty of nursing a great fortune. Nowadays, however, but few of our young men of fashion care for culture or literature. The word 'culture' is to them simply a slang expression, and a pretext to laugh at Boston. The great realm of art, of learning, of thought, is to the majority of New Yorkers of less importance than Delmonico's café or the foyer at the opera."

There are in France, according to the Gazette de France, 2,150 female authors and journalists and about 700 female artists. The provinces contribute most of the writers—about two-thirds; while Paris is represented in the same proportion among the artists. Among the writers, 1,000 are novelists, 200 are poets, 150 educational writers, and the rest writers of various kinds. The artists comprise 107 sculptors; the others are painters ranging over all branches of the pictorial art.

MINOR FAVORITES.

Genius.

Far out at sea the sun was high,
While veered the wind and flapped the sail;
We saw a snow-white butterfly
Dancing before the fitful gale—
Far out at sea.

The little stranger who had lost
His way, of peril nothing knew;
Settled awhile upon the mast,
Then fluttered o'er the waters blue—
Far out at sea.

Above, there gleamed the boundless sky;
Beneath, the boundless ocean shewn;
Between them danced the butterfly,
The spirit-life in this vast scene—
Far out at sea.

Away he sped, with skimming glee,
Dim, indistinct, now seen, now gone;
Night comes, with wind and rain, and he
No more shall dance before the sun—
Far out at sea.

He was unlike his mates, I ween;
Perhaps not sooner nor worse crossed;
But he hath felt and known and seen
A larger life and hope, though lost—
Far out at sea. —R. H. Horne.

The Thorn.

And close beside this aged thorn
There is a fresh and lovely sight,
A beauteous heap, a hill of moss
Just half a foot in height.
All lovely colors there you see,
All colors that were ever seen;
And mossy network, too, is there,
As if by hand of lady fair
The work had woven been;
And cups the darlings of the eye,
So deep is their vermilion dye.

Ah me! what lovely tints are there
Of olive-green and scarlet bright,
In spikes and branches, and in stars,
Green, red, and pearly white.
This heap of earth o'ergrown with moss
Which by the thorn you see,
So fresh in all its beauteous dyes,
Is like an infant's grave in size,
As like as like can be:
But never, never, anywhere,
An infant's grave was half so fair! —Wordsworth.

Wed.

White-robed she comes, my love, my own,
Yet purer than the robe she wears;
White flowers she holds, the fairest known,
Yet sweeter than the flowers she bears:
So white, so sweet, yet I could seek
And find, beneath that white veil bid,
Love's hue upon that gentle cheek,
Love's light beneath that long-fringed lid.

Clash out, brave bells! King far and wide,
And laugh the piping birds to scorn.
Fair kinsmen, kiss the bonnie bride,
She wanders far with me this morn;
And if her eyes are dim with tears,
I grudge them not their tender rain,
My love can chase the misty fears,
And kiss the sunbeam back again. —Hugh Conway.

The Nettle.

It thrives in meadows where the daisies grow,
In woodland depths, where slanting sunbeams fall,
In the grand, lordly park, and paddock small;
'Neath hawthorns where the children maying go,
On sunny slopes where summer flowerets blow.
It flaunts itself upon the garden wall,
By quiet footpaths, in old hedgerows tall,
And ways where busy feet pass to and fro.
Evil and good mingle mysteriously;
There is a taint upon all mortal joy;
Sunshine and shadow, gold with base alloy.
It must be so, 'tis Heaven's high decree.
Unguarded good: oh, aspiration vain!
Where pleasure blooms, there grows the nettle pain. —John Ashkam.

Cupid.

Within a forest, as I strayed,
Far down a summer autumn glade,
I found the God of Love;
His bow and arrows cast aside,
His lovely arms extended wide,
A depth of leaves above;
Beneath o'erarching boughs he made
A place for sleep in russet shade.
His lips, more red than any rose,
Were like a flower that overflows
With honey, pure and sweet;
And clustering round that holy mouth
The golden bees, in eager drouth,
Plied busy wings and feet.
They know, as every lover knows,
There's no such honeybloom that blows. —Edmund W. Gosse.

The Hero.

For what can balk a man who tries
The lists of Life with lance in rest,
The flame of courage in his eyes,
The strength of honor in his breast?
The crowd makes way for such a knight,
It cheers him as he charges past,
It helps him storm the grandest height,
And builds him—well—a tomb at last! —Maurice Thompson.

The Singer.

While with ambition's steadfast flame
He wastes the midnight oil,
And dreams high-throned on heights of fame
To rest him from his toil,
Death's Angel, like a vast
Above him spreads her wings,
And fans the embers of his
To ashes as he sings.

The Mistress of Tears is with us once again, and Baldwin's is dedicated for the next three weeks to sobs and sighs. I like to study the audience when Clara Morris is playing. The dress circle is filled with fashionables who have come to have "a good cry." Every face as it comes in takes on, in a greater or less degree, a look of anticipatory woe. Ladies even forget to look at one another's bonnets, sobered by the knowledge that behind the awful curtain Clara Morris is carefully making up her expressive face till it shall look as if internal agony had burned out of it every sign of color. The family circle has an air of spectators at a funeral, and the gallery restrains its levity and only hesitatingly whistles for the weeping to begin. Handkerchiefs are displayed with preliminary flourishes ostentatiously frequent, to cover the continuous applications to the eyes to follow in the course of the evening. Men, more hypocritical than women, begin before the curtain rises to show symptoms of a bad cold, so that when the tears well up to their eyes their neighbors may believe that it is the mucous membrane and not the lachrymal gland that is affected. The music falls into a quieter strain, that tells the play is about to begin. There is a movement of the curtain. The ladies give a final preliminary wipe to their eyes, the men pretend to put their handkerchiefs in their pockets, but don't. A burst of applause, and the Mistress of Tears, with five acts of misery in her mind, stands bowing before us. The actress who can, unaided by stage effect or circumstance of situation, completely control the emotion of an audience, must have reached the highest point of her art. I do not think it matters much what Clara Morris plays in San Francisco. She is the only star who rises so far above her story and its surroundings that all save herself is forgotten; consequently, we may comment on her version of Man and Wife quite apart from her performance of "Anne Sylvester." I think a much better play might be made of Wilkie Collins's novel, if Clara Morris is to play the leading part. No arrangement can possibly be put on the boards that suppresses "Geoffrey Delamayn." He is the character, and "Anne" is but a subjective figure. The whole misery of the woman arises from the brutal character of the man. But "Geoffrey Delamayn" may be subordinated and made use of merely as an instrument to produce situations for the heroine, though such treatment would render the novel only suggestive; otherwise the man must be the leading figure, in spite of Clara Morris. In the present version, carefully advertised as her own, "Anne Sylvester" is from first to last entirely subjective. She offers no chance for any display of the actress's highest power. Indeed, the strong situation of the piece is in the first act, the opening of the play, where she has the explanation with "Geoffrey." Even then, the view taken of the character is too purely pathetic, and leaves out the "temper" which frightened "Delamayn" into a marriage. After that she falls to a plane of subjective quiet misery, from which she never rises, even at the fall of the curtain. True, once, in dealing with the widow, she seems roused to a display which serves but to show the possibilities. But one waits after each scene for the occasion which is to bring forth the suppressed spirit in fury, only to find that a lucky stroke of paralysis kills the brute of a husband at the critical time, and frees the woman from what was apparently hopeless misery.

Clara Morris is capable of something infinitely greater than this. The charm of natural acting is even more prominent in her performance now than it ever was. Her pathos is as telling as ever. The voice that bears in every tone an agony that average people can only feel and not express, has all its old effect. Her eyes speak volumes, as they have always done. But if she is to select a story which goes beyond the bounds of probability, as all Wilkie Collins's do, we look for the situations to be equally strained, and the pathos equally exaggerated. Her "Anne Sylvester" is a perfectly natural woman. But "Geoffrey Delamayn" is an unnatural man, and the two characters do not harmonize. I admit that when an actress like Clara Morris is playing, I want to see her in a part which monopolizes the interest. Because, without disparagement to James O'Neill, the number of male actors who can support such a star in such a play is very limited. I do not think James O'Neill would ever play "Geoffrey Delamayn" from choice. It is nothing detrimental to his general excellence that he cannot act it. Physical attributes are necessary, of a kind so thoroughly unsuited to the generality of parts that it is well for him he does not possess them. And if he could act the part, it is just sufficiently emasculated to make it detrimental to the interest of a play specially arranged for the prominence of the heroine. If I except Mr. Bradley's "Sir Patrick Lundy" and Miss Carey's "Blanche," it may be said that the support was poor. Mr. Bradley's pompous and stiff politeness comes in somewhat appropriately in the Scotch lawyer, and it is unfortunately not always that it does. Miss Carey plays "Blanche" prettily, even if she does throw her arms around "dear Anne" as if the star's special trouble were forgotten on the stage. I wonder—and the surmise had many adherents in the house on Monday night—if the three gentleman companions of "Geoffrey Delamayn," who undertook to discuss the muscular theory with "Sir Patrick," were picked out of the Pedestrian League, or if they were the Lorettes who growed from the Standard and disguised anew. I never felt more comfortable when I see Lewis Morrison playing the role of the bashfulness, and I could never have told in the trial scene that it was solely as to whether he was married to "Anne" or "Blanche," had I judged from his behavior during the inquiry.

The Emelie Melville Opera Company opened at Bush Street Theatre on Monday night, in Maillart's three-act romantic opera of Les Dragons de Villars, renamed Friquet. They have not played anything else; but I should say this was the weakest piece in their repertoire. I suppose a company always requires some shaking down before a perfect performance can be expected. But I fancy that the admirable and energetic efforts Mr. Locke is making to establish his theatre on a high plane are being seriously interfered with by the want of a practiced and clever stage manager. The new company did not strike me as weak; it only struck me as improperly organized. It is, as we see it now, top-heavy. Mr. Peakes and Miss Melville struggle gallantly with the musical elements, and Mr. Barrows is comic all by himself. Miss Melville is too well known to require introduction. Mr. Peakes has been a favorite with us long ago, and will doubtless be again. The tenor is strange—a strange tenor all ways. He has an unfortunate stage-presence, more especially from the knees down. He is very tall, and excessively wooden. From under a hat which hides his face considerably, he scowls down on poor "Rose Friquet," in a very pretty costume, somewhat unsuggestive of the "Fanchon" part. His voice is evidently in a climatic fog at present, and I will not judge what it may be when his violent efforts bring out something definite. I should imagine he was new to the stage. I sat in some alarm, the other night, during the terrible scene in which he discards "Rose," lest some wag in the gallery should let off the "side-wheel steamer" gag at the interesting point of the pathetic. Miss Lily Post is an amateur, with all her success to be achieved. Mr. Barrows struggles in, at present, unfamiliar surroundings; and the chorus people have something to learn yet in the matter of stage business. Surely Miss Melville should have known that, although Friquet has not been played here before anybody to speak of—it was played, I think, somewhere on one occasion—it is not striking enough as an opera to cover the deficiencies of a new and comparatively amateur company. A perfectly strange company might put it forward as not being their strongest piece. But this is, to all intents and purposes, a local company. I believe that although Friquet is not a success, Les Cloches de Corneville will be, since the charms of the opera are not easily destroyed. Friquet is one of the prettiest works ever written. Maillart's music is throughout charming and finished; but it has no striking or popular melodies in it, and, delivered by any but trained singers and good actors, it loses its great merit—an even, light, sparkling beauty. It is not an ambitious work, aiming at grand and telling musical effects. So far as Miss Melville's performance goes, musically, it is as all know it must be, perfectly satisfactory. But she is not "Friquet" in dress or manner. Mr. Peakes has not yet got rid of grand opera recollections, and finds it difficult to fit himself to the light dragoon. I think he sings better than ever. There is enough evidence of talent in the organization, as it stands, to raise expectations of greater things when a little experience brings the component parts into harmony. And we have yet to hear the other tenor and Miss Montague, who is said to have a better voice than even the prima donna assoluta. But a stage manager seems to be most wanted.

Who would have believed five years ago that the California would have been given over to a mélange of high-class concerts and burlesque performances? I do not know what arrangement Mr. Colville has made with Wilhelmj; but it looks as if his speculation in taking the house at two hundred and fifty dollars a week was a lucky hit. I should not be astonished if Lawrence Barrett really did put in an appearance about the first of June. One thing is certain, that he has been negotiating in the East with parties, looking to a lease of the California Theatre. But, on the other hand, I know that when he was here last he found San Francisco and his favorite theatre much changed in all ways; and he had himself fears as to health in case of his attempting to rebuild its fallen prestige. Barrett is a great disciplinarian, a thoroughly admirable manager, but discipline has not always made him popular. There will be no question as to standard if he takes it; and I think he can get it if he wants it.

I hope when Herrmann revisits us he will have got beyond the parlor magic in his tricks. His inexhaustible bottle, and his second sight, are rather thin for the leading magician of 1880, especially when two mere Australians come and do the bird-cage trick. The cannon act will, I hope, be dropped from his bill. The other night the powder burned two holes in the handkerchief the human projectile wore to protect his face; as the two holes were exactly over his eyes, the result may be imagined had they not been protected. The spring was somewhat livelier than usual, and had Miss Pixley been the projectile, would have shot her clear into the gallery. This is too much of danger and too little of enjoyment. If Herrmann must do the "act," let him at least know how first.

Mr. Maguire will have a strong enough company by and by. He has added to it in the last week Mr. Max Freeman, a popular and strong German actor; and Miss Louise Beaudet, who came out a short time ago under engagement to support stars at the California, but who found herself left to support herself. I am afraid Mr. Freeman's accent is yet as strong as his acting. And it is inexplicable why Mr. Maguire should go to the expense of engaging him to support Miss Morris in Alize, when he had Mr. Bradley and Mr. Jennings to select from.

The Colville Company opened at the California on Tuesday night in Robinson Crusoe, playing three nights. On Monday night they commence a two weeks' engagement with Ill-treated Il Trovatore, a burlesque I remember some years ago in England as one of the most amusing I ever saw. Burlesque is the money-making article in amusements now. It is only beginning to be understood in this country, in its full force.

MOURZOUK.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

Mr. Wilhelmj is a very great violinist, and a singularly modest man. Mr. Wilhelmj, who has the same perfect command of type and printer's ink that he has of his bow and left hand (it can be had by any one who pays his bills), announces himself simply as "the greatest living violinist," which, when he might as well have put it, "the greatest who has ever lived," or "the one who will in all future ages be unapproachable," will surely be regarded—by his colleagues at least—as remarkably reserved and unpretentious. They—his colleagues—will naturally recognize in such a trumpeting of himself one of the usual characteristics of great artists; one that we miss in such lesser lights as Joachim, Sarasate, Rubenstein, Von Bulow, and the others of the second rank; but which is inseparable from true greatness, and goes far to prove in Mr. Wilhelmj's case a noble ambition to enlighten the world in art matters by informing it, through an authority that is beyond question, who is really the greatest of living violinists. I have not heard that Mr. Wilhelmj's opinion of the other violinists has been thus publicly pronounced in Germany or England—probably those benighted countries were not yet prepared to be told the whole truth. But I have no doubt that when told—by Mr. Wilhelmj—they will receive the statement as gospel, modifying the title of "greatest violinist" only by adding "and most modest."

Mr. Wilhelmj plays the violin superbly. He has a tone that for mere volume I have never heard equalled, that is generally pure and noble in quality, but that, without being at all cold, is very rarely sympathetic. His technique is so great that one does not think of it at all; he does everything with ease and certainty. He is seldom graceful; he impresses, but does not please. I have never heard a really fine violinist from whose playing I derived less pleasure. The sensuous quality he lacks entirely, and this element missed out of the compositions of Paganini and Ernst leaves them very uninteresting. In Bach it is not required, and the air (his own transcription) from the suite in D he plays nobly, even grandly. It is in this that we hear him at his best; in the nocturnes of Chopin at his worst. If they are to be played at all on the violin it is not with immensity of tone volume, but rather with warmth and delicacy of treatment that they must be made attractive. I, for my part, would prefer to have them as Chopin wrote them, for the piano. Au reste, Wilhelmj is a great violinist, whom to hear is to gain a new experience.

To me, Mr. Vogrich is the attractive element of the Wilhelmj Concerts. Not that he has made any impression whatever by his solo playing; his selections (Sonnambula and Wedding March of Liszt and Roberto Fantaia of his own) have been so manifestly concessions to the crowd, and what he neither cares much to do nor does well, that somehow I do not associate them with the artist whom I hear in the accompaniments and recognize in the beautiful composition played by Wilhelmj in the first concert. I think the playing of the operatic fantasies a mistake on Mr. Vogrich's part; there must be many other things that he would play better. The composition of the one on Roberto is certainly a mistake for the man who could write the "Bridal Songs." This is a really lovely composition, of beautiful form and warm, poetic color; the orchestral accompaniment was hardly more than suggested by the scrub band of Monday night, but even this suggestion was of something fresh and of beautiful quality. Mr. Vogrich seems to me to be a young man of great talent, who might be doing something better for art and himself than tagging about at the heels of a virtuoso filling up at the piano the orchestral accompaniments for a skeleton band, and playing the role of my man Friday. I hope we shall hear more of his compositions. To the musical portion of the audience they will always be of great interest.

Signora Marie Salvotti is a portly, uninteresting lady, who has the air of being placed on the programme as a concession to the sand-lot. She has several fine notes in her upper voice, but nothing to speak of in the lower, and seems to be blissfully unconscious of such trifles as phrasing or proper style. She sings in three languages, and can pronounce her vowels in none of them. She sings music of the German, Italian, and English schools, alike without any school. In short, Signora Salvotti is a singer who might go to any one of a half dozen local artists whom I could name, and learn many things about singing of which she does not seem to have the first idea.

The programme for the Piano-forte Recitals of Mr. Henry Ketten, to be given on Tuesday and Thursday evenings of next week, is announced, and contains many numbers of extraordinary interest. Besides a number of his own compositions, one of which—the Sérénade Espagnole—when played at one of the Patti concerts impressed me as quite exquisite, Mr. Ketten will play two of Beethoven's grandest sonatas, the great one in C major—called the Waldstein, and the "Appassionata" (Op. 57), which is one of the master's finest works, and which has not been heard in this city since it was played by Miss Muhlig. Of Schumann it is particularly the "Carneval" (Op. 9) that will attract students of piano-forte music; this composition—one of the most thoroughly Schumannesque of his earlier period—is rarely played in its entirety, and will be quite new here. It was first played in public by Liszt (I believe it was the first work of Schumann to find place on any concert programme), and afterward a great deal by Mme. Schumann, from whom I first heard it. Chopin, Liszt, Handel, Schubert, and Weber are also represented by larger and lesser works, and Mr. Ketten will have a fine opportunity of showing us exactly what he can do in a wide and varied range of piano-forte literature.

O. W.

Miss Morris's bids fair to be an expensive engagement. She plays three weeks now; then the stock comes in in Forget-me-not and A Fool and His Money, a play written by Byron for Toole in London. After that Miss Morris plays three weeks more, and it may be extended to ten weeks altogether. Terms, two thousand dollars a week, and her own and her husband's expenses from and to New York.

There is quite an atmosphere of romance enveloping the recent encounter between Russian and German officers at Kalish. In outline, the story is as follows: Three colonels of the Russian army and two attachés of the court of St. Petersburg were dining with some officers of the Uhlans. During dinner politics were discussed over some rather heavy red wine, and one of the Germans made a disparaging allusion to Russia's behavior during the recent intestine disturbances in that unhappy country. One of the Russian colonels felt called upon to reply, and did so with such uncalculated bitterness that swords were in the hands of all present before any one was well aware what the trouble was all about. At this critical moment the door was flung open and a young girl sprang betwixt the flashing blades, and exclaimed: "Gentlemen, before you bring upon sleeping Europe the horrors of a needless war, I pray you drink with me these bottles of Pomeroy and Greno—the most kindly of modern champagnes." The swords were sheathed, and the two rather shame-faced brawlers "returned them to their muttons." The trial of the new wine was an instant success. The cup which gladdens went round and round, and amidst them the fair young peace-maker sat smiling through her tears. There can be no reasonable doubt that the exclusive use of "Pomeroy and Greno" would end in a few months most of our serious political differences. This delicious wine, which is now the favorite of the bloods in Europe, has lately been introduced into our market, and can be had of all first-class grocers and dealers.

There can be no more varied and no more beautiful panorama than is unfolded when one looks northward from the Presidio hill. Until recently comparatively few of our citizens had seen this panorama at its best. The completion of the California Street Hill Railroad, however, opened this splendid outlook to all our citizens. It is a walk of but a very few minutes from the western terminus of this road to some eminence where the Golden Gate, the Sausalito hills, and the shining throat of the bay lie unfolded in all their beauty almost at one's feet. The backward glance at the city, too, is always fine; especially so when the afternoon sun has painted all the western windows with flame, and untied the pallid skyline of the Alameda hills with purple. One secret of the success which attends the management of this popular road may be found in the respectful attentiveness of its employees. And perhaps the neat, distinctive uniform they wear has something to do with this also. Of course if the road had and rolling stock were less satisfactorily put together, and if the scenery along the ride and immediately beyond it were less picturesque, the road would be less popular. But when all these good qualities are united with almost perfect management there is little left to be asked for it.

No amateur pianist should miss hearing Ketten in his piano recitals.

The Condign.

When the angry passions gathering in my mother's face I see
And she leads me to the bedroom—gently lays me on her knee,
Then I know that I will catch it, and my flesh in fancy itches.
As I listen to the patter of the shingle on my breeches.
Every tinkle of the shingle has an echo and a sting,
And a thousand burning fancies into active being spring.
And a thousand bees and hornets 'neath my coat-tail seem to swarm
As I listen to the patter of the shingle, oh, so warm!

THE WÜRLINGEN CHAPEL.

From the German of Lenau.

Airy as a light canoe
On a green wave's rounded line,
Poses, outlined in the blue,
On a hill, a chapel shrine.

Once, at twilight waning dim,
Through its vacant aisles I stole.
Sacred song and vesper hymn
Whispered, dream-like, to my soul.

And the Mother's picture there,
On the altar, seemed to gaze—
Seemed, in sorrow faintly fair,
Pondering o'er the ancient days.

Redly comes the morning sun,
Fondly falls the evening ray,
On the pictured sorrowing one,
Human feet here seldom stray.

Gently here a secret power
Held my thoughts in magic thrall;
'Twas as if at that lone hour
Benediction fell o'er all.

Warmly bright the sunlight laves
Chancel, wall, and time-worn floor,
And the hosts of grass-grown graves
Silent lie forever more.

Peace of autumn dwells in love
Where those graves forgotten lie;
Yonder, in the blue above,
Summer wild birds southward fly.

Slumber, silence evermore,
Many a mound is sunken deep;
And the crosses topple o'er,
Nameless graves long lost in sleep.

And the trees at evening mild
Scatter leaves upon them all,
As a tired, sleep-worn child
Softly lets its loved toys fall.

Here is all my earthly pain,
As a mist-cloud, swept away;
Here sweet Death, in summbrous chain,
Holds the souls beneath its sway.

BERKELEY, January, 1880.

JANE PENN.

WOMAN'S ART.

How Kate Managed a Little Love Affair.

The long anticipated evening had come at last—the grand gala night of the "Brunswick House Hop." From the windows of a certain stately mansion fronting on Montague Street, in the City of Churches, the lights were gleaming and flashing from casement to casement with that marvelous rapidity which I have never known those particular gas-burners to indulge in save when their fair occupants were personally interested in some such festive event. In the second-story front chambers, on this particular night, were, gracefully and variously grouped, three of the most beautiful women in Brooklyn, all busied in the bewildering ecstasies of a woman's grande toilette de bal.

Before the mirror stood the half-undraped figure of a fairy-like blonde, a lovely being, of a noble old French family—the beautiful Eugenie de Longueville. Ah! blood will tell, meet it where you may! This transplanted scion of an ancient house bore evidence incontrovertible of her noble descent in her every feature, in her slightest gesture. What wears the beautiful little queen to-night? Ah! I see the snowy drapery beside her—pearls and pale azure—clouded with its overfall of graceful, dreamlike illusion. Had she ransacked the wardrobe of Titania she could not have made a more becoming choice. In a large easy-chair by the window, half-veiled by a cloud of natural, wavy, ebony hair, completely at the mercy of those graceful fingers of her French maid, and intently pouring over the last new novel, sat the mirth-loving figure of Kate Dalton. What is there in that fated cognomen, I wonder, that makes all Kates such perfect torments to the female portion of their friends—such maddening, perfectly irresistible, loving, teasing, torturing, killing, electrifying, mischievous, fun-adoring, defying, lawless, unconscionable little witches to the male portion of humanity? Now, I'll leave it to any judge of human nature and its frailties to decide, if Kates, as a genus, are not the most uncircumnavigable torments in creation. Well, Kate Dalton, specifically, was no exception to the general rule. If Kate had a forte more than another, it was making up love-matches—that is, if her celerity in breaking them up (when she made up her wilful little mind that the couple were unsuited to each other) was not fully equal to it. Kate was a great genius, I'll admit, and did everything well that she undertook; but the marvelous ease and rapidity with which she kindled the torch of Hymen in securing hopeless cases, and snuffed it out in others, was truly astonishing. One would have thought she had taken Love's quiver on commission, and went about the world drumming up customers for Cupid, she was so thoroughly in earnest about it. Those most incurable cases, even engagements of some seven years' standing, yielded to the violence of Kate's remedies.

The third occupant of the apartment was a New Orleans belle, a cousin and visitor of Kate's—a charming little semi-brunette, and one scarcely excelled in coquetry even by Kate herself. A spicy little belle was Georgina Clayton, and countless were the broken hearts which had thrown themselves under the wheels of her juggernaut car of Vanity. Not only at the North either, but the Southern soil was red with the blood of her victims. One whose heart had again and again been pierced with the barbed arrow of loving disappointment—one cousin and lover—Charles L'Estrange, a wealthy Louisianaian, had followed his charmed and charming syren mistress to the North, some three weeks since, and proposed following her even to "The Brunswick House Hop;" but the little lady had other views of an escort for the evening. Kate Dalton, Kate's eldest brother—or Lieut. Dalton, as he knew him—had petitioned for that overwhelming and it was upon his arm—the handsomest fellow in the navy, as every one acknowledged—that Miss Clayton intended to lean as she entered the ball-room. Ah, me! the two cousins were terrible rivals! Well, to continue my story: I had concluded to call over and see how the girls were getting along with their arrangements upon this certain evening, after my duties at the institute had closed. I was a sort of cousin, also, of Kate's, and knew the beautiful trio intimately. I came upon them in the position I have just described.

"Well, girls, how are you? All going to the hop?" was my salutation, as I entered their magical bed-room.

"Well, I rather reckon so," was Kate's characteristic reply. "Don't you see the various chrysalises, child, scattered round about the floor, and so forth?" pointing to the figure before the mirror.

The carpet was one parterre of rejected flowers, feathers, jewelry, and miscellaneous articles of wearing apparel.

"Oh, that's Eugenie's doings; she never can dress herself like any ordinary Christian," resumed Kate, carelessly. "When she finally resigns the mirror to some of us unrobbed competitors, we have to have a call of the house, as they say in Washington, to clear away the rejected finery."

Eugenie laughed sweetly, as she said:

"Why, Kate, do stop your nonsense. I'm sure there's room for both of us; but I didn't know you'd got your hair arranged yet. Now I am ready, if some one will only lace my dress for me."

So saying, she moved gracefully away, a swaying mass of beauty.

I volunteered to perform that service, and was instantly engaged in my evolutions with that silken cord over those ivory shoulders, down to that taper waist.

We were startled, just at this stage of the proceedings, by a loud ring of the front-door bell. It was repeated twice before it was answered, and then Kate hurriedly exclaimed:

"Oh, Lily, would you mind? I've sent Loue over to New York, and all the rest of the servants have leave to go to a wake. I don't suppose there's one of them heard the bell; and it must be somebody that wants to come in. I am expecting the houquets from Reid's and that may be them. Marie might go, but she is just in the midst of this Artesian braid, and if she lets one strand fall she will spoil a whole hour's work. There it goes again! If you would go, Lily, like a good girl, I'd be so much obliged to you."

"Certainly, Kate, if Eugenie can spare me," I replied; and, receiving an assenting nod, I hurried down stairs. It was a damp, foggy evening—indeed, though I was not aware of it, it had commenced to rain. I opened the door suddenly, and saw a shrouded figure standing on the steps before me. In his hand he held a bouquet.

"Oh! the flowers!" I exclaimed. "By Lieut. Dalton's order, I, guess?"—at the same time confidently grasping those in his hand, "Where are the others?"

To my surprise they were forcibly retained, and a damp, gloved hand was laid upon mine, as he added to them a little note, and said, in a quick, impatient tone, between his set teeth:

"This is one bouquet only—for Miss Georgiana Clayton, with the compliments of Mr. Charles L'Estrange."

He put them in my hand, and sprang down the steps. The moment he had spoken, I knew the tones of his voice. We had met before, under far different circumstances, but where and when, it matters little, reader, now, to tell you. I hurried up stairs, but before I had reached the bedroom door a second ring warned me to descend. This proved to be the basket of bouquets from Reid's, and, overburdened with floral emblems, I again began the ascent. My return was greeted with shouts of joy.

"Who was the first ring?" they all queried.

"A bouquet and a man," was my answer.

Kate happened to be standing by me, and before I answered more at length I whispered, holding up the first bouquet for her to see:

"Isn't it a shame that such an exquisite bouquet as this should go a-hegging, for of course Georgie can't carry both emblems—wear the honors of the houses of Dalton and L'Estrange—both in one evening? That would, indeed, be equal to the old-time 'Wars of the Roses.'"

"What?" echoed Kate, in a sharp whisper. "Did Charles L'Estrange come out this rainy night to bring these flowers andillet-doux to Georgie, knowing that she was going with Frank? Come, now, I like that. Charles is cut out for a self-denying husband, and he worships that little flirt of a cousin of mine. I've had my eye on him, and I just love Charlie. She shan't quite kill him. Let's see. What do you say, Lily, to getting up a counter-irritation? Physicians approve of that in extremely obstinate cases, and she is—well, in short, as Mr. Micawber says, I've long had Georgie on my list of incurables. Jealousy is a powerful awakener of love, or prober of its depth. I've hit it—let me alone for expedients. She hasn't seen it yet, you say? Well, then, give me Frank's bouquet, and I'll just pin this absurd littleillet-doux to the one he chose; and all I'll require of you is, my darling Lily, just to keep dark, and watch the result."

In an instant the metamorphosis was effected, and the white-winged love-note of Charles L'Estrange fluttered by its satin ribbon from the crimson-hued bouquet of Lieut. Dalton. Not till then did Kate allow me to answer their clamorous questions, which I did by suddenly throwing lightly into the lap of Georgie Clayton the bouquet and letter, as arranged. Georgie blushed nearly crimson (for a practiced brunette that was a bad sign, as Kate whispered); and when I had repeated the message—"For Miss Georgiana Clayton, with the compliments of Mr. Charles L'Estrange"—as agreed, she crumpled up the note in her hand, and threw it, with the flowers, on the bed.

"I shan't wear it at all. I prefer the one Frank has chosen," said she—unconscious innocent!—taking up the identical flowers which he had sent, and smelling them rapturously, to hide her confusion. "Don't you, Kate and Lily?" she added, turning toward the place in which we stood. "Just see this exquisite circle of orange huds! None of yours have that!" she added, triumphantly—which was, indeed, the fact; they had not.

Kate could scarcely keep her face; but she urged, hypocritically:

"Won't Charles feel hurt at your refusal?"

"I don't know, indeed; nor do I care," returned Georgie haughtily, as she moved off with the bouquet.

"Ah! my lady, I'll fix you nicely for that falsehood!" Kate whispered mischievously; and so it passed unheeded.

I heard from Kate that she had suggested her plan to Charles, in the course of the evening, and had obtained his grateful concurrence. The potent spell of jealousy proved all-sufficient, as Kate had foreseen; and by means of an unseen rival—a certain "Nellie," an old flame of Charles, and Frank's, too, for that matter, as Kate wickedly added, who was described as one of the handsomest creatures and most fascinating that she (Kate) had ever seen—in the course of the winter, it came about that Georgie reacted the qui vive of tortured love; and it was not until last summer, at Saratoga, that Kate, thinking her sufficiently punished, permitted her to make the acquaintance of the far-famed "Nellie," who proved to be one of the very handsomest arrangements in the world—a moustached Creole—a boyhood's friend of both Charles and Frank, at Yale College, of the name of Mr. Nelson St. Clare, but always among his friends, "Nellie St. Clare."

So ended this fearful campaign of eight months. It was the last one Georgie ever waged, for the following winter saw her the bride of Charles L'Estrange, while "Nellie St. Clare" contented himself with me. L. M. STANLEY.

An "Argonaut" Lie Nailed.

We cut the following report of an interview with Mrs. Scott-Siddons from the Indianapolis Sentinel:

Mrs. Scott-Siddons left this morning for Louisville. A Sentinel reporter said to her: "An article appeared recently in the San Francisco ARGONAUT, charging that you gave your husband a large sum of money to rid yourself of him, knowing that the money would eventually send him to a drunkard's grave, and adding that he was a confirmed inebriate. Is it true?"

Mrs. S.—"It is a delicate matter, and one that I would prefer not to touch upon; but the reason I am compelled to work on, year after year, without stopping, I attribute to my unfortunate husband's gross mismanagement of my business affairs. I have been receiving, for the past eleven years, upon an average of $250 per night, for six nights in each week, and during seven months in the year; and of all this vast sum of money that I have earned there is scarcely anything left at all. It is utterly incomprehensible to all what has become of this large sum of money, and I do not know, never having had the handling of a pound, all the time placing utter confidence in my husband, not knowing his habits of intoxication. Upon my arrival in England, in May last, we separated by mutual consent, I giving him a valuable piece of property, worth probably thirty thousand pounds, located in New Zealand, which was the net profits of my three years' engagement in Australia. It is not true that I gave him money which he could use to the destruction of his life in purchasing the beverage. I gave him only enough money to bear his expenses back to that country, and no more. The article in the ARGONAUT was unjust, and this statement is the first I have made in contradiction of it."

This amuses. We do not happen to remember the article it "answers"—the relations between Mrs. Scott-Siddons and her husband may have been important enough to write a paragraph about; they are certainly not important enough to fix it in the writer's memory. But if there is anything "unjust" in stating that the lady gave her husband money to be off, when in fact she only gave him valuable property in New Zealand, we hasten to apologize. A lady who can live six years with a drunken husband, who is all the time consuming every penny of her "vast" earnings, and not be aware of his habits of intoxication, can not, of course, be supposed to know that a man can drink up a ranch as easily as he can swill twenty-dollar pieces.

Which Was the Nobler?

It is hoped that the following fact will find its way into the columns of the religious press, and that credit will not be withheld from the ARGONAUT for its earnest desire to recognize the best which is in humanity, no matter where it may turn up, no matter how it may be overgrown with the weeds of folly and the moss of neglect: Two journalists, both generous, brave, brilliant, and industrious, were pacing Kearny Street together after their frugal dinner. Each had a family, neither had a wife. Both were economical, both were poor, both were philosophical. Their after-dinner chat was chiefly about doing. The junior was a bon-vivant; his fellow was a humble citizen of Gourmandie. Their joint repast had cost six bits. 'Neath the shadow of a gas-lamp lurked a lean pedestrian, who accosted them in piteous tones, and prayed that he might break his three days' fast at their expense. Said the bon-vivant: "My heart aches for you, hear-eyed man of the people, and I would cheerfully aid you but for one compelling reason: it would be wrong. The world is over-populated, my poor man. Malthus said so, at some length, several years ago; and various clever people, including Mistress Annie Besant, have said so at some more length very recently. It is plainly to be seen that unless we help you, you will perish ere to-morrow morn, and he laid 'neath bleak Lone Mountain's sterile sand at public expense—just three dollars and six bits. Thus will the world be the gainer, and ourselves nothing out. It is hard, poor man, but philosophy knows not any weakness. Good night." The friends passed on, but ere they left the lank pedestrian in his niche of shade, the elder slipped a coin within the poor man's clammy palm. A muffled "bless you" fell about their ears. "Is it possible," said the bon-vivant sternly, "that you gave that fellow anything?" "It was my 'queer' pocket-piece," said the other calmly.

New York is to have a "Children's Carnival" on the 9th of next month, of which the Telegram says: "It promises to be an interesting display. After the reception of Prince Carnival and suite by the Goddess of Liberty, will follow several national dances. Then the 'Four Seasons,' the 'Twelve Months,' a 'Harvest Festival,' and a grand tableau. The ball for adults will open at ten with a dance, entitled 'La Madrilaine,' composed by Professor Marwig, in which the ladies and gentlemen participating will appear in Spanish court costume. The proceeds of the Children's Carnival will go to the aid of the 'Building Fund of the Western Dispensary.' Where is Charlie to come in?"

An old Scotch lady was told that her minister used notes, but would not believe it. Said one, "Gang into the gallery and see." She did so, and saw the written sermon. After the luckless preacher had concluded his reading on the last page, he said, "But I will not enlarge." The old woman called out from her lofty position, "Ye canna, ye canna, for your paper's give out."

All know how unsatisfactory Foreign Black Silks are in both cutting and wearing shiny. We give you a reliable test below that will give you a perfect guide in selecting silk material for actual wear.

JOHN D. CUTTER & CO.'S

RAVEN BLACK AMERICAN SILKS are now being retailed by the following established firms:

Doane & Henshelwood, San Francisco.
M. W. Henderson, Portland, Oregon.
O. A. Hale & Co., San Jose.
H. C. Taft & Co., Oakland.

THE TEST.

Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulteration, and will either cut or wear shiny.

VOL. VI. NO. 5.

SAN FRANCISCO, JANUARY 31, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

During the last year 78,811 books were taken from the Mercantile Library. Of this number, 55,305 were books of romance—novels; 4,584 were juvenile works; of travels, biography, belles-lettres, and poetry, 8,297; of science and history, 5,589. From the Mechanics' Institute Library and the Odd Fellows' Library about the same proportion of novel-reading and about the same of science and history. And yet, in the face of this record, we have established a free library, where books and reading-rooms and lights are to be gratuitously supplied to the reading public at the cost of the tax-payers, and the cost is enormous. We presume there are people who think novels, juvenile tales, and poetry are indispensable; that their perusal elevates the tone of society, improves the morals of the people, and contributes to their welfare and progress. There are some people, perhaps a small number, who are not altogether convinced that novel-reading is either a great moral lever or that it elevates the readers to that higher plane. But how many of our substantial tax-payers are there who think the good accomplished compensates for the money expended? The same class of persons that has gone crazy upon the question of educating the masses, that favors cosmopolitan schools, that thinks the languages, "accomplishments," and higher branches of education should be taught in free common schools, is firmly convinced that free libraries are indispensable to the moral welfare and social elevation of the masses. We do not happen to agree with these people, and take the liberty of suggesting that there is or ought to be a limit to municipal robbery in this direction. We take the liberty of suggesting whether, instead of economy in the direction of the hard-worked, conscientious, and useful female primary teachers, who toil in the most laborious and vexatious department of education, and whose salaries do not afford them more money than is necessary to live well, dress well, and behave well, it would not be better to let the axe fall upon educational extravagances. We recognize as one of the highest duties of organized society that it should contribute, and that generously, to assist in the education of the poor. It should provide for the poor every facility for acquiring the rudiments of an English education. We would give them school-houses, teachers, and books till the last child should be provided for. In addition to this we would provide, as a reward for diligence and as a prize to the ambitious boy or girl, a scholarship in the University of California. We would aid toiling scholars along the hard, unroyal road of learning, and enable them to reach the highest position to which their genius or their talent might enable them to climb. But will any one inform the writer, who is able to educate his own children, why his neighbors should be taxed for their education? Why should not property be taxed to feed and clothe and furnish medicine and doctors and soap for his children, as well as to furnish them knowledge? Health, cleanliness, and clothes are as necessary and as indispensable as education. The sensible people of San Francisco are making a serious effort to relieve themselves from some of their almost insupportable burdens. The extravagances that have grown to become a part of our educational system are unendurable. We are paying more than a million of dollars annually, and the community is not reaping an adequate return for the expenditure. And just now our Board of Education is making an earnest effort at retrenchment. We think it has begun at the wrong end. We think it the height of absurdity and folly to reduce the salary of any primary female teacher so long as there is a cosmopolitan school where French, German, music, and drawing are being taught. It is a crime, it is cowardly, to do the one thing without doing the other. No school director shall make us think he is either honest or intelligent while he is hammering away at schoolmasters, who can not vote, and refusing to attack male teachers, carpenters, janitors, and German professors, who can vote. It is saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung. We remember when once the cosmopolitan schools were in danger of being abolished, that a public meeting was held by Germans, who, in the German language, protested against the abolition of German schools. We remember the Germans and demagogues and politicians and schoolmasters who got up to the meeting. And while we were indignant that this foreign voting population had the audacity and the cheek to make so outrageous a demand, we were more indignant at the cowardice and political pusillanimity of the Americans who submitted to it. There is a shameful lack of American sentiment and pride and courage shown by Americans in submitting to the exactions of our foreign-born citizens in more respects than one. There is an argument in favor of teaching religion in the public schools. From the religious standpoint of the Roman Catholic it is a very strong argument; and if we accept the predicate upon which the Catholic clergy and the Catholic parent make that argument, it is unanswerable. But there is no argument that can be honestly and intelligently made in favor of teaching French children French, or German children German, or any body's children music and drawing. The Irish number nearly one-third of our population; they pay large taxes; they have innumerable children; and should they demand that the Celtic, or old Irish language, be taught in our schools, it would be as reasonable as to demand French or German. Only two classes desire either of these languages taught: Germans or French, because it is their mother tongue, and rich Americans, because it is not theirs. It is a crime against patriotism. It is robbing the tax-payer. It is treason and grand larceny. It is upheld by schoolmasters who make a living in the pursuit, and by an appeal to the sentimental side of those who pay no taxes. A free public library in some quiet, out-of-the-way corner, from which sensible and instructive books might be distributed to those who desired to read there, might be not out of place. But an expensive, central hall, where luxurious desks and chairs are provided for empty-headed men and women to read romance, and money expended for the purchase of trashy novels, are good for nobody, unless for the landlord who draws the rent, the librarians, secretaries, assistant librarians and assistant secretaries and janitors who draw salaries, and for the gas company that has its lightning calculator in the cellar figuring up gas bills.

Mrs. Clara Foltz, the lady lawyer, called at our office and gave us a vicarious lashing because we think, and thinking said, that to permit women to vote in school matters would turn our common schools over to the Roman Catholic clergy and transform them from a secular to a clerical institution. Such a law would, in ten years, make every free school of all our great commercial cities a nursery of sucking priests, and in a generation our school books would be, like those of France, interspersed with Ave Marias and Pater noster. And this is a very good place for us to say that we would as willingly see our schools Roman Catholicized as Protestantized. We would not say an unkind word—willfully—to hurt the feelings of any conscientious man or woman, Roman or Protestant, or endeavor to shake their religious belief or make sport of the dogmas of their faith. We do not mean to ever question the right of any religious denomination or class to enjoy the utmost freedom of conscience. We concede to them the privilege of educating their children as they please; but when it comes to taxing us and our property to make a Catholic or a Protestant, we declare it a robbery, and will fight against it as we would fight any other political swindle. When the German or French peasant claims the right to tax us and our property to teach his children French or German we say he steals, and when any American parent votes money from the public treasury to educate his children in the ornamental branches we say he is a knave and is feloniously taking that which does not belong to him.

If we should make any exception concerning woman suffrage it would be in the direction of allowing them to vote upon the local option law. All women would be sound in this respect. Intemperance is the great calamity of the world. The manufacturing and selling of alcoholic drinks is the great crime of the age. If women could be permitted to vote, public sentiment would in a single decade so shape itself that penal laws would put an end to alcoholic traffic. Could this be done (and it could be), the world would enter upon a new era; nearly all the crime, the poverty, and the cruelty would disappear, and we should enter upon a practical millennium. The writer attended St. Bridget's Church on Van Ness Avenue on Sunday evening, and heard the Rev. Father Rooney, an eloquent and earnest Dominican priest of the Roman Catholic Church, deliver a most excellent sermon upon temperance. It has rarely been our privilege to hear the subject better treated, and we have no recollection of a more fervid, earnest, and exhaustive presentation of argument and fact than was given on this occasion. The Catholic Church is taking the lead of all other churches in this reformation. It is, we believe, doing a great deal of good. It might, we think, be imitated by our Protestant preachers to great advantage. Sermons upon doctrinal faith might, we think, be oftener dispensed with, and in their place such exhortation made as Father Rooney gave his people on Sunday night at St. Bridget's on the avenue. Six hundred million dollars annually expended in the United States of America for alcoholic drink; fifteen dollars a year to every man, woman, and child; six hundred thousand drunkards in a population of forty millions; sixty thousand men and women dying annually from the effects of intoxicating drink! A whisky-mill on every corner of our streets, producing poverty, crime, disease, and death, mostly kept by foreigners; great beer factories in every town, mostly kept by Germans; great distilleries in every State, mostly owned by politicians! And then the crowning shame and disgrace lies in the fact that an intelligent, civilized, and Christian government derives a great part of its revenue from the manufacture of liquor, and every city and township a large part of their revenue from its sale at retail! Thus government and organized society live upon the business that makes criminals and paupers. To license the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, by means of which six hundred million dollars of money is annually expended and sixty thousand lives annually are sacrificed, is one of those strange anomalies that are unaccountable in a republican government except upon the hypothesis that a majority of the males are brutes, or knaves, or fools, or a mixture of all these things. If women could vote whether Messrs. Oulton & Shultz should make alcohol out of potatoes and Mr. Dix should retail it to the poor in the writer's neighborhood, Oulton, Shultz, and Dix would soon be driven to some more honorable and humane pursuit. There is not a sober and virtuous woman in San Francisco who would not vote, under a local option law, to close all the distilleries, breweries, jobbing liquor stores, retail grogeries, and deadfalls throughout the city. A temperance reformation will never be brought about by temperance societies, nor by moral suasion, nor in any other way than by the passage and enforcement against the manufacturer and trader in alcoholic drinks of penal laws. We should be glad to have the Constitution so amended that women might vote upon this question, and we suggest its introduction by some honest representative from the country who does not stand in awe of the gang of criminals who live by robbing and murdering their fellow-mortals.

In this, our lecture on temperance and woman's rights, we have intentionally omitted any allusion to wine-producing or wine-drinking, because we believe that the vine crop of California is destined to be the great reformer in this respect. We look forward to the time when the consumption of pure wine by the people of California will wean them from the beastly habit of drinking alcoholic liquors and the less brutalizing custom of swilling beer. We look forward to the time when this great and profitable industry will array itself with the temperance movement; or perhaps we might better express ourselves by saying that we look forward to the time when temperance people will divest themselves of that narrow prejudice that looks upon pure wine as the enemy and not the ally of a temperance movement. It is our observation from travel in foreign lands that there is less drunkenness in the vine-growing districts of Europe than in any other part of that country; and when we contrast what we have observed among the vineyards of France, Spain, and Germany with the alcohol-drinking people of Scotland, Belgium, and Sweden, and the beer-drinkers of England, Hungary, and North Germany, we can not doubt that pure wine is the real temperance apostle of the world. If every drinking man in this city of San Francisco would furnish himself with a bottle of pure wine, would accustom his palate to its taste and his stomach to its use, and, instead of drinking it at the bar-room or corner grocery, would take it home and consume it with his dinner and with his wife and children, we should have a condition of things such as prevails in no city that we have ever visited. We should become a temperance people in that broad, liberal sense that authorizes a temperate indulgence in that which is good for our use.

Mr. Yates, one of whose pen-and-ink sketches will be remembered by visitors to the rooms of the Art Association, is working intelligently at his studio in the Mercantile Library at etching, in which noble art he is the pioneer on this coast. The difficulties to be overcome are very great: Mr. Yates has not only to improvise his mechanical appliances and instruct himself in their use, but must, in a manner, create the demand he aims to supply. He has an added obstacle in his own inexperience, but he is young, full of enthusiasm, and full of hope. He is now engaged on a portrait of Dr. Stebbins, which promises exceedingly well. A small portion of the money wasted in charity if devoted to the encouragement of such endeavor as this would do a deal of good. In connection with this subject we are reminded of some very creditable pen-and-ink sketches shown to us the other day by a young man named Gerberding—a dozen little panel pictures, two of which were really very creditable. It is hardly worth while to make pen-and-ink sketches; Mr. Gerberding should learn etching, an art which is the lineal descendant of pen-and-ink, with finer capacities and the supreme advantage of multiplication. The infancy of etching in this city is threatened with this peril: artists who have failed on canvas are pretty sure to dabble in acid, with the mistaken notion that success is thus more easily achieved. Their work will, of course, be worse than that which they did before, and they will do this at an injury that they failed to inflict upon the other. It is the toss of a copper whether our people will have etching at all, and a little execrable work may be just sufficient to give them a pig-headed obstinacy of aversion which it may require years of good work by good men to remove.

The death of Edmond L. Gould carries regret to all who knew him. He was learned in his profession of the law, genial in his social intercourse, one of those against whose name we write the word gentleman, giving to it that full, broad sense that expresses birth, education, deportment, and an honorable and useful life. Mr. Gould was, some forty years ago, a resident of the city of New Orleans, contemporaneous with those exceptionally bright minds, distinguished lawyers, and politicians for whom New Orleans was so celebrated. In daily intercourse with the class to which we refer, Mr. Gould, then young and impressionable, brought away with him personal recollections of Sargent S. Prentiss, Pierre Soulé, Judah P. Benjamin, the elder Janin, and others, that had proved invaluable had he written them as he was fond of telling them, in order that they might have been preserved. The fund of story, anecdote, and incident concerning the forensic efforts, the deeds, the political entanglements of these men, was inexhaustible and to the last degree interesting, presenting a phase of life and Southern society that has now passed away, and so far as we know, is not historically recorded. Mr. Gould was under promise of a series of papers upon this topic to the ARGONAUT. His death was from paralysis, sudden and altogether unexpected.

A young gentleman of this city was advised to bury his bad habits. He did so: he procured a bottle of aqua ammonia and a box of cigars, put them in a small coffin, and buried them deep in the earth. He felt so bad that he was obliged to be drunk, dug up the remains, drank the whisky, and now looks upon himself as a reformed man.

TWO SONGS.

From the German of Heine.

Thou seemest like a flower,
So pure and fair and kind;
But, watching thee, a sadness
Deep in my heart I find.

It is to me like a whisper,
It cometh I know not from where:
A prayer that God will hold thee
So pure and kind and fair.

In the wonderful month of May,
While buds and flowers are springing,
There is down deep within my heart
A little love song singing.

In the wonderful month of May,
While birds are homeward turning,
There groweth up within my heart
A longing and a yearning.

OAKLAND, January, 1880.

R. B.

A MONTEREY TEACHER.

Near the coast of Monterey there is a deserted hut on a barren hillside, gray with sagebrush and yellow with long, rain-washed furrows. Year after year the tireless ocean wears nearer, and after a while the black and splintered timbers will slip out of sight, hiding their memories and their grief. Although the immediate vicinity is so desolate, yet the shore-lines, extending north and south, sweep in placid, mellow curves, growing fairer and more ethereal, until they poise on the very verge of disappearance—great clusters of mingling color melting sweetly into the sea and rising gently into the sky. As for the ocean, no fairer waters ever gleamed across the Vesuvian bay; no more perfect sunsets ever shone for Turner.

This weather-beaten hut was, twenty years ago, the home of old Gilbert Mayne, and if you will examine the southern slope of the adjacent ravine you will doubtless discover traces of the former garden, where cabbages and tomatoes, long ago run wild, are struggling to hold their own with fernbrake and blackberry vines. Gilbert fished occasionally, in a curiously dingy boat, and his brown-fisted lad Wilbur pried abalones off the rocks at low-tide, or stood on the outer points of rock to fish in the surf, throwing his heavily-weighted line far beyond the white crest of the advancing wave, and sometimes catching fish as fast as he could draw them in. It was a free, hearty boyhood, which influenced his whole after life. He knew the rocks and the waves, the forms of the clouds, the signs of the weather, the plants which cling to barren places, the flowers of the deep and moist ravines, the bright-hued shells, and the strange sea creatures. All this was, in its way, education, and a fit preparing for the world's work. Then, too, he studied at night, under his father's direction; for this brown and grizzled old man was no common, coarse fisherman, but one whose proud life had been full of romance, mystery, and adventure, and who, sad for the loss of the one woman he had loved, had hidden himself in this lonely place, and covered his warm heart with an affected cynicism. People often do that; but they are seldom brave enough to go apart and fight it out. Living by one's self is not to be recommended, but it is an eminently respectable business.

Wilbur Mayne grew up a simple, kindly, thoughtful, imaginative youth, loving his father with a wordless devotion, and looking forward with hope and desire to the gifts and battles of the world. Sooner than any one guessed, his boyhood's life came to a sudden end. There were no more long rambles with his father over the brown and golden hills and up the gray, distant peaks in search of specimens or collecting plants for the herbarium; no more sailing upon the purple sea, and out through the soft twilight, and home again under the twinkling stars; no more long, wise talks of life and of the complex world—for old Gilbert Mayne was dead, and his boy had the battle to fight alone.

Well, never mind exactly how it was done. In California, and particularly in the Salinas Valley, at that time, a dozen or more years ago, there were ways enough. When Wilbur was twenty-five he could herd sheep and mix drugs, ride a bronco and draw up a legal document, carpenter a little, teach school to some extent, handle machinery, edit a paper—in fine, put his available self in many directions. But since by that time he stood on his own acres, some of these methods of earning a living had become superfluous. He had gathered a library and built a laboratory, for part of his success came from one or two timely inventions. And so Wilbur Mayne had won his place in the world.

One summer afternoon he took "Black Prince," his pet Morgan, and drove into Salinas. There had been a stage robbery on the Nacimiento, and the passengers had just arrived. It was whispered around that one young lady, who was heavily veiled, had lost her little all, and hardly knew what course to take.

The bustling landlord called Wilbur into the office. "Haden't we better draw up a paper an' start it up the street, so's ter raise what she lost? She's an orphan—wears black—only lady aboard—low-down business to rob a lady, anyway—wish I'd been there. What d'ye say?"

Wilbur waited a moment. He had noticed the quiet, reliant figure.

"We must first find out what she can do," he said, incisively. "She don't want charity. I am sure of that." At this stage of affairs the little negro office-boy hurried in, saying: "De lady what done gone got stage rob want ter see de lan'lord, immediate, sar!"

The result of this interview was the statement that she wanted to teach school, or to take a music class, which latter plan was considered most desirable. So Wilbur helped the brisk landlord to drum up a remarkably good class for her, and then he went back to his haying without any particular impression concerning the stranger, except that she had asked him earnestly, and he hoped she would get along with her new work.

"What that girl's look," said Wilbur to himself. "Miss Leigh is a very lady-like young woman." When his thoughts turned toward farm work and the plans for the next day, and the events of the afternoon were put aside. He was not a sentimental young man; he had even been called cold-blooded at times, and he knew a hundred times as many men as women. His memory of his own mother was very faint, for she died when he was the merest child; he remembered a low voice singing in the twilight—soft lace about the throat, deep, loving eyes, an atmosphere of gentle womanhood. He knew, afterward, that his father always spoke of her with perfect respect and affection; and still there was a mystery about her death. Gilbert Mayne, and after him his son Wilbur, always wore, attached to the chain of his old-fashioned English watch, a Grecian coin of gold—on one side of which there was engraved, with marvelous skill, a broken link and an unsheathed dagger, in the two halves of a letter B. Old Gilbert had always promised to tell his son the history of the coin, but he died so suddenly that he only said, clasping Wilbur's hand:

"It holds friendship broken, treachery unspeakable, revenge unfulfilled. There is but one other coin like that in the world, and it is not quite the same. The letter is there, but the links are united, and the dagger is sheathed. I had mine reengraved after"—Gilbert lifted his clenched hands—"Tom Belden," he cried, "I hope you have repented your evil deed;" and, so saying, he died with the tale unfinished. This was, year after year, the mystery of Wilbur's life.

The warm summer days came, full of color and delight. Wilbur's little farm, in the heart of the wide Salinas, was a wave of golden wheat which melted into other waves, and swept in wider and yet wider circles until it was one sea of grain from the rugged Gavilan peaks to the wooded bases of the Santa Lucia, and from the hills of San Miguel, past Gonzales and Chualar, to the sands of Soledad and the old Spanish houses near the river. Wilbur Mayne found that Miss Leigh's success as a music teacher was assured, for every one liked her cultured ways and graceful self-reliance.

"Sech singin' and playin' was never heard afore," said old man Northup, after Miss Leigh's first concert, in which her pupils from Hilltown, Santa Rita, Natividad, Alisal, and surrounding districts took part. And that was the general opinion wherever she was known.

It came to pass one afternoon, when the failing sun lit the Santa Lucia peaks, that Wilbur harnessed his horse, with much attention to the straps and buggy, and drove to Miss Leigh's boarding place. The supposition is that it was premeditated. A little while later he had tucked her in with much robe and attention, and they drove along the highway toward the rounded Fremont's Peak and the passes of the hills beyond. It was not what might strictly be termed love-making. Both of them were sensible young people, a little shy in that direction. Still it is probable that they enjoyed each other's company.

"Now, Miss Leigh," said Wilbur, as they were passing an old adobe house beside a silver lagoon, "what are you reminded of when you see the funny shadows in the fence-corners?"

"I hardly know," she replied; "let me watch a minute. Oh, it is as if there were little gnomes peeping out and resting their sooty arms on the moss-grown panels of the fence!" "Perhaps like Irving's Dutch farmers," said he; "the chaps who leaned half out of the ancient doorways to smoke the evening pipe and gossip with their cronies."

"But that is too large a comparison," was the laughing answer. "The Knickerbocker people were honest—though rather stupid—giants of the lowland type; and so we have gone from dwarfs to giants in almost a breath. Now that is worse than Hassan's enchanted carpet."

"Which carpet, I maintain," said Wilbur, "must have added much to human happiness. Just imagine how delicately a quack could leave his irate patient, a few his swindled customer, a modern dandy his washerwoman's bill!"

"Or a music-teacher visit her country scholars. Do think of some good use for the carpet!" she retorted.

"But," he continued, "magic carpets being unattainable, I prefer the present state of affairs."

Monterey County is full of picturesque bits of scenery, and winding, rocky passes, wherever you leave the valley to enter the hills. Sometimes, too, art has helped nature, and the road they followed led past sloping vineyards, and bits of orchard through which moon-lit and peaceful roofs showed clearly. It was while they paused by the crossing of a silver brook, to let the horse drink, that Miss Leigh looked forward to a row of eucalyptus which gleamed against the sky, and said:

"I think it is wonderful how the very essence of all that is best about a tree is so clearly revealed in the twilight. The willow's weeping folds are saddest then; the mountain live-oak wears its sternest grandeur; even the twilight beauties of a garden of roses, or of clinging vines above a balcony, are full of delight."

"And that," he answered, entering into the mystic mood, "is because only the suggestion is given, in a few mellow lines, relieved by vast shadows, and by a deeper sense of distance, until the dusty fields and common trees are almost visions of another world, and make us feel their message and faithfulness. Then notice, too, how the clouds are lying over the mounds of sand by the ocean—unutterably white, translucent as walls of pearl."

He drew rein, looking across the valley with a sense of solemn delight, and she, looking also, repeated quietly:

The softly singing night
Gently her veil of love and beauty throws
Over the trembling land. The river flows
By willow isles, and far off, strangely white,
As battlemented snow, the cloudy height
Touches dim heaven."

"Yes," he said, "that is the way it seems. As if the endless universe were endlessly glad."

"And I am glad," she answered, "that there is no end to anything. No novelist can ever come to a real stopping place; no poem is ever more than a glimpse; even the music of Mendelssohn is an unfinished rapture."

Then the conversation took a merry turn, and afterward drifted off upon authors and miscellanea. They rallied each other in absurd speeches, and repeated nonsense-verses from "Alice's Adventures," the "Hunting of the Snark," and the "Bab Ballads," in which last Wilbur took a healthy interest. He also believed in rollicking Hood, and quaint, sympathetic Elia.

There was silence again for a little time, then Wilbur drew rein on the summit of the Mesa, billowy, and full of strange pulses and sounds; they saw the moonlight flood the world, till as an ocean it seemed to foam at their feet; they turned homeward, and began to sing. They sang battle-songs of the republic, border-ballads of Scotland, fragments of Provençal minstrelsy, songs of the open sea and summer wildwood. And their voices chorded like bird and waterfall.

Half an hour later they reached her home. "I wonder what time it is?" said Wilbur Mayne; "my watch is left for repairs."

She drew out her own tiny watch, and put it in his hands. "You had better strike a match and look," she said, for the moon was hid behind a cloud.

Wilbur lit the match and held it over the watch, but what the time was he never knew, for on the chain he saw a Grecian coin of gold, like that which he himself carried. A puff of wind blew out the fateful match. He felt cold and dull, and wanted to be by himself to think it all over. He handed Miss Leigh out, hoped she had had a good time, shook hands with her, climbed in the buggy, and drove rapidly away. Five minutes later he halted in the road, and half turned around.

"I was a fool," he said; "I ought to have asked about it. Perhaps it is the most innocent of heirlooms. I might have been mistaken. The light was very shabby. I am not sure about the links and the dagger."

When he reached home he took a candle, and went into the workshop. There stood an old chest, and, unlocking this, he peered within. The books his father had loved most, the clothes he wore, his cane, his long-barreled pistols, and some of the simple treasures of his own boyhood were here. Here, too, were his mother's wedding-ring and Bible.

Wilbur Mayne's eyes grew bright with tears. "Yes, father," he said, as if he were speaking to some one who stood very near, "I shall find out all about it, no matter what happens."

Business called Wilbur away the next morning, and several weeks passed before he saw Miss Leigh again. He thought of writing to ask her about the coin, but multitudinous letters were begun anxiously and torn up in despair. Sometimes he almost thought that silence and forgetfulness were best.

"It must be," he said to himself, "a story of shame and wickedness. Some wrong uncondoned, some irreparable injury lies between her ancestors and mine."

But at last he went to Miss Leigh, earnestly, manfully, putting the coin he had carried so long into her hands, and saying, with terse directness:

"It is a part of my life; tell me its story."

Miss Leigh sprang to her feet with swift excitement. "I never expected to see that," she cried, and laid hers beside it. It was like his in every line, except that the dagger was sheathed and the link unbroken.

"It is like a leaf out of an old romance, blown into this prosaic nineteenth century," she said. "Yes, I must tell you." My father's name was Belden, but he died when I was an infant, and, my mother marrying again, her husband stipulated that I should take his name. So I am Helen Leigh to the end of the chapter. When my father was a young man he had a very dear friend who was in the same class at college, and traveled with him in Europe. The strange part of it is that my father in later years never mentioned his name, and even erased it from the books they owned in common, so that I had no way of knowing it. He left, however, a package on which was written, 'For my little girl when she grows up.' This contained the coin I have shown you, and a letter which said: 'When my friend and I were young men together, we lived a year with the Arabs, and twice he saved my life. I had two rare coins which had been in our family for years, the tradition being that if one were given away it took a blessing, and came back with a blessing also. I had these coins engraved alike, and I gave my friend one. Years after, an enemy of ours sowed dissension between us, so that, for awhile, we hated each other, and drifted apart. My friend's name was Gilbert—' and there the record stopped."

Wilbur Mayne smiled. "I am glad it was no worse," he said, "and I wish my father might have lived to know the truth. See how he broke the links, and unsheathed the sharp steel. There was no common wrath under this."

"It was the bitterest treachery on the part of a man they both trusted, which made them believe horrible things of each other for a while," said Miss Leigh. "It was Iago over again."

"Our fathers were friends," said Wilbur, holding out his hand, as he rose to go, "and, if they can see us, they must be glad that we have known each other. Do you know, Miss Leigh, I have been much troubled about this matter? I thought there might be some difficulty"—He stopped, and flushed; then he looked her in the face—"Now, may I not come and see you sometimes?"

"Yes, at proper intervals," said quiet Miss Leigh.

CHARLES H. SHINN.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 15, 1880.

The young Queen of Spain, Marie Christine, is said to be able to speak and write fluently Latin and five living languages, to have a marked talent for drawing and painting, to be a good amateur wood-carver, and an excellent pianist.

One of the few sorrows of her life was the decree, made when she was entering upon her seventeenth year, conferring upon her the title of Abbess of Teradshin. She burst into tears at the announcement, which she believed to be sure evidence of a determination to compel her to take the veil, declaring that she had no inclination toward a severely religious life, and it required many assurances and positive proof to satisfy her that the honor conferred was merely intended to secure a rich revenue without requiring a performance of any austere duties. She is unusually gay and vivacious.

In these hard times (says London Truth) the following ingeniously-economical method of giving a dance will recommend itself to lady readers: The intending hostess hires a public ball-room for a certain night, and proceeds to issue invitations to her friends. On each card are clearly marked the prices of admission: "Ladies, seven and sixpence; gentlemen, ten shillings each." The above idea was last week carried out at Canterbury with considerable success. Fiat experimentum.

FROM BOSTON.

A Stroll Through the Art Museum.

At the corner of Dartmouth Street and St. James Avenue, in the new portion of the city known as the "back bay," stands the Boston Art Museum—home of the soul to every painter, sculptor, and art-lover in the New England States. The land on which it stands was given to the city in 1870 by the "Water Power Company," to be used as a park, or as a site for an art museum. With the traditional Bostonian love of "culture," and trusting to the Common and public gardens to furnish breathing places, the committee wisely decided to erect a Museum of Fine Arts on the land. The building was begun in 1871. At present it is only half done, the portion now occupied being a wing of the intended building. It is built of red brick, with facings of terra-cotta in darker red and buff. These copings and ornamentations were made in England. I think I have somewhere read that this is the first instance of terra-cotta being used in large quantity for such a purpose. The effect is certainly fine, the material beautiful, and not at all costly. On the façade of the museum wing are two bas-reliefs, also in terra-cotta. One represents "Universal Art"—America, the only female figure, holds in her hand Powers' "Greek Slave." The other bas-relief shows "The Union of Art and Industry." Among the ornamentations are heads in terra-cotta of some of the great painters.

In a large rectangular space in front of the Museum is a scrap of land owned by an unenterprising citizen who must be utterly devoid of public spirit. Else would he pull away his rickety picket fence, mow down his thistle crop, and plant grass and make seats for the benefit of the bas-relief gazers. One can not stand long in the windy street with one's head tipped back, eyes strained, and neck stretched; neither can one sit on the old fence, as the urchins do on the free days of the Museum, and so the beautiful figures go unobserved by thousands. Alas!—say I—that physical discomforts and bodily aches make us lose so many of the good things of life.

The entrance to the building is beautiful. After one has mounted three or four granite steps, and pushed aside the ugly storm door, one enters an artistic vestibule. The steps leading into the building are of white marble. The pillars at the sides of the inner door are of different colored granites, highly polished, and with capitals of terra-cotta. About the vestibule is something which, while it interests, suggests forcibly the beauties beyond.

Let us first wander about the entrance-hall beyond the vestibule. In the galleries the works are classified and chronologically arranged, but here they are displayed in sweet disorder, so far as age, nationality, and style are concerned. The walls of the hall and lower floor have recently been frescoed in a dull, deep shade of maroon, making thereby the lovely statuary seem ten times more lovely. The first thing which attracts the attention on entering is an "Orpheus" in marble, by T. G. Crawford. It is a fine thing, full of power. In common with many other marbles and casts it belongs to the old Athenæum, but is permanently loaned—not given—to the Museum. Next the "Orpheus" is a "Hebe and Ganymede;" the "Hebe" is the better of the two figures. Then comes a copy in marble of the "Venus di Medici." Near her is a figure by a Genoese sculptor of "Young Columbus" sitting with his feet crossed in boyish fashion, and gazing seaward from the end of a pier. Often as I have seen the thoughtful, hopeful figure, I find myself at each new view of it wondering if in the rise and fall of the waves he watched so intently he saw any hint of the future which was in store for him, and whether the restlessness of the water told him any tale of the unrest that was to be his share.

Near the "Columbus" is a head of "St. Stephen, the Martyr," by Dr. William Rimmer, done in dark gray granite. Some years ago Rimmer sent to the Paris Exhibition a figure of a falling man! The judges whose criticism it had to brave before gaining admittance to the exhibition, at first refused to believe it the work of a living man, and that man an American! They said no man then living had such knowledge of the muscles of the human body as to so truthfully and grandly represent it under such conditions. Dr. Rimmer had for some years been at the head of the art school which meets in the basement of the Museum; and his death last summer was a loss not only to Boston but to the entire country. His men are superb; his women and children faulty—very. The latter he makes abnormally fat, while his women are all old, and each looks as though she were the mother of a baker's dozen of children.

Passing by some cases containing old Japanese armor and Indian relics, let us enter the Egyptian room, and make the tour of the building in chronological order. In the Egyptian room one may expect to note the birth and infancy of all art. Not all of this is beautiful to the casual observer. In fact, curiosity, not love, leads the feet of the ordinary visitor into the Egyptian room. But then we are not ordinary visitors. So, while we are crossing the hall, let me tell you that the collection was given to the Museum by one Charles Granville May, a sea captain, and although not collected by him is called the "May Collection." The room is lined with glass cases, which hold cats, hawks, goats, dogs, etc.; scraps of the human body, preserved by some process now unknown—notably, a slender woman's delicate hand, on whose third finger is a flat band of gold, tarnished and disfigured, but still recognizable as a ring. Here, too, is a valuable series of collections of coins, rings, amulets, bracelets, earrings, and odd bits of highly-colored glass. Here, too, are preserved beetles and flies, and also various specimens of the scarabæus, the sacred beetle.

The Egyptians worshipped this beetle in life, and embalmed it when dead. They imagined that it symbolized the creative power of the sun, and that the male of the species reproduced in itself the race. The scarab laid its eggs in a bit of dung, which it then rolled and shaped with its thirty legs into a ball, and, pushing it backward into some sunny corner, left it till the sun should bring the eggs to maturity. The Egyptians regarded the movements of this beetle at the time of depositing its eggs as having direct influence on the moon, and the creature's thirty legs to be in some way connected with the number of days in the month. The scarabæi are found on the bodies of mummies, never next the skin, but between some of the folds of the bandages which encase the body.

Moral reflection: What a change is here, my countrymen! To-day women faint and scream at the very sight of a beetle; but then, in those far-off ages, it was worshipped, courted, propitiated, and loved—even buried and embalmed with kings and princesses.

What a melancholy creature the beetle of our time must be, knowing that its best days are over, the glory of its race past, and that, unlike its fair tormentors, it has no future bliss to which to look forward.

And now, "Take the shoes from off your feet, the place whereon ye stand is holy ground," for before us lies embalmed royalty in all the dignity of its three thousand years. Here are spiced kings and princesses, wrapped in cotton cloth, pitched, painted, time-worn, and travel-stained. I often think, as I look at them, how dreadfully disconcerted they would be if they could suddenly awake, and find themselves in such a place and plight. Here are their vitals in funeral jars on one side of the room, their bracelets and other ornaments in cases on the other; their pet mummied dog and goat separated from them; their stone image set up by itself for curious eyes to gaze upon; and the wooden and stone coffins set up on end, in a grinning row, at the farthest end of the room. What a time they would have getting themselves together! If some one could only soak her out, as young "Renault" did poor "Fougas," in the Man with the Broken Ear, what a tale, for instance, could this poor princess unfold! What a tale could she tell of life and love three thousand years ago; of political strifes and Egyptian "Garcelons"; of the things she did, and said, and wore, and thought; of the state of civilization in her own and other countries! Perhaps unravel the mysteries of Cheops. Yet hardly, poor thing, for she never went to Joe Cook's Monday morning lectures, "to have her mind improved."

Next to the mummies, in all the stupid stolidity and ugliness of black granite, sits the lion-headed goddess "Pasht," one of the most ancient of Egyptian deities. Beyond her is a cast in plaster of Amenophis III., who was Egypt's king about 1500 B. C.—so says the catalogue. The legs are somewhat scratched and scarred, and the face seems roughened by age. Once when standing near this cast I saw two women enter the room, greenness, ignorance, and wonder depicted in every look and movement. They slowly walked around, "oh-ing" at what they could comprehend, and turning up their noses at what they could not. When they came to the seated figure of the king they turned to the catalogue and slowly read the little it says there of him, and finally one of them cautiously put her hand on the battered shin, and with an anxious look into the calm face of the statue, said sympathetically: "How it must have hurt, poor man! Did it in some way, I suppose."

There are many representations of Osiris in this room. One sees pictures of him, so to speak, on everything connected with death and burial. He was the god who tried the soul before its entry into immortality, and consequently was to be adored and propitiated in every conceivable way. Tradition says that when King of Egypt, wishing to subdue other nations, he left his kingdom in charge of Isis. All went smoothly until one Typhon took it into his scheming head that he would like to occupy Osiris's place, and this is how he tried to accomplish his purpose: First, he tried to dethrone Isis. Not succeeding in this, upon the return of Osiris he gave the king an elegant banquet. At the festivities he produced a curiously-wrought box, carved, and inlaid with gold and gems, which, he declared, should be given to the one who should exactly fit into it. Typhon had previously obtained Osiris's measure, and as soon as the king lay down in it Typhon and his confederates quickly shut down the cover, fastened it with molten lead, and hurled it into the Nile. Down the river it miraculously floated until its course was stopped by a growing tree. Here the box stayed until the tamarisk had surrounded it, and Osiris was deeply buried in the tree's heart. The tree was finally cut down, by order of the king in whose country it was, and placed as a pillar in the temple. In the meantime Isis had been long grieving for her lost monarch, and in mourning garments traveled from place to place in search of his body. Exactly how she came at last to know where Osiris rested I can not tell—perhaps her instinct told her, perhaps Osiris's spirit led her—but at all events she one day learned where he was to be found. She went to the king in whose domain the temple was, and at her request he engaged her as a sort of barber to the queen and young princes, so that she spent her time in anointing their royal heads with sweet-smelling oils and powders. At last she placed one of the princes under enchantment, and at the same time turned herself into a swallow, that she might escape the queen's wrath, and also be able to fly around Osiris's pillar. The queen, however, becoming alarmed at her son's condition, pardoned Isis, and not only pardoned, but bribed her with a promise of having whatever she most wished. Of course Isis asked for and obtained the long-sought body of Osiris, and went on her way rejoicing, to tell Osiris's son of her success. She left the body in the box which Typhon had made, in an unfrequented portion of the wood, while she went to tell the happy news. During her absence Typhon, guided by a moonbeam, found Osiris's body, broke the box in many pieces, and scattered it to the four winds of heaven. Osiris, of course, went immediately to heaven, and Typhon ruled till Osiris's son wrested the throne from him.

But here I am entertaining myself with retelling old legends, instead of writing of the objects of interest to be seen in the May collection, the palettes and brushes of the scribes, the papyrus which grows in a prosaic wooden tub in one of the windows, the Rosetta stone which is the key to all Egyptian hieroglyphics, the queer dolls and images, the lamps and pottery, the implements of war, etc.

Woven petticoats, that now come for little girls as well as women in attractive patterns and bright colors, are fast taking the place of flannels. They are not so likely to shrink in washing, and, while light in weight, they cling to the figure and make a very warm garment.

The girls of the New York Normal College had a good time playing a farce for the benefit of a gallery filled with visitors, and teasing their teachers by imitation of their manners with their pupils.

ARTICLES DE PARIS.

The chimney is on fire at Mme. D.'s.

"Don't be afraid, madame; don't be afraid," says the footman, calmly, to his alarmed mistress: "there is no danger." "But you don't know anything about it, John, and so why do you tell me there is no danger?" "I know I don't, madame, but it is to reassure you."

Litré and Robin, who were associated in the preparation of a famous Dictionary of Medicine, were two very absent-minded men.

One day when they were seated side by side at the same table at their work, one, feeling his leg itch, laid down his pen to scratch it.

Unhappily, in his absent-mindedness, he began scratching his companion's leg.

His companion, perceiving that his leg was being scratched, inferred that he was scratching it himself, and laid down his pen so as to be able to devote himself exclusively to the operation.

A scene of the street—literal translation:

Before the display of a confectioner a girling (fillette) of twelve years is arrested herself, sucking of the eyes the fairs sugars of barley. The gourmandess flattens her little nose upon the glass. He seems her that she is more near of all these delicacies.

At two steps of her a boy of the same age squints alternately the good-goods and the chit, with a preference marked for this here.

Then, when she has quitted her post of admiration, he approaches himself of the glass where subsists yet a little cloud of moisture, chooses well the place, and puts therein one kiss!

Oh, the youth! Oh, the love!

An anecdote is told at the expense of the late Violet-le-Duc, who, after having been an attaché of the Imperial Court, became a Republican municipal councillor—which has been told of other people before him.

One of the amusements at Compiègne was writing a lot of questions on cards, which were then shuffled together and drawn one at a time to tax the wits of the company in provoking off-hand witty answers.

The Emperor happened, while playing at this game, to draw the question, "How would you distinguish between truth and falsehood?"

"Make them go through the same door," said Napoleon; "the lie would be first through."

At that moment the door opened, and in came M. Violet-le-Duc, followed by Napoleon's faithful friend, Dr. Conneau.

One day when a review was about to take place in a certain northern city a band of patriots went to the General commanding, clamoring to have the band play the "Marseillaise."

"Children of your country," said the General coldly, "do you behold elevated on any side the bloody standard of tyranny?"

"N-no."

"Do you hear my ferocious soldiers roaring in the country?"

"N-no."

"Do they manifest any intention of coming even in your arms your wives and little ones to slay, eh?"

"N-no."

"And, finally, have your furrows any urgent necessity for being watered with an impure blood?"

"N-no."

"Well, if all this is so, what in thunder do you want the 'Marseillaise' played for?"

When Heinrich Heine was traveling with his wife in the south of France, the violinist Ernst intrusted to his care a superb Lyons sausage, to be presented to a common friend, a homœopathic doctor at Paris.

The way was long and the travelers became hungry. No provisions were obtainable, and finally Madame Heine, being tempted of the devil appetite, took of the sausage a wee, wee piece and did eat. Heine tasted it, too, and lo! it was very good.

The unhappy sausage proved a delightful but constantly diminishing companion, and when they reached Paris there was very little of it left. Heine seized his razor, sliced off a fragment rather thinner than a postage stamp, and inclosed it in a letter, thus conceived:

"Your learned demonstrations, my dear doctor, have convinced us of the wonderful efficacy of thousandth and millionth parts. Inclosed please find the millionth of a Lyons sausage which our friend Ernst requested me to convey to you with his compliments. If homœopathy is true, it will produce upon you the same effect as the whole sausage."

"Sainted Hahnemann!" exclaimed the doctor: "I wish Heine was sick, and I was his doctor, and an allopath!"

In 1832 a melodrama bearing the title of Jenny Durand was produced at a theatre in Paris. Jules Janin, then critic of the Journal des Debats, reviewed it as follows:

"Jenny loves M. Alfred; M. Alfred loves Jenny. When M. Alfred said to Jenny 'I love thee, Jenny!' Jenny said to M. Alfred, 'You are engaged to Mlle. Louise, Alfred.' To which Alfred replied, 'That makes no difference, Jenny.' But Jenny said to Alfred, 'Oh, yes, it does, Alfred.' Then the ma of Alfred came in and said, 'It makes a great deal of difference, Alfred.' Then Alfred said, 'Adieu, Jenny.' Then Jenny goes to find Alfred at the house of the pa of Alfred to urge upon him (Alfred) to forget her (Jenny). And Alfred goes to the house of Jenny and says, 'I can not forget you, Jenny.' To which she replies, 'Forget me, Alfred.' Then he says, 'I want to carry you off, Jenny,' and she replies, 'If you want to, carry me off, Alfred.' Then Alfred was about to carry off Jenny, when in came the pa of Jenny, who said to Alfred, 'Don't carry her off, Alfred,' and the ma of Jenny, who said to Jenny, 'Don't go with Alfred, Jenny,' everybody hissed Alfred. Then everybody hissed Jenny."

Conservatism is not always wrong. A clock goes at all is right twice in the twenty-four hours.

GANYMEDE'S CUP.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 29, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—"Out of breath to no purpose, and very busy about nothing," I sit down to write because I feel an inclination to do so, without any hopes of amusing or great probability of pleasing you; but I want you to know where I have been the past week, whom and what I have seen and enjoyed. If you expect an inundation of ribbons and brocades, satins, laces, and diamonds, disappointment awaits you.

"The Young Ladies of Mme. Zeitska's Institute,
AT HOME
Friday Evening, eight o'clock, twenty-third Jan.
Reading, Music, and Dancing."

This was the key-note to a most artistic and cultured entertainment. Mme. Zeitska is an accomplished lady, as was made evident to us by the talented young ladies who have graduated from her institute, among whom are Mrs. Senator J. P. Jones, née Sullivan; Mrs. Van Sicklan, née Davis; Mrs. Lewis, née Woods, wife of Dr. Lewis, U. S. N.; and charming Marquise Montchoix, née Berton, of Paris, with many other California ladies.

One of the most noticeable features of the evening was a duet for harp and piano, played by Mrs. Hall Pettinos and Miss Hall. Mrs. Pettinos, besides being a fine musician, has a thorough command of the English, German, and Italian languages. The singing and playing of Miss Belle Toplitz was good. Miss Lolita Rodriguez sang "L'Arditi" so unaffectedly that one felt she must always sing. Miss Lizzie Ferral played a difficult nocturne, and played it well. The piano playing of the Misses Sampson, who have just returned from Europe, gave evidence of having been taught by the best of masters. Miss Nelly Coleman read and acted "The Vision of Queen Catherine" in a manner reflecting credit upon her teacher, Miss Bradley. The Misses Rising, daughters of Judge Rising of Virginia City, recited, in German, Schiller's "Maria Stuart," and Miss Heyneman's French selection was applauded. Miss Lillie DeLong reads well, a rare accomplishment. Mrs. J. McDonald gave us a recitation of "The Signal Man Asleep."

Madam Z's school rooms are so arranged that they can be thrown together, making a pleasant dancing-hall, which was filled with some of our most delightful people. Among them were Mr. Lakse and his daughter Miss Lizzie, Miss Emma Ephsam, Dr. and Mrs. Bucknall, Mr. and Mrs. Homer King, Miss Julia Sterling of Napa, Miss Florence Godley, the "Marie Stuart" at the "Carnival," Mrs. Judge Sullivan, Miss Maibell Brest of Oakland, Mr. Darje (journalist), Mrs. Best, with her brother, Charles Reed; Mrs. Edgerton, with her brother, Dana Brown; Miss Maggie Hutchinson, with her brother; Miss Kate Bishop, who has given us sweet songs in the February number of the California; Miss Chalmers, Major John Egan, U. S. A., Miss Nonie Smith, Mr. Lucian Burling, Mr. Edward Le Breton, Mr. George Hall, Mr. Charles Smith, Mr. Eli Hutchinson; then the French frigate Lamoth-Piquet was represented by several officers, who said Mme. Zeitska's home was one of the few in San Francisco where they had the pleasure of hearing their native language correctly spoken. The little frigate has dispensed unbounded hospitality during her sojourn in our port, and Commander Bienaimé's gig has been kept busy carrying parties to and from the ship.

These courteous officers have added much to the brilliancy of our entertainments. Last Saturday Mme. Zeitska and party were entertained by Ensign Aubry, Dr. Mestadier, and Ensign Sauvage. On this occasion the ship was thoroughly inspected, and pronounced fortunate in being commanded by such gallant officers. The Lamoth-Piquet will sail in a few days for Tahiti, taking with her the newly-appointed Governor, M. Henri de Chessé; and then—why, brush up your French, girls, the Victoria will soon be here.

Invitations are out for a "kettle-drum" to be given by Mrs. R. N. Graves, January 31st; three to six.

We are all a little daft over August Wilhelmj. Who could help it? He is young, handsome, of noble birth, rich, unmarried (I'm told), thoroughly graceful, and one of the greatest of musicians. I sometimes feel, while listening to him, that I have never heard music before. The soirée musicale given at the Baldwin Hotel, "under the auspices" of Mme. Ponton D'Arcé and her sister, Mme. Durand, was another delightful social event. How thick and fast they come! I'm sure Lent will be a welcome season to us all this year.

GANYMEDE.

Operatic Reminiscence—Jenny Lind.

I have been wondering whether I could write anything interesting to Californians of celebrities, chiefly musical and theatrical, who flourished about a quarter of a century ago. Birth and residence in New York city gave me good opportunities of observation, and the year 1853, spent in Europe, added to those opportunities. But so many stars have risen since then, that were it not for the recollection of a few whose brilliancy time has not dimmed, I should hesitate.

It was in the times of which I am writing that the phenomenal Jenny Lind appeared, and we owed her visit to the man who has amused and humbugged three or four generations—Barnum. She was to sing for the first time in Castle Garden, New York city, and I was fortunate enough to obtain a ticket without absolutely wrecking the pecuniary prospects of my boyhood. The seats were, of course, sold at auction. The first seat was sold at a fabulous price, to an obscure hatter by the name of Genin. Everybody laughed at Genin, and hugged himself with the belief that he could not be as idiotic as Genin. But the fact ultimately dawned upon the public that there might be greater fools than Genin, who had taken this method of advertising himself, and thereafter sold his hats so fast that he made a speedy fortune.

The singer who had captivated Europe tripped upon the boards, and her first song was "Casta Diva." How many goddesses we had listened to, from the most inexperienced to the graduates of the Normal School, but of Jenny Lind's superiority I can give no adequate impression. It was not merely that she sang so critically well, but there was a delicious bird-like quality of voice, and a marvelous power of sustaining her notes. There was a herdsman's song, in which she held a certain note till the hearer's breath was drawn in almost painful sympathy. Then the exquisitely natural manner in which she sang such simple ballads as "Home, Sweet Home," and the security one felt that she could not fail in anything, and her pure and womanly appearance, all these ensured a perfect satisfaction. The common people enjoyed it as much as the learned in music; the critics were disarmed for once; even the Quakers forgot themselves, and declared that it was good to pass an hour with Jane Lind. I saw her off the stage, and surely she was not beautiful, but she had what Charles Lamb said of some one, a "divine plain face." There was the reflection of a noble nature in it. Conscientious scruples kept her from the operatic stage, after appearing, I think, but once, in England, as "Amina." Notwithstanding the position she had reached—for the world was in love with the woman as well as the singer, and titles and wealth were offered—she characteristically gave her hand with her heart, and no one hears now of Jenny Lind Goldschmidt, unless an enterprising correspondent penetrates her secluded London home. Occasionally there have been rumors of a daughter with her mother's voice; but we who heard the mother shake our heads in absolute doubt. I shall write anon of others.

BERKELEY, January 22, 1880.

JOHN MURRAY.

It is pleasant to see how, in these days of prominent prudery, great men, and powerful men who are not great, show the world an example in abhorrence of conventionality. Gen. Garibaldi, who is generally considered as belonging to the former class, has, it seems, just married a Francesca somebody, and "acknowledged" two children. This is very nice of the General—the more so considering his advanced age, which might naturally be supposed conducive to a certain coolness between Mars and Venus. But what may be excused, and even commended, in a popular leader and warrior, needs not necessarily be condoned in an unpopular figure-head who is neither. The white-headed Czar of Russia, emulating a not uncommon practice among white-heads and bald-heads, has been, and is now, indulging in a liaison with the Princess Dolzouki, who is young and beautiful; while the spiteful old Czarina, who has not been young since her husband was, and, report says, never was beautiful, goes off in high dudgeon, and hibernates at Cannes. There is a boy in the case, too, whom the frosty-ated sovereign desires to "acknowledge."

And here in America, while the "big-bugs" of Europe are doing much as they please with the sacramental and civil forms of matrimony, we are making a hullabaloo and raising a hue and cry against our poor little polygamists, the Mormons. We certainly sustain our reputation in being "ahead" in this business; for a country which can produce and sustain a Brigham Young has no reason to vail its en avant plume to another country or two that occasionally winks at morganatic marriages and liaisons—no, nor even to the Grand Turk himself. Still there seems to be something wrong, not to say unjust, in the matter; and, unless some exchange can be effected, some basis of equalization arrived at—unless our divorce courts in some prestidigital manner can be "rung in" upon the difficulty, though we confess we don't see how—we shall be out and injured, and the goose will get all the sauce and leave none for the gander.

The casual examination we have been able to give the "Mining Bill" introduced in the Assembly by the Hon. Charles Felton, of San Mateo, impresses us favorably. It seems to us to steer intelligently between extremes. It is not conceived in narrow jealousy of all who are successful, nor in suspicion of all who deal in stocks as a business, and it keeps prominently in view the rights of small stockholders: it demands honest books, open management, and square dealing all around. Mr. Felton is an exceptionally successful business man, is a millionaire, we are informed, but in all his feelings a thorough Democrat, and thoroughly in sympathy with the honest efforts of honest men to do what he has done, viz., to work their way from poverty to competence by honest labor. We have a right to expect intelligent legislation from Mr. Felton on all matters involving business propositions.

The Territorial Enterprise propounds the following political conundrums for solution by the Democracy:

"Is it not true that if intoxicating liquors were destroyed in a moment the Democratic party would not survive a month? Is it not true that if all men whom self-respecting people would not permit to enter their houses were denied the franchise the Democratic party would be in a hopeless minority? Suppose the men who hold their citizenship simply as a means to make a piece on election day or about election times were disfranchised, where is there a city in the whole North that the Democracy could carry?"

And while Democrats have their guessing caps on, it might perhaps interest them to answer one of our propounding. Suppose all the unworthy and uneducated and criminal and propertyless foreigners that Europe has precipitated upon us within the last thirty years should go back to their native lands, how many native-born Democratic mourners would be left to weep over their departure?

Cardinal Manning opens the North American Review for February with an article on the "Relations of the Roman Catholic Church to Modern Society." Timothy O. Howe summarizes the machine arguments for a third term in a broad—and shallow—special plea. "Now and Then in America" is an entertaining sketch by Sala. Rear-Admiral Ammen has a long, critical article on the American Inter-oceanic Canal, which is in effect a reply to a previous article by M. de Lesseps. There are two or three other papers in the number which we have not read, but which are probably worth reading. Altogether the number is quite up to the average of this popularized magazine.

Some wise-head has put a bill before the State Senate "declaring eight hours a legal day's work;" but he omits to declare what is far more interesting to the ordinary mortal, viz., what is a legal day's pay?

ITS VERITABLE IN'ARDS.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 28, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—You say in last week's issue that you don't know the true inwardness of the contest over the Pueblo line. You ought to. I can not see how any disinterested person can have any doubt upon the subject; that is to say, upon the right of the matter.

The decree of the United States Circuit Court makes the "ordinary high-water mark" the boundary line: "embracing so much of the extreme upper portion of the peninsula above ordinary high-water mark." This is the decree, and the title to this land is by the decree vested in the city in trust for those deriving title from her. There is no ambiguity as to the terms of the decree; neither is there any uncertainty as to the position of the boundary line. Every surveyor, and every one else that knows anything about it, knows that the outer edge of this salt marsh is coincident with "ordinary high water." It is equally certain that Mr. Stratton's survey does not follow that line, but follows the inner edge of the salt marsh, thus excluding them, instead of including them, as it should. Therefore the survey does not follow this decree, and consequently it is plainly wrong. Q. E. D.: that the boundary of land finally confirmed under a Mexican grant bounding on the bay ought to include the salt marsh has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States—U. S. vs. Pacheco, 2 Wallace, 587, and many other cases.

That the city is in duty bound to maintain the title of those deriving their titles from her seems equally clear. Section 14 of the Act creating the Board of Land Commissioners prohibits owners of lots in towns from prosecuting their claims, but required that one claim for the whole should be presented and prosecuted by the municipality; and the performance of this duty has been provided for in every charter. The city entered upon the performance of this duty by presenting her claim, in 1852, to the Board for four leagues, "bounded on the north and east by the Bay of San Francisco." In 1855, the city passed the Van Ness Ordinance, granting all the lands within the city limits to the actual possessors, and by section 11 provided for continuing to prosecute her claim before the Board "for the several use and behoof of the said possessors," etc.; and section 3 provided that the patent should pass the title immediately to them. The ordinance provided for soliciting the ratification and confirmation by the State, and this was obtained in 1858.

The duty of the city to prosecute the claim to its final result in a patent seems to me clear; and any intentional neglect of this duty, or affirmative disclaimer or abandonment, would probably impose a liability upon the city. Certainly it would upon an individual occupying a similar position. This ought to close the inquiry, but the discussion seems to have gone rather upon expediency. Mr. Tripp, for instance, publishes a document signed by State officials, which goes entirely upon that ground. They do not pretend to say that the city title does not extend to ordinary high-water mark, nor that the present survey does; but to make a survey in accordance with the decree would disturb titles which State officials have attempted to make there. I believe it is always expedient to do right, and that a matter settled in disregard of right will not stay settled, but will be productive of endless litigation. Still I do not believe it expedient, looking at it in the aspect of immediate interest.

If you will look at any map of the city you will see that the southern line of the pueblo runs across two ranches, "San Miguel" and "Potrero Viejo." Three-fourths of the line runs across these grants, and only one-fourth across ungranted land. So that on this line the city only gets one-fourth of the land included; so that for the three hundred acres thrown out in the heart of the city she gets only seventy-five acres of land on the extreme southern border. In the second place, the land thrown out is worth probably ten times as much per acre as that taken in. B. S. B.

Innocent men have suffered by millions in this world. As many guilty wretches have escaped, and seem to triumph. But the vengeance which follows upon evil acts does not sleep because individuals are wronged. The penalty is exacted to the last farthing from the community which permits injustice to be done.—Froude.

Obscure Intimations.

COMPANION SHIPS.—Your suggestion has been discussed, pro and con, interminably. In our judgment the plan would multiply rather than diminish the perils of navigation.

M. MCC., ELDORADO.—We will gladly consider anything you may be pleased to send; if good enough we will even print it. That is the only kind of criticism of the manuscripts sent us which we will permit ourselves to make—acceptance or rejection. No one should be dissatisfied at the failure of a first effort; our editor may be dyspeptic or out of humor, or his judgment may be "off." Remember the spider in the prison of Robert Bruce.

J. W. A., TUCSON.—If you send us the MS. we shall be glad to place you on our "authors' free list," if we use it. Character sketches, personal incidents, early reminiscences, local legends—there are scores of kinds of nice things with which our friends might favor us. The Pacific Coast, from Alaska to the Mexican border, is yet to be written up.

AN AMERICAN WORKINGMAN.—Thanks for your letter, which we are, however, unable to print.

CXIV.—Sunday, February 1.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Amber Soup.
Boiled Turbot.
Broiled Teal Ducks. Potato Soufflé.
Lima Beans, Mushrooms.
Roast Beef, New Potatoes.
French Artichokes. Lemon Pudding.
California Raisins and Almonds—Apples and Oranges.

TO MAKE POTATO SOUFFLÉ.—Boil and mash five or six potatoes; for a pint of potato use half a teaspoon of broken butter, and a heaping teaspoonful of salt, stirred in hot. Keep the potato covered in a hot place. Half a cup full of cream, or rich milk, set on to warm; two eggs, whites and yolks separate; a large, thickly-buttered baking dish. Beat the yolks of the eggs, then the whites, then both together. Turn the cream into the potato, and beat up quickly. Give a little fresh beat to the eggs, and then beat them thoroughly and lightly into the whole. Add white pepper to taste. Put all into the baking-dish, and bake quickly until a delicate brown; allow about twenty minutes.

TO MAKE LEMON PUDDING.—One quart of milk, one cupful of fine cracker crumbs, two to three and strained juice of two lemons, one heaping cupful of sugar, half a cupful of solid butter, and five eggs. Boil the milk in a custard-kettle, turn it upon the cracker crumbs; when well mixed return it to the kettle, and boil and stir until fully swelled; this will take but a few minutes. Stir in the butter, a little salt, and the lemon rind. Beat the yolks of the eggs thoroughly, then the whites; beat the yolks to the pudding, then the whites; last of all, quickly add lemon juice. Turn into a buttered baking-dish and bake. Orange pudding may be made the same.

WHO SHALL HE BE?

Of the Democratic possibilities and candidates everything is in the region of speculation. New York is the pivotal centre upon which the result of the Presidential election is most likely to turn. We do not see how it is possible for a success without the electoral vote of that State. We know that, admitting a solid Democratic South, figures may be made showing a Republican success without New York; but these figures are too close to give us any encouragement. Hence it seems to us that as goes New York so goes the Union. If we are correct in this, then the question narrows itself down to this State. We could wish that Senator Bayard could be the candidate. His great moral worth, his high integrity, his unspotted political career, his birth, his financial attitude, and the position he took during the civil war, all mark him as a statesman, and would make his candidacy a strong one. As a California journal, and having a just pride in the learning and judicial ability of Mr. Justice Field, reposing entire confidence in his patriotism and knowing that his whole life has been identified with California and its interests, we should most willingly see him bear off the honors of a Presidential nomination, and it would be very hard if we did not give him our aid to obtain the electoral vote of California. But, prominent and deserving as are these gentlemen, we are convinced that no Democrat can carry the electoral vote of New York except Mr. Samuel J. Tilden, and we are inclined to think that he could carry that State. We recall no struggle within the past ten years, when Mr. Tilden put his money and his brains into a political contest in New York, that he did not succeed; we know of no Democratic victory in New York when he had abstained from active participation. The Tammany quarrel may be reconciled; and, if not, Tammany would not if it could, and dare not if it would, so antagonize Mr. Tilden's candidacy as (in the event of his nomination) to defeat the Democracy in a Presidential campaign. If we were a Democrat, we should think Mr. Tilden entitled to the nomination, and think him the strongest candidate that our party could possibly name. The electoral vote of California will depend upon the attitude of the Workingmen's Party. If it coalesce with the Democracy, the combination will carry the State. If it unite with the Republicans, the Republican party will win. If it maintain an independent attitude, the Republicans will carry the State. The delegates to the National Convention will be anti-Grant, but pledged to no particular candidate. All the Republicans of California demand is that the candidate be sound on the Chinese question. Blaine and Washburne both fill this requirement.

Slaughter of the Innocents.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 25, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I am hostile—I've got on my war-paint—and here I go for a row. Parry this thrust first: Why don't you have a correct Central Pacific Railroad timetable? I had an engagement Sunday night in Sacramento; looked at your time-table; time-table said, as plain as pollywogs in Lake Merced, "4:30 P. M. Daily Local Train for Sacramento." I took that as correct—ARGONAUT said so, that was enough; so I bade good bye to a very pleasant companion and started for the ferry. I think it was god darn mean, too, for pa and ma were both out, servant had gone to church, and four bits to a little brother had closed a very cheap bargain for me—as a boy never waits to be told to "git" when candy money is held up as an inducement to "dust;" he "dusted." And thus with the coast all clear, a dimly-lighted parlor, two chairs (one would soon have been enough) close by the fire—and all in my favor, with glorious leap-year for a love-wedge to open the matrimonial saw-log—I had to abandon all, just because your time-table said "4:30 Daily." I held on as long as I could, and then dashed for the ferry; gobbled up a Market Street car by the tail end, and swung myself on board and against the stomach of a three-hundred pound Jewish lady who was anxious to get off at the next crossing.

"Vy don't you look a leetle oud vonst?" she gasped, and leaned against the conductor for more wind.

"Excuse me, madam, 4:30 P. M. is the time, and I must be in Sacramento," I replied, starting to take a vacant seat; and was stooping to do so when the sudden halt of the car swayed me three seats further ahead, and I sat down on a four-inch dog and in the lap of a bang-haired woman, whose escort smoked cigarettes and let the smoke pass through his nose, mouth, and ears. He had on a red necktie, low-cut collar, bell-bottomed pants, three brass studs, and a snide cluster pin with a chain attached. He looked daggers at me; and the dog, woman, and man were mad. But before I could apologize and get cleverly to an upright position the car started, and I sat down four seats away, onto a bouquet and parasol, mashed both, and paid for both before the astonished lady owner could growl. In due course of time the car reached the ferry. I hastened to buy my ticket to Sacramento, and was told that there was no 4:30 P. M. train on Sundays, and then I swore—ask the agent if I didn't—and for the first time since reading No. 1 Volume I. of the ARGONAUT did I kick and swear at it. When I reached my eight-by-ten room I took down the paper that caused all this misery, and commenced to look for other mistakes. Heretofore I had sworn by the ARGONAUT, and never thought it could err in anything; but now, since my experience, I find that the last issue, of Saturday, January 24th, don't suit me at all; and here goes for a growl.

Why do you leave out the "Pard's Epistles"? They suit a large class of readers—common people like myself; old-time boys, young in years yet old in the world. The writer of them is a pert rooster, and sabes human nature, whoever he may be. Give them to us some more. That story by Dick Rule is N. G., and too thin. He uses your columns to let the young lady who represented the "Princess" in the Egyptian booth at the Authors' Carnival know that he was "mashed" on her. "Woe is she" if she is in like manner on him. He says in the story that he is neither a "patrician nor an Oaklander, but a reporter." Heaven save the mark! If he is a reporter, where does Bull Run Russell come in?

Your paper contains too much about Grant and the third term. Very few honestly care to see him President; very few honestly want him to be. Furthermore, as a clincher, he don't want it himself. I will tell what I know, that a Palace Hotel chambermaid said. The maid overheard Mr. Grant tell Mrs. Grant that people were making a great fuss over something they knew nothing about; that he (Grant) would not accept the third-term nomination even if the people offered it to him. And Mrs. Grant answered, "Thank God for that." So please let up on Grant, and give us a '49 yarn about dear old Tuolumne County.

In the article about "Two Teas," Ada Ven gets off that old gag about "There's a tide," etc., "which, if taken at the Flood," etc. Eastern papers have worn it out, and now Ada chips in and makes me tired. Furthermore, she says if she were a young man (thank God, she ain't!) she would try and win the two million and a half in Government bonds, and those of the church also. Were she a young man she would do nothing of the kind. A man never marries for support nor for financial gain. A man marries for love. Fools, weak-brained snobs, evil-disposed persons, and foreign nobility marry for money. But a man never does. A man would marry the party, if he loved her, if she did not have a dollar in the world; but a fool and a count would not. Ada Ven is neither, so I guess she fibbed. Sabe?

In speaking of the drama, you say that, beyond a certain few, the support of Clara Morris was bad. Now, don't you think that dear old Jennings did a neat little bit of character acting? And the lady that acted the Scotch landlady did it well in tone and manner, did she not? Possibly your critic was never in Scotland.

You also speak of the awkwardness and the horrid legs of the new tenor in the Melville Opera Company, but never once mention that Miss Melville herself walks like she was on the deck of a tempest-tossed ship. She can double discount the tenor in the awkward handling of her feet. She trips along as though her shoes were too short and she was crossing an open railroad bridge on the ties. She sings and acts fairly enough, but her poising and walk would make a Piute squaw laugh.

In your "Preludes," you praise the Wilhelm with a big "J" attached on the tail end—as useless as Nast's pictures of B. Gratz Brown on Greeley's coat-tail. You also praise the piano-banger, Vogrich, and give the lady the cold shoulder. She sings well enough. It is a stand-off to the playing of both the men; for you know in your heart of hearts that you would, ten to one, sooner hear our old-timer, John Kelly, play the fiddle in Murphy's Long Tom Saloon, in dear old Sonora, than either of the men you praise. We miners do not take kindly to what we don't understand; I wish the rest were as honest, and own up.

"Ganymede" also gets off an old pun and worn-out josh in her letter about the talking of the young snob in front of her. "The music made so much noise, she could not hear the fop talk," etc. Give us something fresh, Cany, dear.

GROWLER.

RECENT SOCIAL HAPPENINGS.

From Ada's Standpoint.

MY DEAR HELEN:—I may truly say, circumstances over which I have no control will prevent my fulfilling the promise I made to write you something more stimulating; so you must bear with me a while, and wait until the rage for afternoon entertainments has somewhat subsided. On Wednesday, at twelve o'clock, Mrs. Shillaber gave a breakfast to Miss Taylor, at which Misses Gordon, McDougal, Randolph, Fall, Mattheus, Mee, and Crocker were present. An agreeable feature was the arrival of several young gentlemen who had been invited to pay their devoirs to the young ladies. A number of ladies also called, and tea was served in an elaborate manner.

From four o'clock last Wednesday afternoon, it was evident, from the continued roll of vehicles in the direction of one of our fashionable centres, that there was some unusual commotion; soon the objective point was defined, and the carriages emptied their precious contents at the residence of Mrs. William Sillem. The coup d'ail, upon entering, was brilliant in the extreme, the house beautifully decorated with smilax, flowers, and bric-à-brac. Mrs. Sillem, with her distinguished guest Wilhelm, stood near the door that she might more easily receive the greetings of her numerous friends, all of whom were presented to the great violinist. At five, the crowd was at its greatest, but each new-comer, instead of the usual inconvenience attendant upon the congregation of such large numbers, seemed only to add to the general pleasure. I believe it is customary to remain only a half hour, but the attractions were so great that the dowagers seemed as loth to leave the scene as were the young ladies.

The following are those present with whom I was directly thrown: Mrs. Baroiller and sister, Mrs. Mezes and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Tevis and Mrs. Breckenridge, Mrs. Sanderson, Mrs. Floyd and her niece, Mrs. Low and her daughter, Mrs. Hart and Mrs. Boardman, Mrs. William Howard, Mrs. Hooker, Mrs. and Miss Flood, Mrs. and Miss Crocker, Mrs. McMullin and her daughters, Captain and Mrs. Field, Mrs. Sam. Martin, Mrs. Albert Dibblee of San Rafael, Mrs. Camillo Martin and Miss Hyde, Mrs. and Miss Fall and Miss Taylor, Misses McDougal, Selby, and Crockett. The gentlemen who came under my observation were Gen. Keyes, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Foreman, Mr. Glenny, Mr. Carter Tevis, Mr. Browne, Mr. Greenway, Dr. Lyman, Major Rathbone, Mr. Friedlander.

This was a "kettledrum," and what constitutes the difference between that and a "tea" I can hardly tell—it strikes me as a distinction without a difference—though I believe dancing is admissible at the "kettledrum," where the numbers are not so great as to interfere. The near approach of Lent seems to give additional zest to the gayety so soon to close. I have heard of two forthcoming entertainments that promise much pleasure—a "Tea" at Mrs. Floyd's on Tuesday evening, and a "German" on Thursday at Mrs. McMullin's. Your friend, ADA VEN.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 30, 1880.

It is the business of government to shape itself to the actual and not the ideal or millennial condition of mankind. * * * Since the nation began we have been free, and our liberty is in danger from nothing but its own excesses.—Francis Parkman.

THE DECLINE OF HIS "BOOM."

Mr. George William Curtis, writing in Harper's Weekly, says:

"If he were President for the third time, and the tradition of the two terms were once overthrown, why might it not be said in 1883 still more cogently, that he had greatly served the country and ought to be again elected? Would not such apparently logical and reasonable action, to which the Constitution offers no bar, necessarily familiarize the public mind with a perpetual Presidency? Would not the impatience and disgust already felt by many with the increasing turmoil and excitement attendant upon the quadrennial election generate a disposition, under the circumstances we suppose, to dispense with such an election? Again, would not the same circumstances necessarily foster confidence in personal government, and encourage the feeling that this or that man is necessary to the peaceful continuance and administration of the Government? And can any idea be more preposterous and dangerous? Once more, when the two-term tradition is gone, and some President of uncertain uprightness and patriotism, in full command of the patronage, should come to the end of the second term, would not a powerful restraint upon his ambition and resolution have been removed?"

The Philadelphia Press of the 13th presents a summary of the Pennsylvania opinions on the Presidential question, reaching almost all the counties of the State:

"It makes clear," says the Press "that among the influential leaders of Republican thought, the expression against the third-term movement is conspicuously general."

The New Era, Lancaster (Republican) says:

"The Republican sentiment of this county is overwhelmingly against a third term. The masses are for Blaine as their first choice, with a growing sentiment for Washburne as the best man to compromise upon."

Nevada Territorial Enterprise:

"Some of our miners have it put up that when Gen. Grant gets down into Mexico, the people there will invite him to become emperor, and that he will place the crown upon his head and climb up into the throne. As soon as he is seated the 'boys' will then go down and run the mines for him, and the old '49ers' will flock to his standard and be made dukes, lords, and counts, and things, and they say it would never do to throw off on an old pioneer like Grant."

Pittsburg Post:

"Grant's old letter to Harry White is again re-vamped, to prove that he felt sore over the resolution of the second State in the Union against a third term and hinting at Caesarism. But he says he don't want the third term any more than he wanted the first, but, like Barkis, he is willing, if Don Cameron and others will buckle fortune on his back, to accept the responsibilities. He is like the Irishman who was asked to take a drink: he said he was a poor hand at refusing."

Detroit Free Press:

"When, in sight of the audience and reporters, a man turns his glass down at a public banquet, tells the Methodist clergymen that the Methodist Church was always on the right side during the war, that Sherman's burned chimneys can be seen along the railways he has just ridden upon, while his can't, you may be sure that man is not thinking about the presidency of the Nicaragua ship canal. The symptoms are getting strong."

The Hon. William Heilman, Republican Congressman from the Evansville (Ind.) District, and a power among the Germans, says he does not believe Grant can carry Indiana. The German vote will not support him. They do not like the idea of a third term, or anything looking toward a one-man power:

"My parents left Germany because they did not want their sons to be soldiers," said Mr. Heilman. "They were tired of a strong paternal government, and I have no doubt thousands, yes, the majority of the Germans left the old country for the same reason. Now they will vote against any tendency in that direction in this country."

From the Philadelphia Evening Telegraph—Republican:

"Our correspondent knows that the so-called ovation of the people in this city, which never rose above the dignity of the most apparent machine work and curbstone excitement, was manufactured by the Cameron clansmen to order, at a vast outlay of time and money and labor; that it had no spontaneity in it whatever; and that the moment the machinery ceased to work, the 'boom' died into silence or opposition. It is comparatively but a few days since Gen. Grant left Philadelphia, and yet he is apparently as nearly forgotten as if he had never been here."

A Washington special to the Philadelphia Press says:

"A Philadelphia politician is in town. He reports that the Grant enthusiasm in both that city and the State had rapidly subsided since the ex-President's great reception, and that the 'boom' is now fast ebbing away. So much opposition to the third-term idea is developing that he does not believe it will be possible to instruct the delegates to Chicago, chosen at the February convention, for Grant."

We shall for the present close these extracts. We consider the game won. We will conclude with an extract from the N. Y. Nation, the conclusion of an able article denouncing and opposing the nomination of Gen. Grant for a third term:

"As to the real facts of his prospects just now, we think, without exaggeration or distortion, it may be said that they are these: The persons who push him most actively still largely deny that they themselves wish to see him nominated, and represent that they are simply preparing to carry out an irresistible popular decree. The enthusiastic popular support of a third term is very apt not to be visible in the place where we hear of it, but in some other State or section. A canvass in any particular locality of prominent or representative persons usually fails to show that Grant is the strongest candidate in the field, and brings out a great deal of doubt about the propriety of putting him forward. His failure to come to New York, and his retirement—or so it may be considered—to the South, indicate a fear that the enthusiasm inspired by his presence may not, now that it has begun to wear the look of electioneering, last until next summer, and that 'the boom' was begun a little too soon. The discussion of the objections to his nomination becomes every day more outspoken, and proves that there is no general acceptance of the doctrine that a third term is not a third term unless it follows the other two in succession. The reluctance to admit that the United States needs a 'strong man,' or that the Constitution will not work without a soldier in the background, grows with deliberation and debate, and with the gradual subsidence of the alarm about the 'Solid South.' In certain States—Ohio, Wisconsin, and New York, for instance—there is a German and independent vote which probably can not be induced to accept him, whether nominated or not, and without which these States can not be carried by the Republicans. It is safe to predict, finally, that between now and June all these difficulties in the way of Gen. Grant's nomination will increase rather than diminish, and that the boom will end, as it ended in 1876, in a kind of collapse."

The ugliest of all ugly new designs is a walking dress which has an apron front, and a back composed of a single breadth of goods shirred just below the belt, and falling absolutely straight.

Many public men consider themselves the pillars of the State, who are more properly the State's caterpillars, in their high positions by crawling.

MARK TWAIN AND DAN DE QUILLE.

The Carson Appeal prints the following:

It was nearly twenty years ago when Dan De Quille and Mark Twain attempted to start a paper in Mendocino County. They took the type and material of their recently defunct newspaper establishment in San Francisco, and, loading the stuff on a big wagon, struck out into the country to retrieve their fortune. They packed their type just as it stood in the forms, tied up the articles with stout cords by a process well known to printers, and, packing them closely in boxes, vowed to establish a newspaper somewhere which would be the leading exponent of politics and history for the Pacific Coast. Had not an unfortunate circumstance taken place it is evident that the newspaper which they contemplated founding would have been alive to-day. Their journey over the mountains was utterly uneventful until they reached Simpson's Station, a spot well known to old travelers on that route. Here they met a party of emigrants making for Lower California, and the latter had with them a small mountain howitzer which they had brought with them across the plains.

Twain took a great fancy to this gun, and offered fifty dollars for it, with two kegs of powder. The emigrants were glad enough to part with it, as they concluded the time for its use had passed. Dan thought the purchase of the artillery and military supplies was a reckless piece of extravagance, and said as much, but Mark replied:

"When we start our paper we must fire a salute. A newspaper office with artillery has a big bulge on the business. No well-regulated office in California should be without a howitzer. If a man comes in for a retraction we can blow him into the next county. The howitzer goes."

This silenced argument, and the next day the two journalists took the road with their printing outfit and artillery.

The next night they camped in a mountain ravine, fifteen miles from Simpson's, and after building the usual camp-fire, fell asleep. About eleven o'clock the horses awakened them by prancing about, and the two journalists were led to the conclusion that a party of Indians was making arrangements for a night attack. In the clear moonlight human forms could be distinguished about half a mile away at the foot of the ravine. The idea of encountering Indians had never entered the heads of the two fortune-seekers, and they had no arms. Suddenly Twain brightened up, remarking:

"The howitzer?"

"We've got nothing but powder," said Dan.

"Well, powder'll scare 'em; and we'll load her up."

The piece was immediately loaded with a good big charge, and the two men felt quite certain that the Indians, hearing the roar of the gun, would beat an unconditional retreat. The piece was hardly loaded and placed in position when about forty of the red-skins came charging up the ravine.

Twain seized a brand from the camp-fire and was about to lay it on the touch-hole, when Dan yelled "Hold on!" as he rammed something into the mouth of the piece and remarked:

"Turn'er loose."

The roar of the howitzer echoed through the lonely forest, and the savages, with frantic cries of pain, reeled down the ravine in wild confusion.

"What in h— did you put in?" asked Mark.

"A column of solid nonpareil and a couple of sticks of your spring poetry."

"The poetry did the business, Dan. Get one of your geological articles ready for the next charge, and I guess it'll let the red devils out for the present campaign."

The savages again advanced. Mark attended to the powder, and Dan assorted the shot, so to speak.

"Jeems Pipes's song, 'My Mountain Home,'"

"Good for three Indians—sock'er in."

"An acoustic by John B. Ridge, in long primer."

"It'll paralyze 'em."

"Frank Pixley on the Constitution—half a column of leaded brevier."

"If it hits 'em, the day is won."

"Your leader on 'Law and Order.'"

"Save it as a last resort."

Dan pulled the type out of the boxes, and stuffed column after column in the howitzer's mouth as the savages came charging on. Another round from the gun, and the redskins rolled over and over each other, like boulders swept away by a mountain cloud-burst. Mark, in an ecstasy of delight, pulled an American flag out of his effects, nailed it to the tail-board of the wagon, and was about to make a speech, when the dusky figures of the foes were once more seen moving to the attack.

The piece was again loaded, and this time with a double charge. Mark's leader on "Law and Order," the puff of an auction house, by Fred McCrellish, "as a sickener," Dao said; Frank Gross's verses on "The Rebel Yell," an agricultural article by Sam Seabaugh, showing the chemical properties of corn-juice as an educational lever; a maiden poetical effort by Olive Harper, and some verses by Col. Cremony and Frank Soule completed the load.

"That poetry reaching 'em first will throw 'em into confusion, and my editorial coming up on the heels of the rest will result in a lasting demoralization. It will be like the last cavalry charge of the French troopers at the battle of Austerlitz."

For the third and last time the faithful howitzer belched its typographical compliments to the advancing foe. The havoc was terrible. There was a wild yell from a score of savage throats, and then the low groans of the dying floated up the ravine on the gentle wind. The two men walked over the field of slaughter and counted fifty-six aborigines lying in heaps. The bodies were horribly mutilated with nonpareil, bourgeois, "caps," misery dashes, and unassorted pi.

"My leader cooked that man's goose," said Mark, pointing to a savage hanging over the limb of a cedar.

"My geological article did the business for him," rejoined Dan, nodding carelessly at an Indian whose head was lying twenty yards away.

"The pen is mightier than the sword."

"You bet. Hurrah for Faust and Gutenberg!"

"Is there any type left?"

"Not a pound."

Ten days later the two journalistic tramps reached Virginia City, weary, discouraged, and footsore, and secured places in the Enterprise.

A few days ago Dan received the following from his former partner:

HARTFORD, Connecticut, January 1, 1880.

DEAR DAN:—I send you the congratulations of the New Year. Do you recollect the time we exterminated the tribe of unlettered (?) savages in Mendocino County? If you can spare the time I wish you would make a pilgrimage to that historic spot, gather the ghostly relics together, and plant a tablet (not too expensive and at your own expense) to the memory of the departed. Have a shooting-stick lying across a long bow, with our monogram and coat of arms entwined, and some appropriate epitaph carved on the stone; an extract from Carl Schurz's views on the "Peace Policy" might do. Enclosed is a dollar and a half for your incidental expenses; you can deadhead traveling expenses.

Yours,

MARK TWAIN.

M. T.

Dan will attend to the matter in the spring. The old bowitzer used on the occasion is still in his possession.

"Sports that Kill"

The sentimental humorist of the New York Times writes: "While in our own city revolting imitations of the Roman gladiatorial shows have been in progress, a California community has surpassed the atrocity of Spanish bull-fights by a match between a mule and a locomotive. The mule was a large and bony army mule, and the locomotive was one of the celebrated Paterson breed. A circular track was built in a large temporary amphitheatre, on which the locomotive was run at full speed, and the mule was let loose into the arena to deal with its antagonist as it saw fit. The mule watched the locomotive for some time, with its ears in a threatening attitude, and when the locomotive had attained a speed of fully fifty miles an hour, backed up in front of it and delivered a kick with both feet. The locomotive was brought to an instant stop, trembling in every wheel, while a hot perspiration covered its surface. After being carefully sponged off, and stimulated with small coals, the miserable locomotive was again set in motion. This time the mule kicked it with such terrific violence as to break its funnel short off and to smash its headlight. Mowing with pain, the locomotive was once more sponged, and its wounds bound up with sheet-iron. At this point several ladies left the amphitheatre, being unable to witness any longer so brutal a spectacle, but the inhuman owner of the locomotive ordered time to be called, and the combat to be renewed. The mule waited till the locomotive was running at an estimated speed of sixty-seven miles per hour, and then delivered its final kick. The hapless locomotive was hurled some thirty feet from the track, and was taken up with its boiler ruptured, its eccentrics dislocated, and its connecting rods broken. It breathed its last steam in a few moments, in great apparent suffering, and the mule was declared the victor. A more revolting spectacle has probably never been witnessed in any Spanish bull-ring, and when we remember that this brutal fight occurred at the very time that the wretched chess-players were undergoing torture in this city, we can not shut our eyes to the fact that we have eclipsed, in the nineteenth century, the worst barbarities of Rome and Madrid."

It is not only the great or wealthy who can moralize; the social nonentity can, or thinks he can; at all events, he does. In support of which position, as follows:

Scene—A House of Entertainment. Dramatis Personæ—Half a dozen Hewers of Wood and Drawers of Water. Time—Last week.

First H. of W.—"An' fwbat d'ye thiok o' this hystin' o' the yellow flag, b'ys?"

Second H. of W.—"I hear the veshel's comin' into port to-morrow."

Third ditto—"Divil a fear; she's in curranteen, an' the shmall-pox is aboard."

First ditto—"I tell yez she'll be in the city front by Monday; now mind me."

Third ditto—"Then if she is, we should set her afire, an' the city, too."

This ebullition of feeling soothed and vindicated the sovereignty of the people, as represented by the moralists in question, and they passed on to discuss topics of general interest. It was agreed that Jim Keene was a "shmart" gambler, but incapable of holding a candle to Jay Gould. He was much extolled for having knocked down Vanderbilt in the public "shstreet" and "shstamped" upon him. This heroic feat won for him golden opinions. It was resolved that all the railroads in the country, east and west, had combined to defraud the public, and that any man who wanted to go anywhere should either walk or beat them. It was agreed that people to the East had some "grit," but that Californians had none; that they were poor, abject slaves; that there was no public spirit among them; that every man was for himself, and, provided he succeeded in filling his own pockets, didn't "give a d—n" for his neighbors or the community at large. There was more said, but this is a fair sample. We give it without comment for what it is worth—the rest of the reading matter in this paper costs ten cents.

Dr. Montcalm, great grandson of the famous Marquis, has come to the front, not as a nobleman, but as an inventor. The doctor, although in reduced circumstances, claims that he has all the diamonds, rubies, and pearls of the cave of Ali Baba at his command. In other words, he can turn out the gems to order, and manufacture diamonds as big as a cart-wheel. Hotel clerks and barkeepers to be supplied at reduced rates, and with none of the risks that Aladdin encountered. Here is a chance for the poet laureate and grand high chamberlain, G. W. Childs, to lay in the imperial crown jewels for his friend Grant at cost price. The doctor is poor, and will only charge the cost of the carbon and a sky parlor.

Vinnie Ream-Hoxie, in a big gingham apron, is a terror to the men in the foundry of the Washington Navy Yard, where they are doing Admiral Farragut in bronze. Vinnie flies around like a bee in a tar bucket. The model is ten feet high, and represents the Admiral standing on the deck of his ship, with his foot on a coil of rope, and in the act of raising a marine glass to his eyes. Senator Davis has introduced a bill to authorize the erection of a statue to Chief Justice Marshall, and Vinnie, it is said, is to get the contract. Could that great jurist have lived to know that he was to be bisected after death by the irrepressible Vinnie, the thought would have given death an additional pang.

CHIPS FROM OTHER BLOCKHEADS.

An Irishman says he can see no earthly reason why women should not be allowed to become medical men.

A blockhead, who does not understand the grammatical value of the editorial "we," tries to be funny as follows: When we first donned our new ulster, we felt so much like a woman that we couldn't keep our hands out of our upper side-pockets, and we hugged ourselves all the way home.

Only a pin with gleaming point,
Nestled within a chair;
Only a small boy snickering while
A step is heard on the stair.
Only an upward leap through space,
And a torrent of oaths and screeches,
While the bent pin glistens in the rear
Of the old man's Sunday breeches.

Ladies now carry daggers in their stockings, and there are men mean enough to pick a quarrel with a pretty woman just to see her go down for her weapon.

Oh, banded with pansy and curtained with white,
Yellow with gold from the sunset sky,
Laced with the shadeflets of latticing light,
Silken and soft as a vanishing sigh—
Oh, what can you say of a bonnet, doggonnit,
When writing a sonnet upon it?

The Government of the United States has asked Mexico to help it whip a few Indians in the Southwest. This is a good plan. Now, if it could get England to take bold of the red-skins in the North, we might manage to get along.

One of the best stories of Yankees "sitting on" "Britisbers" for their tipping system was said by a New York editor, and comes to us by way of London. Mr. Willie Winter certainly ought to set up as a paragon. "When that accomplished journalist, Mr. William Winter, was about to return to his native country, after a sojourn here of some months, he mounted the 'bridge' of the steamboat as she was getting clear of her moorings, and, taking off his hat to the crowd assembled on the jetty at Liverpool, exclaimed: 'Gentlemen, if there's anybody in your island to whom I have not given a sbliling, now's his time to speak!'"

It is true that Mr. Miller has engaged in stock speculations, but he has not abandoned poetry, as will be seen by the following:

And it is gone! Gone like a breath;
Gone like a white sail seen at night
A moment and then lost to sight;
Gone like a star you gaze upon,
That glimmers to a bead, a speck,
Then softly melts into the dawn,
And all is still and dark as death.
And then you dance around and swear,
And snatch out handfuls of your hair,
Because you bought a "put," a "call,"
And didn't have 'r sense at all.

"Came to his death by being struck on the head with a stone flung violently by the hand of some person to the jury unknown," was the verdict. He was learning to play the cornet.

They hung a local poet in China the other day, and the missionaries point with gratification to the act as an evidence that the Pagan horde is slowly drifting toward Christianity.

It was a very mean man who slipped his band between the heads of a young man and young lady in the front seat as the train entered a tunnel. He said afterward the young man's beard was very stiff, but the pressure on the other side of his hand felt like the tips of a fur tie.

In a poem read by Robert Grant, at the recent reunion of the Alumni of the Boston Latin School, was the following:

Our great public schools—may their influence spread
Until statesmen use grammar, and dunces are dead:
Until no one dare say, in this land of the free,
"He done" for "he did," or "it's her" for "it's she."

"What is hell?" asked a Lutheran Sunday-school teacher of a boy, in class, last Sabbath. "A shirt with a button off, ma'am," replied the boy. "Explain yourself; what do you mean, sir?" demanded the meek-spirited, but surprised teacher. "Well, I heard my pa say to my ma the other morning, when he put on a shirt with the neck-button off, 'Well, this is hell.' That's all I know about it."

There will be very many marriages in society this winter, because so many are enjoying the delights of the Salem Sunbeam's menu of courtship:

A bunch of flowers,
A book or two,
A little billing,
A little coo,
A little coming
And going, till
They go to church
And say: "I will."

A young man has come who a yarn'll
Repeat, about Irish needs carnal.
It sounds just as well
To call him Parnell.
But the right way to name him is Parnell.

An English undergraduate at examination, on being asked to repeat the parable of the "Good Samaritan," thus did it: "A certain man journeyed from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves." Then he stopped. "Go on, sir," said the examiner. "And—" "And what? Go on, sir." "And the thieves sprang up and choked him!"

He took his sled into the road
And, lord a massy! how he slide.
And as he slid he laughing cried,
"What fun upon my sled to slide."
And as he laughed, before he knewed,
He from that sliding sled was shude.
Upon the slab where he was laid
They carved this line: "This boy was slade."

A TWICE TOLD TALE.

Paddy the Piper.

"I'll tell you, sir, a mighty quare story. 'Twas afther night-fall, and we wor sittin' round the fire, and the pratees was boilin', and the nogginns of buttermilk was standin' ready for our suppers, whin a knock kem to the door. 'Whist,' says my father; 'here's the sojers come upon us now,' says he. 'Bad luck to thim, the villains. I'm afear'd they seen a glimmer of the fire through the crack in the door,' says he.

"No," says my mother, 'for I'm afther hanging an ould sack and my new petticoat agin it, a while ago.'

"Well, whist, anyhow," says my father, 'for there's a knock agin'; and we all held our tongues till another thump kem to the door.

"Oh, it's folly to putind any more," says my father; 'they're too cute to be put off that-a-way,' says he. 'Go, Shamus,' says he to me, 'and see who's in it.'

"How can I see who's in it in the dark?" says I.

"Well," says he, 'light the candle, thin, and see who's in it. But don't open the door for your life, barrin' they break it in,' says he, 'exceptin' to the sojers; and spake them fair, if it's thim.'

"So with that, I wint to the door, and there was another knock.

"Who's there?" says I.

"It's me," says he.

"Who are you?" says I.

"A friend," says he.

"Bathin'?" says I; 'who are you, at all?'

"Arrah! don't you know me?" says he.

"Divil a taste," says I.

"Sure, I'm Paddy the Piper," says he.

"Oh, thunder and turf!" says I; 'is it you, Paddy, that's in it?'

"Sorra one else," says he.

"And what brought you at this hour?" says I.

"By gar," says he, 'I didn't like goin' the roun' by the road,' says he, 'and so I kem the short cut, and that's what delayed me,' says he.

* * * * *

"Faix then," says I, 'you had better lose no time in hidin' yourself,' says I; 'for troth I tell you, it's a short thrial and a long rope the Hussians would be afther givin' you—for they've no justice, and less marcy, the villains!'

"Faith, thin, more's the raison you should let me in, Shamus," says poor Paddy.

"It's a folly to talk," says I; 'I darn't open the door.'

"Oh, then, millia murther!" says Paddy, 'what'll become of me at all, at all?' says he.

"Go aff into the shed," says I, 'behind the house, where the cow is, and there there's an illigant lock o' straw, that you may go asleep in,' says I; 'and a fine bed it id be for a lord, let alone a piper.'

* * * * *

"Paddy hid himself in the cow-house; and now I must tell how it was with Paddy. You see, afther sleeping for some time, Paddy wakened up, thinkin' it was mornin', but it wasn't mornin' at all, but only the light o' the moon that deceived him; but, at all evints, he wanted to be stirrin' airly, bekase he was going off to the town hard by, it bein' fair-day, to pick up a few ha'pence with his pipes—for the divil a better piper was in all the country round nor Paddy; and every one gave it up to Paddy, that he was illigant an the pipes, and played 'Jinny bang'd the Weaver,' beyant tellin', and the 'Hare in the Corn,' that you'd think the very dogs was in it, and the horsemen ridin' like mad.

"Well, as I was sayin', he set off to go to the fair, and he wint meanderin' along through the fields; but he didn't go far, until climbin' up through a hedge, when he was coming out at t'other side, he kem plump agin somethin' that made the fire flash out iv his eyes. So with that he looks up—and what do you think it was, Lord be merciful unto us! but a corpse hangin' out of a branch of a tree? 'Oh, the top of the mornin' to you, sir,' says Paddy; 'and is that the way with you, my poor fellow? Troth you took a start out o' me,' says poor Paddy; and 'twas thrue for him, for it would make the heart of a stouter man nor Paddy jump to see the like, and to think of a Christian crathur being hanged up, all as one as a dog.

"Says Paddy, eyein' the corpse, 'By my sowl, thin, but you have a beautiful pair of boots an you,' says he; 'and it's what I'm thinkin' you won't have any great use for thim no more; and sure it's a shame to see the likes o' me,' says he, 'the best piper in the sivin counties, to be trampin' wid a pair of ould brogues not worth three transens, and a corpse wid such an illigant pair o' boots, that wants some one to wear thim.' So with that, Paddy laid hould of him by the boots, and began a pullin' at thim, but they wor mighty stiff; and whether it was by rayson of their bein' so tight, or the branch of tree a-jiggin' up and down, all as one as a weighdee buckettee, and not lettin' Paddy cotch any right hould o' thim, he could get no advantage o' thim at all; and at last he gev it up, and was goin' away, whin, lookin' behind him agin, the sight of the illigant fine boots was too much for him, and he turned back—outs with his knife, and what does he do, but he cuts off the legs av the corpse; 'and,' says he, 'I can take aff the boots at my convaynience.' And troth it was, as I said before, a dirty turn.

"Well, sir, he tuck'd up the legs undher his arm, and at that minit the moon peeped out from behind a cloud. 'Oh! is it there you are?' says he to the moon, for he was an impident chap; and thin, seein' that he made a mistake, and that the moonlight deceived him, and that it wasn't the airly dawn, as he conceived, and bein' frikened for fear himself might be cotched and trated like the poor corpse he was afther malthreatin' if he was found walkin' the country at that time, by gar! he turned about and walked back agin to the cow-house, and hidin' the corpse's legs in the straw, Paddy wint to sleep agin. But what do you think? the divil a long Paddy was there until the sojers kem in airnest, and, by the powers, they carried off Paddy; and faith it was only sarvin' him right for what he done to the poor corpse.

"Well, whin the morning kem, my father says to me, 'Go, Shamus,' says he, 'to the shed, and bid poor Paddy come in, and take share o' the pratees; for I go bail he's ready for his breakquest by this, anyhow.'

"Well, out I wint to the cow-house, and called out 'Paddy!' And, afther callin' three or four times, and gettin' no answer, I wint in an called agin, and divil an answer I got still. 'Blood-an-agers!' says I, 'Paddy, where are you, at all, at all?' And so, castin' my eyes about the shed, I seen two feet stickin' out from under the hape o' sthraw. 'Musha! thin,' says I, 'bad luck to you, Paddy, but you're fond of a warm corner; and maybe you haven't made yourself as snug as a flay in a blanket! But I'll disturb your dhrame, I'm thinkin'; says I, and with that I laid hould of his heels (as I thought), and, givin' a good pull to waken him, as I intinded, away I wint, head over heels, and my brains was a'most knocked out agin the wall.

"Well, whin I recovered myself, there I was, on the broad o' my back, and two things stickin' out o' my hands, like a pair of Hussian's horse-pistils; and I thought the sight'd lave my eyes whin I seen they wor two mortal legs. My jew'l, I threw them down like a hot pratee, and, jumpin' up, I roared out millia murther. 'Oh, you murtherin' villain,' says I, shaking my fist at the cow. 'Oh, you unnath'ral baste,' says I; 'you've ate poor Paddy, you thievinn' cannable; you're worse than a neyger,' says I. 'And bad luck to you, how dainty you are, that nothin' d serve you for your supper but the best piper in Ireland!'

* * * * *

"With that, I ran out, for throth I didn't like to be near her; and, goin' into the house, I tould them all about it.

"Arrah! be aisy," says my father.

"Bad luck to the lie I tell you," says I.

"Is it ate Paddy?" says they.

"Divil a doubt of it," says I.

"Are you sure, Shamus?" says my mother.

"I wish I was as sure of a new pair of brogues," says I. 'Bad luck to the bit she has left iv him but his two legs.'

"And do you tell me she ate the pipes, too?" says my father.

"By gor, I b'lieve so," says I.

"Oh, the divil fly away wid her," says he; 'what a cruel taste she has for music!'

"Arrah!" says my mother, 'don't be cursing the cow that gives milk to the childher.'

"Yis, I will," says my father; 'why shouldn't I curse sitch an unnath'ral baste?'

"You oughn't to curse any livin' that's undher your roof," says my mother.

"By my sowl, thin," says my father, 'she shan't be undher my roof any more; for I'll send her to the fair this minit,' says he, 'and sell her for whatever she'll bring. Go aff,' says he, 'Shamus, the minit you've ate your breakquest, and dhrive her to the fair.'

"Troth, I don't like to dhrive her," says I.

"Arrah! don't be makin' a gommagh of yourself," says he.

"Faith, I don't," says I.

"Well, like or no like," says he, 'you must dhrive her.'

* * * * *

"Well, away we wint along the road, and mighty throng'd it wuz wid the boys and the girls, and, in short, all sorts, rich and poor, high and low, crowdin' to the fair.

"God save you," says one to me.

"God save you, kindly," says I.

"That's a fine beast you're dhivin'," says he.

"Troth she is," says I; though God knows it wint agin my heart to say a good word for the likes of her. I dhrive her into the thick av of the fair, whin, all of a suddint, as I kem to the door av a tint, up struck the pipes to the tune av 'Tattherin' Jack Walsh,' and, my jew'l, in a minit the cow cock'd her ears, and was makin' a dart at the tint.

"Oh, murther!" says I, to the boys standin' by; 'hould her,' says I, 'hould her—she ate one piper already, the vagabone, and, bad luck to her, she wants another now.'

"Is it a cow for to ate a piper?" says one o' thim.

"Divil a word o' lie in it, for I seen its corpse myself, and nothin' left but the two legs," says I; 'and it's a folly to be strivin' to hide it, for I see she'll never lave it off—as poor Paddy Grogan knows to his cost, Lord be merciful to him.'

"Who's that takin' my name in vain?" says a voice in the crowd; and with that, shovin' the throng a one side, who the divil should I see but Paddy Grogan, to all appearance.

"Oh, hould him, too," says I; 'keep him aff me, for it's not himself at all, but his ghost,' says I; 'for he was kilt last night, to my sartin knowledge, every inch av him, all to his legs.'

"Well, sir, with that, Paddy—for it was Paddy himself, as it kem out afther—fell a laughin' so that you'd think his sides 'ud split. And whin he kem to himself, he ups and he tould uz how it was, as I tould you already. And av coorse the poor slandered cow was dhruv home agin, and many a quiet day she had wid uz afther that; and whin she died, throth, my father had sich a regard for the poor thing that he had her skinned, and an illigant pair of breeches made out iv her hide, and it's in the family to this day. And isn't it mighty remarkable, what I'm goin' to tell you now—but it's as thrue as I'm here—that, from that out, any one that has thim breeches an, the minit a pair o' pipes strikes up, they can't rest, but goes jiggin' and jiggin' in their sate, and never stops as long as the pipes is playin'—and there, there is the very breeches that's an me now, and a fine pair they are this minit."

A writer in the Boston Home Journal says: "I asked a young gentleman not long ago why he went to hear Mr. Cook. I was curious, because I knew that his tastes and beliefs were so opposed to those of the lecturer. The answer was: 'Because he uses such big words, and so many of 'em. It is positively interesting to hear him begin to abuse something or somebody, and then to hear the words rattle out. Cook is a roaring good actor!' At the Holmes breakfast one of our best known writers said suddenly to me: 'Since I have come into this room I have changed my opinion very decidedly about a man I was very much prejudiced against.' 'Who is that?' I inquired, with not a little curiosity. 'Joe Cook. I never had seen him before, but had read the reports of his lectures. I see now, as I look at him, that he believes all he says, so I can forgive him.'" We can not.

BABY VERSE.

"To Talk of Children is to Teach of God."

Miss Tomboy.

Princess of petty pets;
Tomboy in trouserettes;
Eyes are like violets—
Gleefully glancing!
Skin, like an otter sleek,
Nose, like a baby-Greek,
Sweet little dimple cheek—
Merrily dancing!

Lark-like her song it trills,
Over the dale and hills,
Hark how her laughter thrills!
Joyously joking,
Rolling in daffodils,
Wading in mountain rills,
Heedless of snowy frills—
Creasing and soaking.

Naughty but best of girls,
Through life she gaily twirls
Shaking her sunny curls—
Laughing at folly.
Ev'ry one on her notes,
Carolling merry notes,
Pet in short petticoats—
This is Miss Dolly.

—Austin Dobson.

An Atlantic Picture.

Don't you hear the children coming,
Coming into school?
Don't you hear the master drumming
On the window with his rule?
Master drumming, children coming,
Hurriedly to school.

Tiptoe fingers reach the catch,
Tiny fingers click the latch,
Curly-headed girls throng in,
Lily free from toil and sin;
Breezy boys flock in together,
Bringing breaths of winter weather,
Bringing baskets Indian checked,
Dinners in them sadly wrecked;
Ruddy handed, mittens off,
Soldiers from the Malakoff—
Built of snow all marble white,
Rastions shining in the light,
Marked with many a dint and dot
Of the ice-cold cannon shot!
Hear the last assailing shout,
See the gunners sally out,
Charge upon the battered door,
School is called, and battle o'er.

—Charles Leroy.

School-Days.

Once more by mount and meadow side,
The merry bells are ringing,
Once more by vale and river wide,
The school-room doors are swinging;
Forgotten books win pensive looks,
And slates come forth from cover,
For hand in hand to lesson-land
Go little lass and lover.

—Laura Crane.

A Little Flatterer.

He calls me, with fond loyalty, "The Queen,"
This youngest subject of my narrow realm,
And says, with sweetest kisses rained between,
And clinging arms, all doubts to overwhelm:
"You are the prettiest lady that I know!"
What more, if it were so?

"Your cheeks are just as soft! I think your eyes
Are brighter than the eyes of any bird,
As bright as any star up in the skies!
And your hair shines like silk! Yis, every word,
It is all true! And, there, now when you smile—"
O, he would grief beguile!

And I, with yearning heart, take all for true!

Yes, thus, grown very vain, I would be fair,
And ever blooming with bright youth, to you;
Even when pale sorrows lead to silvery hair,
And stealthy wrinkles follow burning tears,
Down the relentless years.

Ah, little love, I bless your partial eyes,
So sweet their blindness; they bestow dear dower
Of deathless beauty; for thus love defies
All bold defects, and T-me's remorseless power;
And still you rose-wreath, in your winsome way,
The dull cross of my day!

—Celeste Winslow.

Little Lovers.

Wee little lovers, aged six and ten,
Aping the manners of women and men,
He so ardent, and she so shy,
Only when somebody else is by—
When they're alone, this bright-haired miss
Gives her wee lover a soft, warm kiss,

Lovers will come to her feet to woo,
What is the dear little damsel to do?
Is it her fault that they love her so?
Is it her fault that they won't take No?

—Agnes Irving.

Two and Two.

A brown head and a golden head
Above the violets keep in sight;
Dark eyes and blue (with tears to shed)
Look laughing toward me in the light.
A red-bird flashes from the tree:
"The world is glad, is glad!" sings he.

A golden head, a head of brown,
Below the violets, miss the sun;
Dark eyes and blue—their lids shut down—
With tears (and theirs were brief) have done.
A dove hides in another tree:
"The world is sad, is sad!" grieves she.

Through song and moan, I hardly know,
Between the red-bird and the dove,
If most I'd wish that two below
The violets were with two above,
Or two above the violets lay
With two below them deep.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 31, 1880.

It requires some patience and a great deal of amiability to discuss the question of the purchase of the waters of Lake Merced by the city and for the use of its people. We know that it is a fraud and a swindle. We know that its waters are impure and insufficient. We know that the price is exorbitant. We know that it is a dead, cold, long-planned attempt to steal. We know the men who are engaged in it. We know the personal motives that prompt it. We have a near guess as to where the money will go, and with whom it is to be divided. We think we could name the knaves who are working for it in and around the Board of Supervisors, in and around the Legislature, in and around the newspaper press. We know the argument advanced by demagogues in the Board to catch demagogues out of the Board is arrant nonsense and demagoguery. We know that the scheme is illegal, and that every step taken ought to be a step in the direction of the penitentiary at San Quentin; and that every dollar taken out of the treasury and out of the pockets of taxpayers is in defiance of law, good morals, and decency. This is a rich man's swindle. It embraces several millionaires, a bank or two, many politicians—in and out of office. All the great swindles are rich men's swindles. We never heard of a conspiracy among men of small means to rob the treasury, either State or municipal. We never heard of a conspiracy to steal land, money, or franchise that had not in its councils rich men, able lawyers, leading citizens and officials. This one beats any that we have ever heard of. Tweed, in his boldest days of unchecked crime, never attempted so bold and cheeky a robbery as we think this to be. Our rich men are sowing to the wind, and in time they will reap the whirlwind. They are setting the example of despising the law and setting at defiance the rights of the people. This fraud, like all other frauds, and like all extortions and extravagances, settles down upon the land and lot owners; the tax-payer must eventually either pay or repudiate these bonds. The property of this city—we mean its real estate—is not owned by wealthy men, as a rule. If the time ever comes when water bonds, avenue bonds, and other swindling securities are repudiated, they will be found in the strong-boxes of the rich, and not among the poor or the tax-payers. The time will inevitably come when the tax-payers, as a body, will be compelled to defend themselves against the aggression of thieves. When that time comes it will not be surprising if they do not discriminate between just and unjust debts. Communism is a great horror; but to be robbed and impoverished by municipal thieves, assenting millionaires, hanks, and politicians, is a greater.

Our people are gradually settling down to a stolid indifference to official jobbery and thievery that almost resembles approval. Twenty years ago, had the Mahoney Lake Merced Swindle been pushed as now, we verily believe that the carcasses of seven Supervisors would have been found swinging to seven lamp-posts the morning after such a vote as that of Monday night on that measure. What are the facts? Seven miles from the city there is an outflow of water called Lake Merced, that for ages has fallen from the clouds, and not being necessary for any use, has wasted itself in the sea. The land on the shores of the lake belongs to various individuals: The Hibernia Bank, or David Mahoney, owns about half, the Spring Valley Water Company owns a large share, and certain other owners the rest. The water flowing off into the sea belongs to anybody who needs it, to drink or for any other useful purpose. This principle of law is as old as the oldest of law-givers, and no other rule has ever been known in any community, civilized or uncivilized; and if there ever was any doubt, the new Constitution just adopted has settled the principle forever by providing in express terms that the right to collect compensation for water use is a franchise, and can only be enforced by legislative enactment and in accordance with prescribed forms. This means that the people can help themselves to water to drink wherever they can find it, and when they permit any person or corporation to charge them for its use it must be in return not only for the value of the water, but also for the expense or trouble the company or individual has incurred in bringing it there. It means that anybody can repair to the banks of Lake Merced and can drink, and that what individuals can do singly the community can do in its organized capacity. And this is what it did when the Spring Valley Company, an organized branch of the municipal machinery, put its pipe in the lake and pumped at the rate of three millions of gallons a day and distributed it to our people. Why did not Mahoney stop them if he owned the water they were taking away? He knew better, and remained silent. Any company—indeed, the city without a company—has the right now to take the water. Mahoney has nothing to sell but his land, which would be a bad purchase to-day at two hundred thousand dollars. But it seems he wants to sell it through the machinery of the Rogers Act. That act provided that three commissioners should procure a supply of water for this city; the commission was the Mayor, the Auditor, and the District Attorney; those officers were to condemn any land or water they might deem "requisite and necessary" for that purpose. The language of the statute placed the whole matter within the discretion of the commissioners; they were to acquire such land and water as they might deem "requisite and necessary;" they were to purchase it from the owners by direct negotiation if they could agree. If they failed to agree they could appoint appraisers to appraise the property. This they did. They appointed three appraisers, but before the appraisers were approved by the Supervisors—which approval the statute required—they, the commissioners, reconsidered their action and resolved that in their discretion and judgment Lake Merced was not "requisite and necessary," and ought not to be purchased. When this rescinding action was had the Lake Merced scheme was as dead as if the act had never been passed. The appraisers were without power and could do nothing.

Now, the Rogers Act was passed either for the benefit of the public, or for the benefit of David Mahoney, and incidentally of such as gain by what benefits him. If it was passed for the benefit of the public, the representatives of the public have resolved not to take advantage of it; if it was passed for the benefit of David Mahoney and his crowd, will the Supervisors acknowledge that this view is the basis and motive of their action? Either the Mahoney crowd must admit that this award is too high, viz., more than the property is worth, or there is no benefit in it for them. If the property is worth less than the award of $1,500,000 then it ought to be set aside for fraud. If it is worth the amount of the award, Mr. Mahoney is not damaged, for he has his property, and can keep it for his own use or sell to others. The law will not assume that the appraisers have found a value five or ten times what the property is worth; for it to do so is to signalize the whole transaction as infamous, and not to be pushed further. The law will presume that the property is worth just what his appraisers have named, and that Mr. Mahoney ought to be thankful that he has not been divested by force of so desirable a property and so fine an investment. His property is worth one and a half millions of dollars; of this let Mr. Badlam take immediate notice, and see that it is assessed at something near that figure; and let Mr. Mahoney be happy that he keeps so good a thing. The city has, by the action of the commissioners who represent it, lost the bargain, and Mr. Mahoney keeps his own. It is a plunder the people must suffer; at least the city keeps her bonds, and will have no interest account to provide for. But while the law takes this position the people know better; they know the whole business is a corrupt, nasty, despicable job, in which a property worth a hundred thousand dollars, or very little more, is to be forced upon a reluctant public for a million and a half, in thirty-year six per cent bonds. The public knows full well that seven Supervisors are not working for the public they ostensibly represent, but for Mahoney and his confederates; that when the job is done, and the bonds issued and distributed to the persons interested, according to their respective shares, as "swag," the public interest in Lake Merced is ended; that no water pipes will ever be put into it, and that all the remembrance of it will remain in the annual taxes for interest and sinking fund, and that history will have no other record of this scandalous and corrupt job.

If there was any lingering doubt that all these proceedings were illegal and void before the time of repealing the Rogers Act that doubt is now resolved. The repeal of the act before the consummation of proceedings under it renders it inoperative and void as to all that has been done or has been attempted. The Board of Supervisors can not breathe the breath of life under the ribs of this dead and ghastly skeleton. As well might a fire company, or a ward club, or a debating society endeavor to create a debt and make it binding upon the city of San Francisco and its tax-payers. We write thus of this scheme, not because we fear its consummation, but because we are indignant that in our city and among our municipal legislators there can be found seven men so lost to self-respect as to endeavor to consummate so rascally an act. These hands will never issue. The Mayor, Killoch, the Auditor, Dunn, the Superior Court, the Supreme Court, and, lastly, an indignant public opinion, are all to be overcome before this "swag" attaches to the corrupt hands endeavoring to steal it.

A New York Herald Washington special, dated January 26th, says: "It is reported, on what is believed to be trustworthy authority, that personal friends of ex-President Grant in Philadelphia, who are nearest to him, state to persons interested that before the meeting of the Pennsylvania Convention, ten days hence, an authoritative declaration will be made in behalf of the ex-President, conclusively taking him from the field as a candidate for the Presidential nomination. It is given out by persons in the 'ex-President's confidence that he proposes to engage in an important business enterprise, which he prefers to any attempt to reënter political life.' If this is true, and we deem it highly probable, then Gen. Grant will have been placed in a most equivocal and, in our opinion, unpleasant position. He will have rounded off a most successful career with a most marked failure. After attaining the very highest position that any American citizen has ever achieved, he will be written down in history as having failed to attain a desired office; and there will run into this history, and there will linger in the opinion of his countrymen, the belief that his ambition outran his patriotism; that he yielded himself the willing instrument of a political class that regarded the patronage, the power, and the spoils of office above the welfare of the country. It is now admitted that Gen. Grant can not become for a third time the candidate of the Republican party, and it is conceded by all level-headed men that if nominated he would not be elected; but it is not admitted, and it is not true, that Gen. Grant has patriotically refused the candidacy. He has sought the office, and his countrymen have denied it to him. Unlike the Roman candidate standing in the forum clad in white, he has been hippodromed as a spectacle through the land, seeking the highest office by all the arts that belong to the least reputable wing and the least respectable members of the Republican party. That Gen. Grant has seen fit to identify himself with this class of politicians is not the fault of those Republican gentlemen who would have preferred to hold him in higher esteem than to think he would lend himself, his great name, and his gallant military achievements to the accomplishment of a party purpose.

Who will be the Republican nominee it is impossible at this time to guess. Senator Blaine is perhaps the most popular and the most prominent. He commands the enthusiasm of the party. He is its "dashing Murat," its "white-plumed Henry of Navarre." He addresses himself to the chivalry of the party, and stirs the romantic element to action. He is an orator, fearless, impulsive, brilliant, and commands admiration. Secretary Sherman is prominent—especially prominent in Ohio. He is strong, and especially strong with the secret agents and officers of the Revenue Department. Detective Finnegas will go for him, and if Internal Revenue Collector Higby is not removed he will go for him, and the strong money syndicates will go for him; and these are powerful elements in a national convention. Mr. E. B. Washburne would make a popular candidate, and, in event of election, an excellent administration. But Mr. Washburne is not strong with the politicians of Illinois, and it is not probable that he could carry his own State delegation, and hence it is not probable that he can be nominated. He ought to be: he would not be objectionable to Conkling in New York; he has no quarrel with Blaine; he is not in opposition to Sherman. His record at home and abroad is a good one. He would be entitled to the vote of every German in America. General Grant, in a conversation with J. Russell Young, says of Washburne: "I should have been delighted to have had Washburne as my successor. Apart from our personal relations, which are of the closest nature, I have a great admiration for Washburne. He has been my friend always, and I am grateful for his friendship. He is a true, high-minded, patriotic man, of great force and ability. While he was in France some of our enemies tried to make mischief between us, but it had no result. I have entire faith in Washburne, and if I could have cleared the way for him in Cincinnati I would have done so." We do not despair of Mr. Washburne's nomination, because we think a careful review of the political situation will convince Republican leaders that a campaign under his leadership will be one certain of victory.

The widow of John Tyler, once President of the United States, asks Congress for provision in her old age because she is poor. We sincerely hope there may be found some mode in which a great and wealthy nation may rescue from poverty a lady who has been once the wife of its President. If there is no law, let one be passed. If there is no precedent, let one be established. The nation owes this to its dignity.

The people would rather have Gen. Grant "right" than "President."

AFTERMATH.

On the 4th day of next month the Pennsylvania Convention will meet to appoint delegates to the National Convention. It was called thus early under the direction of Don Cameron, to give the "boom" for Grant a send-off. It was to have been "first blood" in the campaign. It was not doubted that the Cameron influence would make an easy victory, but the result has proved a mortification and a disappointment. The Convention is against Grant; the "boom" is a failure, and "first blood" is likely to be for Blaine. Wherever, from Maine to Iowa, there has been an intelligent canvass of party preference, Grant has proved to be a bad third, Blaine and Sherman in nearly every State leading him for nomination. We think we may now dismiss Gen. Grant from any further discussion, and indulge ourselves in the more congenial and pleasant task of recording his services and bringing up in favorable mention and friendly memory his great qualities, his distinguished achievements, and his many virtues. Those who have aided to rescue him from the ambitious and selfish and mercenary politicians who have surrounded him will be entitled to and will in time receive from Gen. Grant and his countrymen their lasting thanks for an honest service.

That good old railroad gentleman who for twenty years has so admirably managed the Sutter Street ahomination and its tangle-legged branches, laid down the burden of his cares, departed from railroad management, and passed in his chips to new dealers on the 27th day of January, 1880. This road leads directly to the cemetery; it has been going there ever since its first rail was laid, its first rickety car was started, its first lame and halky horse was purchased, its first cable was stretched, its first servants were employed. We do not mean that Mr. Caseholt has shuffled off his mortal cable; that he has gone to that harm from which he may not return; that he has climbed the golden ladder, and gone to hunk in Ahrabam's hosom; but that he has sold the Sutter Street Railroad to Joseph Naphthaly and the "Schmidt boys." We are glad of it, and our neighbors are glad of it; the Western Addition rejoices; land has gone up. It gives us additional hopes of a prosperous season, and it convinces us of the truth of the adage that it is a long railroad that has no turn. The best good turn the Sutter Street ever did for a long-suffering and impatient people was when it turned Caseholt and his rickety old hlacksmith of a road over to new hands, new enterprise, and new capital.

We growl and vituperate about our "cold snap." We breathe on our hands, chatter our teeth, and kick things with our aching toes because the thermometer marks only forty-odd degrees by day and thirty when our toes are sandwiched in hlankets, our teeth vibrating to comfortable snores, and our hands the Lord knows where. But Dr. Reagles, just down from Fort Klamath, says that up in that country the beautiful snow is ten feet thick! We ought all to be taken up to Klamath and scallyhooted through it until we should not have a warm hone in our ungrateful hodies. Because Diahlo and Tamalpais lift white-headed eminences against a steely sky we fancy we suffer, without stopping to consider whether we are standing on Diahlo, sitting astride of Tamalpais, or floating in the sky. This is becoming ridiculous; let it be ahated, or the Eastern visitor (with his collar open) will gihe and gird at us. And his derision we will hy no means endure. It is more insufferable than the itch.

Assemblyman Tyler alluded to Assemblyman Braunhart, in debate, as the gentleman from Judea. Then there was discomfort, and some danger that an ink hottle would ensue. Better counsels prevailed: Mr. Braunhart called Mr. Tyler an ignoramus, a mule, and an ass, and the amenities of legislative discussion were preserved.

Says Tyler, his eye upon Braunhart: "I see a Gentleman hailing from distant Judea."
Says Braunhart: "Be silent, you lying reviler!"
The Speaker, confirming, remarked: "Shut up, Tyler; Whatever his county, the member in question Sha'n't be called a gentleman, e'en by suggestion."

"There is a waiter here," said one gentleman to another, while lunching at Campi's, "who has the most preposterous nose in California. It would elevate your intellect, broaden your opinions, expand your sympathies, and ennoble your taste to contemplate the magnitude of that nose." "I'm dying to see it, and languish to hear it blown," said the other—adding, with a sudden glance along the aisle between the tables: "Is that the man?" "I don't know," replied the first speaker reflectively—"I really can not say. That, however, is the nose."

"Men are everywhere. They have no right to be so prevalent." The speaker was a serious young woman, the auditor a big policeman, the only interested audience the writer. The lady was standing near the entrance of a public square. She had come there to hask in the sunshine, and hear the sparrows twitter in the larches. Benches to right of her, benches to left of her, hences all occupied, mocked at her with their surfeit of indolent manlings. "But I can't move any of them," said the big policeman deprecatingly. "I don't wish you to. I was merely voicing an immortal truth," said the serious young woman. The lady was right—superficially, at least. There is an over-plenty of the animal man floating on the muddy crest of the time-tide, spinning into the eddy-corners, overflowing the meadow-reaches; small wonder we find him crowding women and habies from out their little plats of green turf and untainted air. But then women should remember that Eve would eat that apple.

In behalf of "The Hood Orphans Memorial Fund," Gen. G. T. Beauregard has published the deceased soldier's hook, entitled Advance and Retreat, the manuscript of which was completed but a few days before his death. The hook is sold for three dollars, three-and-a-half dollars, four dollars, and five dollars, according to style of binding, and although we have not seen it we do not hesitate to recommend it. Money devoted to the support of the ten young orphans of a brave soldier who did his duty as he understood it is treasure laid up in heaven at compound interest. The writer of this paragraph has had a good deal of experience with reference to the subject of the volume: General Hood's "advances" and "retreats" he found always deeply interesting, though the retreats were incomparably the more agreeable. Grateful to the memory of the illustrious dead for a broken skull, he cheerfully now discharges a part of the obligation by doing what small service he can for the helpless living. The volume may be ordered directly from General G. T. Beauregard, New Orleans.

Steve Mayhell, the Poet-Lawgiver of the Sand-lot, is of some use, after all: he is father to a bill making it a misdemeanor to adulterate milk, and a capital crime to sell the milk of a sick cow. The bill, drawn up in Stephen's own beautiful chirography, familiar to every editorial wastebasket in the country, is as follows:

"Be it enacted by Senate and House,
It's a misdemeanor to water your cows.
And be it enacted, too, that the bilk
Who sells of an ailing cow the milk,
Be tried, convicted, transported to prison,
And bung, fer to pay for our lives with his'n."

The writer of this paragraph is not a musician. He could not play the simplest parlor ballad on a corn-stalk fiddle, although that was the instrument of his youth and early manhood. Hearing in the dark a sonata of Mendelssohn or Beethoven, he would probably misunderstand it as a competitive examination of cats, buzz-saws, and men working on a tin-roof. All the same, he hereby sets his hoof into the green pastures of musical criticism to lie down by the still waters and listen to his own warble. The writer assisted Mr. WilhelmJ at his concert on Friday evening of last week, and enjoyed his playing, dutifully as he had been told to do. August fiddles like the devil—never a doubt of it. And Herr Vogrich can discount any callow girlette of San Francisco in clawing the piano. And that woman—well, she can't sing any, but she is fat to look upon of a cold night. This present critic, who now has the floor, liked that concert, liked WilhelmJ, the tail to whose name has been worth to him a thousand dollars a month ever since he landed in a country where people don't have tails to their names. O yes, it was a very good concert. But.

We were about to remark that WilhelmJ is an insufferable noodle. When encored the last time that night—we presume he did it every night—he came out, howed, stuck his fiddle in his neck, and played "The Old Folks at Home"—played it (may the devil fly away with him!) through to the bitter end. We do not know if one man can play that thing hetter than another; the hetter it should be played the more offensive it would be. No doubt this fiddling foreigner, who fancies he looks like BeethovenJ, had been told that he must give us slop. That was good advice, but there are differences in slops; that compounded by the chambermaid is as good as that mixed by the cook, but it is not as nourishing; and any fiddler of WilhelmJ's acquaintance will tell him so. We say so ourselves. It is not apparent why this artist should insult the hoxes, orchestra seats, and dress circle, to please the gallery. 'Fore George! we helieve the fellow played "Away down upon the Swaneeeeeee river" because he likes it. He can't fiddle anyhow.

It must be gratifying to the community at large to learn that, in spite of the zealous quarantine precautions observed in the case of the City of Peking, two passengers succeeded in making their escape from the ship and landing in the city. It must be still more gratifying to learn that both the gentlemen in question rejoiced in a finely developed type of varioloid. One is now laid up in hospital, and "amuses himself by reading to his fellow inmates the newspaper accounts of his escape." He visited, it is said, several places of public resort—presumably saloons; engaged a hed at a hotel, and breakfasted with the guests the following morning, when he concluded to take the secondary and unimportant step of visiting a physician. He is now reported to be doing finely. This is cheering news; but we think that a gentleman possessing such a fine sense of humor as to play so excellent a practical joke upon a great city should not be suffered to pass into obscurity without some solid recognition of his genius. We therefore propose that, as soon as he becomes sufficiently convalescent to receive them, he be waited on by a deputation of citizens; and, as it is only reasonable to suppose that a change of raiment will be necessary when he again mixes with the public, we suggest a neat suit of tar and feathers; also that he be borne in triumph upon a rail. We shall be happy to head the deputation, and will afterward furnish the rail. His companion is still at large, fortunately for himself if not for the community.

Mr. Horace Davis has introduced a bill in the House of Representatives imposing a duty on mustard seeds. This will make living more expensive to the souls of politicians. That of George Gorham can not be comfortably housed without an outlay for rent exceeding in amount all the money he ever honestly made in all his life.

We are glad we do not know the name of the particular legislative idiot who has introduced a bill to print the debates of the Constitutional Convention. He might think us personal. We disavow the intention; but the man, or the party, or the wing of a party, profligate and mean enough to spend money in printing the unparalleled hosh of that hody, deserves and shall receive our execration. It is a well recognized and well remembered fact that those whose opinions were worth the least talked the most. Such a hook would be expensive, would never be read, and if it served any purpose, it would be to preserve the memory of a political incident that every honest man desires to forget.

The Hon. Frank McCoppin goes to the Hawaiian Islands to become a sugar planter. We are sorry for it, and we are glad of it. We are sorry, because California will lose a valuable citizen, society a genial fellow, and ourselves a good friend; glad, because at the Islands he can improve his fortune, and he of service in maintaining American ascendancy there and keeping them in friendly political and business relations with the United States. San Francisco loses one of its most intelligent and best citizens. In the position of Alderman, Supervisor, Mayor, Senator, and Harbor Commissioner; in the position of leader to the Democratic party, and adviser to its councils, he has always been intelligent, honest, manly, and honorable. He has created jealousies, as all bright and successful men do; he has made enemies, as all hold and manly people do; he has made a host of warm personal friends among all classes and in all parties, as all gentlemen do. His departure will be regretted, his return will be welcomed. He has our best wishes that he may make sugar while the sun shines upon him at the Sandwich Islands.

O'Donovan Rossa hurls oaths at Parnell,
Parnell at O'Donovan Rossa.
If both these imposters were chucked into—well,
If both were extruded from earth, pell-mell,
Earth never would growl at its loss a
Dambitte; and the glee would run devilish high
In the place where, with confidence, Irish apply.

We should be very sorry to think that our amiable friend of the Assembly, Dr. May, had been making a conspicuous ass of himself by eulogizing the sand-lot and the dirty political rahhle that disgraced it, but we are very much afraid he has done so. If Dr. May so approves of the conduct of those most disreputable and dirty fellows that he will oppose the passage of a law to punish men for inciting to riots or acts of criminal violence, we hope he will go politically where he belongs. We take the liberty of suggesting to Dr. May and to all weak-kneed Republicans that he or they will lose more friends by slohhering over and apologizing for the sand-lot than they will gain. There are only two sides, and Dr. May is not long enough in the stretch to straddle the broad chasm that divides them.

In another column a correspondent, "Growler," utters a touching complaint about ARGONAUT matters in general, and is especially moving concerning our time-table of the Central Pacific Railroad. This time-table, he should know, is furnished by the officers of the company, revised and corrected by them, and never altered except on their order. It is an advertisement, and we care nothing about its correctness. Still, we think they know their own business pretty well, and that they have good information as to when their trains leave. With all deference to "Growler," therefore, we confidently affirm that he did go to Sacramento on the train which he says did not run. We know he did, and we believe he knows it himself. And if we ever disclose the name of him to some of our injured contributors the wretch will probably wish he had remained there.

We hope it is true that Governor Perkins has resolved that under no circumstances will he convene an extra session. We have for thirty years experienced the perils of too much legislation. We are, above all things, anxious to make the experiment, just for one year, of too little.

Use fewer exclamation points in your verse, dear poets Was it not Pope who phrased this mark:

"The pompous tombstone of some pauper thought?"

A paragrapher blithely announces: "Joäquin Miller thinks of becoming a lecturer." And then—with rare coincidence: "Cetywayo is learning to read and write."

TONSOR TONSUS.

"Now, Jove, in His Next Commodity of Hair, Send Thee a Beard!"

Is shaving an art or a science? If not a science, as practiced now-a-days in San Francisco and other cosmopolitan cities, it approaches very closely to that indefinable boundary which divides science from art. As in religion "there be gods many and lords many," so in barberism (i. e., shaving) there be barbarians, and there be shavers. Here you can have your ten-cent shave without, or your fifteen-cent shave with, bay rum. Here you can be coddled, and patted, and smoothed, and bathed as to your head, and a good half-hour of the solid day wasted upon you, for twenty-five cents. We are not sure whether the Greeks and Romans, and other swell nations of antiquity, practiced the science of shaving to the utmost extent compatible with human luxury and waste of time, or not. We are inclined to think they did. We know very well that the "strigils," or instruments with which they scrubbed their bodies in their steam and vapor baths, were ugly, blunt, awkward utensils, because we have seen them as they were dug up from Pompeii and her neighbor cities. We have yet, however, to see a Greek or Roman razor. Their swords were sharp—why not their razors? That it was the correct thing to get shaved we can gather from a line of Juvenal, the greatest satirist of his day, wherein he talks of his youthful experiences thus: "Quo tondente gravissimam mihi barba sonabat" (under whose razor my beard cracked crisply in my youth). All nations in all ages have taken from them the covering which Providence gave them as a protection against cold. Few vestiges remain of the hair which once clothed our frames in prehistoric times. Art supersedes nature, and fancies itself superior for doing so.

One of the humors or amenities of shaving consists in having your own soap, soap-pot, and lathering-brush at your barber's. Curiosity took the writer into a barber's in one of our principal thoroughfares the other day, and in an elegant bureau, placed against the wall of the studio, he observed several dozens of these pots, standing on shelves, in ranks, side by side, each inscribed with the name of its owner, each with the handle of its proper brush sticking out of it, each, no doubt, with its own proper cake of soap, seasoned and ancient by much use, and yet too little use, reposing at its base. There were big mugs holding a pint, and little ones holding half a pint, regulated, no doubt, by the hirsute endowment of the possessor. There were mugs with lips and rims, and mugs with neither. There were mugs emblazoned with gilt letters, indicating their owners' names, and mugs more modestly adorned with common paper, and home-made chirography. There were names upon those mugs known to San Francisco history. A mug with a modest "J. Keene" pasted on it had sunk into a corner, as if ashamed of its present lack of use. A mug with a flaming "Timothy Dougherty" in bold gilt German text proved that Tim was still to the fore. "Duncan" was visible on one, the "J. C." having retired, and only visible at a certain angle. Johnsons, and Robinsons, and O'Mahoneys vied with each other in eager prominence—the only prominence they might ever get, and so determined to make the most of it. But the inexorable voice of the matter-of-fact artist shouted "Next," and stopped this theme.

Nice Reading for San Franciscans.

The following editorial from the New York Times is in apt illustration of the currency obtained in Eastern cities by certain of the more flaming manifestations of local lying. The editorial is written as guardedly as if prepared by our own Mr. Pickering, but the implication is none the less unpleasant. The Chronicle, and the curs which yelp when it barks, ought to be proud of their work:

"Everybody acquainted with San Francisco knows that it has always been afflicted with rings—rings social, political, journalistic, real estate, mining, and commercial; the last two being naturally the most hurtful to the city's prosperity. It has long been said that nobody occupying an independent position can do anything there. He must placate or go shares with some of the rings in order to have any success. Some of the newspapers, plainly not members of the journalistic or mining rings, are just now complaining bitterly of the three men—apparently a tyrannical triumvirate—who rule, it is said, San Francisco, and through her the larger part of California, with a rod of iron. The odious three are, of course, James G. Fair, James C. Flood, and John W. Mackay, whose combined wealth is estimated at $100,000,000 to $125,000,000. By this enormous money power they have, it is charged, cowed the community into subjection. They openly violate and defy the law; they habitually trample on individual rights, and the best citizens are so influenced by fear that they tamely submit to wrong and outrage. They are pronounced moral and financial pests, are hated and dreaded, cursed in private, and fawned upon in public. By their mining operations, which scarcely any one believes to have been honest, they have, it is declared, ruined thousands of families, and driven hundreds to suicide. The bonanza firm is, according to accounts, a monstrous evil, morally, politically, and monetarily—such a one as no other city in the country has hitherto been tormented with. The Tweed Ring, in its worst days, was a trifle compared with it. That stole public property and robbed tax-payers; but this is denounced on the Pacific Coast as a prodigious despotism, crippling private enterprise, and debauching public sentiment. San Francisco, with more than half the State, is represented to be in a condition of abject vassalage. The more the people submit, the more rigorous and overbearing the tyrants grow. The picture is probably overdrawn."

Young Widows.

They are an attractive and frequently an engaging class of ladies, that fill a very important niche in society, the subject both of envy and admiration. We have seen them in the first throes of their bereavement, when they utterly refused to be comforted, declaring that their hopes all lay buried with their first and only love, in the new-made grave of their dear departed; and their streaming eyes behind mourning veils have caused the sympathetic sob to well up from the bosoms of all who listened. But, as time wore on, we have observed with satisfaction—for we would not have them weep always—that comfort invariably comes to the young widow's heart and that hope is restored to her troubled mind.

We were called upon some time ago to attend the funeral of a young and noble fellow who left a pretty widow to mourn his untimely taking off. She sat by the side of her unconscious love, dressed in the most sombre but at the same time most becoming mourning, with her lovely hair arranged in an infinite labor and care in glossy finger puffs all over her shapely head, and her black-bordered handkerchief went ever and anon to her streaming eyes. Ever and anon she talked in tones soft, tremulous, and low to the inanimate clay that was so soon to be hidden away forever, telling him her heart would always throb for him alone, and what a dreary blank the world would ever be to her without his presence. Then, in a sudden burst of grief and wild despair, she besought the undertaker to let the friends fill the carriages and drive away, leaving her dearly beloved dead with her. But the funeral went on in the usual way, and the fair mourner returned to her stricken home crushed and disconsolate. But, thanks to the soothing hand of Time, ere her widow's weeds had grown the worse for wear or her spotless cap had become mussed or soiled, she rallied sufficiently to marry the dear friend of her late departed; and her loving heart now reposes on the bosom of another.

How fortunate it is that their young, crushed affections have such wonderful elasticity, as soon as a desirable provocation presents itself. Pity is akin to love, and the former sentiment awakens kindly sympathy for the fair mourner that quickly ripens into a tenderness that soothes her young heart into a sweet forgetfulness, and makes life around her look bright once more. She becomes the pet of society, a pleasant companion, a charming sweetheart, and a dangerous rival; and we pity the girl that has to battle against her. We have seen young widows of but ordinary attractions carry off the palm from wealth, intellect, and beauty combined, and wonder themselves at their own success. Even after the first season of their sorrow is over, and they have ceased to excite sympathy any more, their ripeness and tact make man an easy and willing victim to their subtle charms. Their past experience, their tutored hearts, and the aching void of their late loneliness, give to their manner that ease, grace, and naturalness that is woman's chief charm, and makes the young widow the envy of women and the admiration of men.

A pleasant place to live in is Washington, and Don Piatt emphasizes the fact as follows: "Rapes, murders, and arson dance through the annual maze of our local existence, and no punishment is visited upon the perpetrators of crime. They may be tried, convicted, sentenced, and yet are never punished. Our criminal judiciary is a farce, our ex facto Chief Magistrate a humbug—a promoter of crime. It seems impossible to punish a criminal—unless he be of the cheap order—in this District of Columbia, in this the national capital. Burglars, ravishers, footpads, and murderers walk the streets and ply their crimes openly, and are never punished. Even when convicted they are not executed. Sleep must lie down armed, for the villainous centre-bits grind on the wakeful ear in the bush of moonless nights, or when the gas-lights are extinguished, and midnight murderers are ever on the alert to strike down the unfortunate wayfarer. We have had since Christmas eve nearly ten murders, and but one arrest. We have had no execution of a murderer for seven—nearly eight—years. It seems impossible in this District to effect the same. There seems to be but two sections in the Union where deliberate murder is punished by death—Pennsylvania and Texas. Those States are honest, direct, and incisive in their punishment. Here in Washington it seems impossible for that great congregate client, Society, to obtain justice, and the hands that the murderer holds up in petition for pardon seem to be whitened by having been imbedded dirtily and cowardly in the blood of his victim."

Sarah Bernhardt has reduced kissing to a science in her character of "Donna Sol" in Hernani, which is now the rage at the Théâtre Français, Paris. Bernhardt's kisses include all the variations—andante, allegro, con amore, il pensiero, crescendo, and never diminuendo, until she and her lover are dead. Sarah kills him with kindness. She stands on her tip-toes—for Monnet-Sully is over six feet in height—and goes on excursions with her scarlet lips all over the back of his head down to the top of his neck-rib. If Sully dislikes Sarah he must be ready to die of sheer nausea. She winds herself around his waist as only such a sinuous, tigress-like creature can, and kisses every puff on the front of his doublet. And when at last, assaulted with the persistence of a soldier battering a fortress or a woman cajoling a lover, he smiles on her and clasps her to his heart and proceeds to return the compliments of the season so lavishly rained on him, there is positively a sigh of relief among the audience. She has got her kiss at last, poor girl—how she enjoys it! The lithe, serpentine form quivers under it, and the golden voice sobs, "Oh, my Hernani!" He lifts her, one arm around her shoulders, the other perdu in the folds of pink silk crêpe; he nurses her. A group of statuary! By the Swan of Leda, it is Cupid and Psyche!

In Algernon Charles Swinburne's beautiful poem, "The Triumph of Time," we find this passage:

There lived a singer in France of old
By the tideless, dolorous, midland sea.
In a land of sand and ruin and gold
There shone one woman, and none but she.
And finding life for her love's sake fail,
Being fain to see her, he bade set sail,
Toucht land, and saw her as life grew cold,
And praised God, seeing; and so died he.

Can any of our readers tell us (1) the name of the singer; (2) the name of the "tideless, dolorous" sea; (3) the locality and name of the "land of sand and ruin and gold"; and (4) the name and history of the woman to whom reference is made? There must be a curious bit of history behind this, and it would please us if some of our quidnuncs would unearth it and spread it out before our readers.

A Quaker shopkeeper once met a Quaker customer going home with her bundles. He had been absent from his place, and had a notion in his wise head that she had been trading with a rival whom he did not much love. "How much did thee give a yard for this, Mary?" "One dollar." "Why, I am surprised at thee! I could let thee have it for seventy-five cents. And how much for this?" "Two dollars." "Why, that was unreasonable. I could let thee have it for a dollar and a half. Why wilt thee go away trading with strangers and world's people, Mary?" "I don't know what thou art talking about, friend John," she said; "but I did buy all these things at thy store, and if thee says the truth thee must owe me considerable money."

A MERE LOOKER-ON IN GOTHAM.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—The New Year has not given us very much in the way of novelty so far, most of the theatres being still taken up with the successes that closed 1879. Our exceptionally mild winter has proved very favorable for long runs, and money being apparently plentiful, the people are turning out in large force to patronize whatever is offered to them, with a charming lack of discrimination in regard to quality. The run of French Flats at the Union Square may be truly regarded as phenomenal, taking into consideration the character of the piece, and goes to show what liberties that popular theatre may take with its clientèle. Not that French Flats is not funny, with a broad, farcical kind of humor, and not that it is ill-acted, for, barring Charley Thorne, it is cast to the full strength of that excellent company. But it is a farce, pure, and simple, and in eliminating the more than questionable motif of the French play, the translator has robbed it of all semblance of plot, and gives us four detached scenes, or rather farces, and the audience laughs nightly at each, and apparently returns next week for more, for the business continues good. The hits of the piece are Joe Polk and Stoddard; and Harry Courtaigne, who made his first bow to a New York audience as "Barremedass," has achieved a pronounced success. French Flats will be withdrawn next week to make room for A False Friend, formerly christened Birthingright, a new drama by Edgar Fawcett, who has hitherto been chiefly known for his poetic effusions. The plot of the new piece is understood to be drawn from the incidents and disclosures of the memorable Tichborne trial, and the drama is spoken of as possessing the elements of success. French Flats will be sent through the country when it is withdrawn from the Square.

At Wallack's a sumptuous revival of the old comedies has brought a good many much-needed dollars into the treasury. The new era was inaugurated with She Stoops to Conquer, and followed by a rapid change of bill, which has continued to produce most satisfactory results. Mr. Wallack's New England tour was a dire failure pecuniarily; not for Mr. Wallack, who had a certainty, but for Mr. Henderson, of the Standard, who gave it. Indeed, Mr. Henderson has not been very fortunate of late. Princess Toto failed to draw at the Standard, though it is a very bright little opera, mounted on perhaps the funniest libretto Gilbert has written. It goes to Boston shortly, under the management of Montgomery and Stuart (Mr. Maude Branscombe), and Rice's Surprise Party has succeeded it, to fair business, at the Standard.

A decided hit has been scored at the Fifth Avenue by The Pirates of Penzance, and D'Oyley Carte is sending three companies to play it through the country. At the close of the season the company which is now playing at the Fifth Avenue return to England, and play it next London season. At present, standing room is at a premium, and the opera is certainly very funny. The music is of a higher class than Pinafore, though in both words and music you can detect an occasional reminiscence of last season's great success. The policeman's chorus is nightly received with four or five encores, and it is in the best vein of both authors. Take this verse as a sample. It is sung by a lot of admirably got-up London "bobbies," who are pitying the hard fate of those whom their duty compels to "run in."

When the enterprising burglar's not a burgling,
When the cut-throat is not occupied in crime,
He loves to hear the little brook a gurgling,
And listen to the merry village chime.
When the coster's finished jumping on his mother,
He loves to lie a basking in the sun;
Oh, take one consideration with another,
A policeman's life is not a happy one.

This, sung to a lugubrious burlesque air, with a choral repetition of the last three syllables of each verse, is irresistibly funny, and in the present outcry against the New York police it is received as a local hit, and welcomed accordingly. I have not space to give you the plot of the opera, but the following easily traced resemblance to Pinafore may amuse your readers: The "Admiral" in the latter opera is represented here as an English major-general (with a funnier song than the "Admiral's," by the way); the sisters, cousins, and aunts are represented by the general's twenty daughters; "Buttercup" becomes "Ruth," and is the nurse of "Frederick," the tenor, who through her mixing-up qualities has been apprenticed to a pirate instead of a pilot. There are other points of resemblance not so easy to trace for those who have not seen both operas; but while not very original, The Pirates of Penzance is bright, decidedly funny, and destined to a successful run, though it will never attain the phenomenal success of Pinafore.

By the by, I see you have had The New Babylon at the Baldwin, and anent that George Fawcett Rowe is breathing forth fire and smoke. He has telegraphed, so he says, to Maguire to remit him $400 in the way of royalty, and says further, and significantly, if he does not get it "Lucky Baldwin" is a bright and shining light to "go for." It seems the piece was produced here, under the title of London and New York, three weeks before it was played in England; so Mr. Rowe's American copyright is readily defensible. It might be worth your while to find out the rights and wrongs of this from the fountain-head.

Daly's Theatre is keeping up a curious melange, called The Arabian Nights, to poor business. It has been running quite a little while now, and Mr. Daly, with Papa Duff's check-book, announces his intention of forcing a success—up-hill work here, I'm afraid. He has a fair company, with Miss Catherine Lewis, who has become quite a favorite, as leading lady.

Barley Campbell, since the success of My Partner, has blossomed out into a most successful dramatist. Two of his plays hold the New York-boards at present—The Galley Slave at Niblo's (transferred from Haverly's to make room for Mestayer's Tourists) and Fairfax at the Park.

Ellie Wilton has been for some time a regular member of the Union Square Company, but has not had much chance to distinguish herself in French Flats, where the ladies' parts are very poor. It is to be hoped she will be more fortunate in A False Friend.

Mr. Hill, Denman Thompson's manager, is branching out more widely into dramatic ventures. He opens a company next week at Williamsburg (East Brooklyn) with a new comedy by Will Eaton, of the Chicago Tribune.

LOOKER-ON.

ADVICE TO THE SAND-LOT.

Burdette preaches the following judicious screed in a recent number of the Hawkeye: "And then remember, my son, you have to work. Whether you handle a pick or a pen, a wheelbarrow or a set of books, digging ditches or editing a paper, ringing an auction-bell or writing funny things, you must work. If you will look around you, you will see that the men who are most able to work are the men who work the hardest. Don't be afraid of killing yourself with overwork, son. It is beyond your power to do that. Men cannot work so hard as that on the sunny side of thirty. They die sometimes, but it is because they quit work at 6 P. M., and don't get home until 2 A. M. It is the intervals that kills, my son. The work gives you an appetite for your meals; it lends solidity to your slumber, it gives you a perfect and grateful appreciation of a holiday. There are young men who do not work, my son; young men who make a living by sucking the end of a cane, whose entire mental development is insufficient to tell them which side of a postage stamp to lick; young men who can tie a necktie in eleven different knots, and never lay a wrinkle in it, and then would get into a West Hill Street car to go to Chicago; who can spend more money in a day than you can earn in a month, son, and who will go to the Sheriff's to buy a postal card, and apply at the office of the Street Commissioner for a marriage license. But the world is not proud of them, my son. It does not know their names, even; it only speaks of them as old So-an'-So's boys. Nobody likes them, nobody hates them; the great, busy world doesn't even know they are there; and at the great day of resurrection if they do not appear at the sound of the trumpet—and they certainly will not unless somebody tells them what it is for and what to do—I don't think Gabriel will miss them or notice their absence, and they will not be sent for or disturbed. Things will go on just as well without them. So find out what you want to be, and make a dust in the world. The busier you are, the less devilry you will be apt to get into, the sweeter will be your sleep, the brighter and happier will be your holidays, and the better satisfied will the world be with you. No, my son, the world does not owe you a living. The world does not need you yet—you need the world. If you can convince the world that you are necessary to its well-being, its happiness, its pleasure, its moral existence, then the world will begin to claim you and make room for you in the body-pews with the softest cushions and the easiest footstools. But don't fall into the common error of supposing that the world owes you a living. It doesn't owe you anything of the kind. The world isn't responsible for your being. It didn't send for you, it never asked you to come here, and in no sense is it obliged to support you now that you are here. Your living is here—a good, comfortable living—good, healthful, hard work, ripples of laughter and sprinkles of tears, hours of happiness and moments of headache, days of labor and nights of rest, duties to be performed and rewards to be won. It is all here, son—disappointments, struggles, success, and honors; but the world doesn't owe you one of them, not one. You can't collect your living as you would a debt, by simply presenting your bill, or giving your lawyer the account to sue. You have to work for it, my son, and work like a Trojan, too. When you hear a man say the world owes him a living, and he is going to have it, make up your mind that he is just making himself a good excuse for stealing a living. The world doesn't owe any man anything, my son. It will give you anything you earn, and you just look out over the world and know that all the plunder you can gather in by honest work is yours, and no more. If you can't get any, why none of it is yours, and if you can search out and carry away ten times as much as your neighbor, why that is all yours, and he has no right to wait and whine over his bad luck and want you to divide. And, my son, in all human probability you will not want to divide. I hope you may, but it is very likely you will not."

Beauty in Boards.

One of our publishing houses has decided, we learn, to issue, by subscription, a work designed to illustrate American beauty, and has already commenced it. The work is to include the portraits—fine steel-plate engravings—of one hundred women remarkable for their personal charms, to be accompanied with the daintiest of letter-press. Several years will be spent in its preparation, and it is to be issued, it is said, in one or more volumes, in the highest style of literary, pictorial, and book-making art. While the taste of the work, so far as the subjects are concerned, is very questionable in our democracy, the portraits would have an æsthetic interest, if they were faithful, and if they were what they will claim to be—the portraits of the handsomest women. But it is altogether likely that the originals will be so immensely flattered, so superbly idealized, that they may not be recognized in the engravings by their most intimate friends. It is doubtful, indeed, if any woman here or elsewhere having a reputation for prettiness, would consent to be paraded before the world in counterfeit presentment unless she believed that she looked much better than in reality. Besides, in a vast country like this it would be impossible to find one hundred of the most beautiful women without many years of most active search. The distinguished one hundred will naturally be women of society, who have already been advertised as beauties, with or without reason, and many of these, as we all know, have small foundation for the social fame they have acquired. There is danger, too, that women will have the best chance of decorating the volume who are willing to pay most, or in other words subscribe for the largest number of copies. A few years since a similar work was published here, with some such title as The Queens of American Society, in which some of the ladies, however estimable, were anything but attractive of person; but they were all exhibited, of course, as physical charmers. It was suspected that they won their places in the pages by the liberality of their contributions. The forthcoming work may be very different, but it is extremely hard, as any one must admit, to publish any book of the sort with even an approach to impartiality. No woman left out of it will or can be satisfied with it; and since satisfaction, in a commercial sense, has always to be paid for, perhaps there is no other business way of advertising feminine beauty than to compel those advertised to assist generously in defraying the expense of the delicate enterprise.

NOT THAT KIND OF WOMAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 20, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—I see that although you, in common with our daily papers, are thoroughly convinced of the frivolity and incapacity of women, you are never unkind or sarcastic at our expense. You are too chivalrous to attack those you consider unable to retaliate, but your efforts to please us humiliate by revealing your estimate of our intelligence. I acknowledge that we fall far, far short of that lofty type of womanhood which should have been developed by the educational advantages of this age; but I deny that the majority of our sex are so idiotic as to feel interested in descriptions of the entertainments and costumes of women who have gained no place in public estimation by the exercise of superior talent or virtue. It is the glorious power and privilege of the press to point out error; and it is even more potent than the pulpit in the correction of abuses, since its leaves are scattered where the preacher's voice is never heard, and are perused by many, more apt to be controlled by human than divine influences. Your voice has become a familiar sound in our ears. What lessons are you teaching us? Do you repeat the histories of those noble men and women whose lives were spent in efforts to benefit their race? Do your seductive tones awaken in our hearts a love of the beautiful and true, thus leading us on to higher aims and nobler aspirations? Or, in your desire to please, do you foster that vanity which is a disgrace to our sex?

Are we, the mothers, wives, and daughters of this city, a set of curious, babbling gossips, delighting in every minute detail of Mrs. A.'s last ball? Who is Mrs. A., that we should care to know that "she received her guests with polished ease, and looked superb in an imported dress"? Will you fill us with husks when we ask for bread?

Away with your glittering gems and silken robes? We want woman—woman whose genius has ennobled literature and embellished art; woman whose loving heart, directed by a cultivated intelligence, has placed her foremost in every undertaking to meliorate the sufferings or increase the happiness of her race. Tell us of George Eliot, Rosa Bonheur, or, better still, of Florence Nightingale, whose gentle hand and tender smile soothed the last hours of the dying soldier.

HELENA.

THE CAUCUS.

A Faithful Record of Proceedings in the Board of Education.

'Twas a wild, stormy night, and its murky pall Hung like a shroud o'er the City Hall. Along the alleys, and here and there, The gas lamps flickered; and lone and bare The sand-lot lay in the mist and wet, Its cherubs flown and the stand upset.

"Just the night for a comp d'etat,"

Stone remarked, as he hailed a car Groping westward on Market Street. Ewing nodded; and through the sleet I imagined that I could spy Something sinister in his eye.

"This is patent," I musing said,

"School Directors should be in bed Nights like this when the storm is out. Something breweth, I have no doubt. I will follow, and, as I ought, Write them up for the ARGONAUT."

So I stationed me silently

On the platform, where I could see 'Through the door-way; and, while the rain Beat and pelted the window-pane, On we glided, till, grim and tall, Rose the turrets of Record Hall.

All alighted, and Ewing's eyes Lit the passage, as fire-flies Light the forest, or onions glare Through the darkness. And up the stair, Slow and cautious—intent on sin—Stone and Ewing and I went in. Here were gathered, in stern array, Kimball, Wadham, and Galloway, Thompson, Hussy, and brave Van Schaick, Darling, Patridge, and stalwart McDonnell; Ferguson, too, and Mann, Lent their lights to the caravan. All saluted, and work began.

"Mr. President," Wadham cried,

"Schools is needful; that's not denied.

Schools and codfish is my delight.

We, however, have met to-night

Pledged to remedy certain things,

Sech as salaries, jobs, and rings.

San Francisco for years has been Robbed and plundered and taken in.

Now, if ever, the tide must stay.

Hence I move that a teacher's pay

Be reduced to ten cents a day.

"Better make it a postage stamp,"

Ewing whispered; and, "neath the lamp,

I detected his weather eye

Bent on Hussy evasively.

"Motion seconded," Thompson said;

"We are burdened and taxed and bled—

Taxed and burdened and weighted down,

Whilst these teachers parade the town

Dressed in satins and broadcloth suits,

High-toned laces and costly boots.

Why, the teachers way down in Maine

Earn 'most nothing, and don't complain!

We can ship from the eastern shore

All the teachers we want, and more—

Glad to enter and glad to close,

At such wages as we propose.

True, the people object, and say

'Cut expenses some other way.'

I, however, would have it known

We are running this thing alone.

Let the populace howl and fret!

We are cocks of the barnyard yet!

We must manage, and can defeat,

Public sentiment. I repeat,

Teachers' wages must take a fall.

Them's my sentiments, short and tall,

Paste 'em up on the outer wall!"

Back he settled; and near the door

Van Schaick motioned, and gained the floor.

"Mr. President," he exclaimed,

"I consider the project named

Impolitic and most unjust.

It will merit your scorn, I trust.

Would these gentlemen lightly frown

Every social barrier down? Must a teacher, in point of pay, Rank with coachmen? Or do you say Lady teachers of certain grades Earn the wages of chambermaids? Is instruction so base a theme, So unworthy of our esteem, We may shamelessly compensate Time and labor at this vile rate? Sin Francisco, so we are told, Swarms with teachers of Eastern mould: Boston teachers, who take no thought For the morrow, as Christians ought; Quincy teachers, who teach for love; Jersey teachers, who look above For their wages, and give no care To their stockings and high back-hair. Tell me, gentlemen, is it clear What these martyrs are doing here? If their labors are not for gain, Why the mischief don't they remain Where the codfish and budding eel Through the marshes of Jersey reel? One thing more, and I cease intrusion: Some Director has made allusion To a habit, with teachers grown, Of regarding their cash their own! This good Christian is shocked at boots Worth ten dollars; and broadcloth suits On a teacher offend his taste. Mr. President, I make haste, Now, and clearly, to stigmatize This contemptible exercise Of official and sacred trust. If a teacher prefers to thrust All his wages—and throw his pay, After earning it—in the bay, 'Tis his business alone, I say."

At this instant, my notes disclose, Something belloyed, and Partridge rose. "Fellow countrymen," he began, "You perceive that the gentleman Called Van Schaick is excitable. We, however, are seven still! Seven from twelve leaves five, you see; Hence the member amuses me With his twaddle and chivalry. We are striving—we must and can Run our schools on a cheaper plan. I consider no plan too cheap; In my judgment ten cents is steep When a nickle will serve decoy. I've been thinking we might employ Chinamen in the lower grades. Infant-whacking, like other trades, Seems adapted—"

I never heard

How he finished, for at the word Every member was on the floor; Angry gestures and wild uproar For a moment the building shook. I was frightened, and undertook Ostrich tactics, but found no hole. Stone, however, soon gained control. "Mr. Hussy may speak," he said, Hussy lifted his youthful head, Turned to Patrick, and thus began: "My impressions of any man Who could advocate and uphold Such a project were best untold— Fit conception of narrow-minded, Egotistical, penny-blinded— Well, no matter. I represent Kearney's sand-lot—an element Spurned and libeled, and deemed too low For the circles your honors know. None, however, who gather there— Poor and ignorant though they are— Not the meanest at heart so base He could countenance this disgrace! Mr. President, can it be Pride and honor and chivalry Are but myths of a golden past? Has our city come down at last To the level of Eastern things— Penny-squeezing, and piece-club rings? Once our country had nobler men; Men were lovers of women then; Men had spirit, and scorned the lead Boston proffered—her faith and creed. Now we tremble, and drop the lance; Boston fiddles, and we must dance; Boston whistles, and prices fall; San Francisco is weak and small— Fit for Chinamen, after all!"

At this juncture, to my dismay, Both McDonnell and Galloway Sprang together upon the floor. Both were angry, and furthermore One was pro the other was con; Hence they glittered and glared upon One another as felines do While conducting a hullabaloo. "Who's a Chinaman?" G. demanded; "I'm an orphan, but single-handed I can—"

"Order!" the chairman cried. Mae protested, but Stone denied, In three volumes, the right, and lo! While we watched in the lamp-light's glow— All a-tremble, and all agog— Kimball rose like a Cliff House fog. If, dear reader, you care to see His most wonderful homily, Call on Beanson. He wrote it down In the minutes, and charged the town For the service and labor done. Darling tells me that Ferguson, Being timorous, swooned away E'er he finished; but, yea or nay, Let the records of Beanson say.

Thus they argued; but, sad to state, High in heat of the wild debate— Ere the motion had reached a vote— Stone, in shedding his overcoat, Chanced to notice that I was there, Taking items behind a chair. In seven seconds, to my dismay, I was waltzed through the passage-way. Rude hands skipped me along the hall, Tossed me wickedly, notes and all, Down the stairway, and in the street I recovered my hat and feet!

One thing more, and my tale is through: I forgive then, and so must you. This, moreover, we all can do: Pray for Ewing, and at the throne Ask for Patrick and Father Stone.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 30, 1880.

ARDSON.

A full house, resplendent with all our beauty and fashion, with every seat taken and people even turned away, overbalances all moral objection to a play; and Mr. Maguire, who has labored hard and faithfully for an unappreciating public for more than a year, only regrets that Miss Clara Morris is unable to play the part of "Camille" more than two nights during her season. But Camille should have been buried with its author's father; it is a disgusting play, without morale, without reality, and what is far worse, unfit for polite ears, unpleasant to a pure and refined mind, and absolutely dangerous to the young and unsophisticated spectator. And then "Camille" is the most absurd of all unrealities. She is a coquette and a cocotte—a base offal of unclean French society, who feeds on pleasures procured for her through the lavish expenditure of her rich admirers. She is selfish, frivolous—in short, she is a very bad girl. She falls in love with "Armand Duval," deeply, madly in love; she renounces her former life and friends, and withdraws from her former splendor into a cottage in the country—all for the love she bears to "Armand." Then comes "Armand's" father and tells her that she will have to give up her love, because it will ruin her lover and her sister, and voilà! This impetuous, frivolous, bad girl gives him up without an hour's reflection; gives up her overpowering love, her very life, and leaves her "Armand" to believe that she has tired of his love, and is going to return to his more wealthy rival. Was there ever anything so inconsistent, so unreal? Or was there ever anything more objectionable than to have the inner life of a soiled woman paraded before an audience of good and virtuous people? I might overlook all this if there were the slightest moral to be deduced from it; but all that is gained by looking at it is the simple conclusion that, with the greatest stretch of imagination, you are supposed to have found a fallen woman who is ready to sacrifice her love for the good of her lover—and his sister. Happily, Miss Clara Morris, from physical reasons, is unable to play "Camille" again in San Francisco during her present engagement. She is worthy of better parts, and should dismiss Camille from her répertoire. Miss Morris is our American Sarah Bernhardt. She has not had the careful training of an élève of the Théâtre Français, whose fundamental principle is that "acting is not a business but an art," but she is gifted, and often seems to play her part through inspiration. It is then that she carries you away; it is then that you forget the actress, the stage, the audience, and even the leader of the orchestra. But it is not in her pathetic passages that she shines most, and for an actress of the emotional school that is a grave fault. It is in her off-hand colloquials that she appears to best advantage, for while her voice is very sweet when used in natural cadences, it becomes harsh when strained, and her fragile physique hardly admits of the heavy mimic that belongs to extreme passion. I promise myself a great treat in seeing her "Alixé" next Monday.

The support in Camille was strong. Mr. O'Neill is forcible, perhaps a trifle too forcible for a moaning lover; but then a man may be a good leading man without including "Romeo" among his favorite characters. They had two or three new people who improved the stock company very materially, notably Mr. Wells and Miss Beaudet.

Says Mr. Max Freeman to Miss Otilie Genée: "I am going to adopt the English stage. I am going to be stage manager for Mr. Maguire. I am going to appear with Miss Morris next week. Therefore I can not be your stage manager any longer, nor bother myself with your German stage. I resign." Says Miss Genée to Mr. Freeman: "Resign, indeed! I have given you your congé three or four weeks ago. Resign, indeed! No one resigns from my company. They get dismissed, but resign—never!" Says Mr. Freeman to the daily papers: "Tausendblitzdonnerwetter und Granaten! I resigned. I had to study English, and I resigned." Says Miss Genée: "You are another!" And here the matter rests for the present, and an expectant world stands mute, waiting for the end of all this.

The Colville troupe celebrate their one hundredth night of burlesque this evening with a benefit to Miss Roseau. One hundred nights of burlesque! There is stuff for reflection. Crowded houses every night to look at fair proportions liberally displayed, to listen to voices shrill and piercing, and to rapid localisms richly interlarded with gags by the leading comedian. Crowded houses every evening, while the California Theatre, with Mayo, Miss Cavendish, and Fanny Davenport, has brought the management to ruin; while Mr. Maguire has brought out sterling new plays from London and Paris and produced them ahead of any theatre in the United States, with strong casts and lavish appointments—to empty houses. One hundred nights of burlesque with a Roseau, whose vocal reservoir seems to be located somewhere between her nose and her palate, as a prima donna! There is a premium on brains for you! Who would ask any of the Nine for an inspiration when he can get on much better without it; when all he has got to do is to paint his face, clothe himself in shining rags, and jump about the stage as if nature had intended him for a frog?

And then, after you have looked upon a burlesque, and perhaps even laughed at some more outré extravagance, and gazed in the frosty moonlight, what remains? There is not even a remnant of fun in your thoughts; there is not even a sediment of pleasure, or sorrow, or enlightenment in your brain. You have paid your money for admission, you have admired Miss Everleigh's shapely "make up," you have wondered at the possibility of a man making a monkey of himself; you have laughed a half-merry, half-sarcastic laugh at the grim jokes; and you go home poorer in pocket, with a sort of idea that perhaps it was funny, and perhaps it was not. Now, is it not much better to look at the performance of a new play, a modern comedy like Forget-me-not, or Seyaphine, or Our Girls, or Engaged? They are all good in their line; you are bound to profit in some way; you are forced to remember some particular scene. It is most probable that you will benefit by certain parts of them some day in your life. Instead of debasing your mind, which burlesque will do more or less, a good comedy will elevate and refine it.

Well, they are going to leave us, these burlesquers; perhaps they know we have had a dose sufficient to last us for years to come. If ever they should return, I hope they will bring with them at least some good voices, something that will make their performance worth listening to.

STEPHANOTIS.

PRELUDES--IN DIVERS KEYS.

The immense success that attended the Wilhelmj concerts of last week has continued during the present one, the audiences being smaller but quite as enthusiastic. Mr. Wilhelmj, who on the first evenings exhausted his traveling répertoire, has since been playing some of those compositions in which he is heard to the best advantage—notably the Chaconne of Bach and concertos of Bruch and Beethoven—and materially deepened the impression made by his former efforts; he is indeed a magnificent artist. I still seem to miss in his playing the sympathetic quality that should be one of the first requisites in a truly great violinist; the tone is large, full, and round, but it does not penetrate, and lacks that indefinable something that is the main charm of what I call the true violin tone. One hears it occasionally in players of lesser rank. Mr. Louis Schmidt Jr. has it, and from what I hear from others (I did not hear him on his visit two years since), young Lichtenberg in a still higher degree. Those of our readers who still remember the tone of Paul Jullien, who played here many years ago, will understand precisely what I mean; it is a quality that, excepting to one who has heard and felt it, it is simply impossible to describe. Of the fine violinists who have played in this city during the past twelve years Wieniawski alone possessed it in any great degree; but he was then already suffering from disease of the heart and playing with great reserve, rarely giving free vent to what was within him, and only occasionally appearing at his best. This true quality—what in the voice we call timbre—one has naturally or not at all; it is not to be acquired, nor, when any one lacks it, can its absence be in any way made good. It is the most precious quality of the violinist; everything else is secondary to it. This I have felt in almost everything Mr. Wilhelmj has done here, but particularly in the concerto of Beethoven (of which he played the first movement on Wednesday), and in the transcribed Nocturnes of Chopin. In these latter, especially, I have seemed to feel the effort to attain a warmth of tone and style that is foreign to his nature; there was an evident intention in the right direction constantly frustrated by the nature of the player, which threw a chill over the performance, and made of the Nocturnes something very different from what Chopin ever dreamed of. Mere sliding up or down the strings or varying the tone from forte to piano will not do it, and compositions that we know in their original form and the clear-cut beauty of the Chopinesque piano-forte style, become positively offensive when so treated.

In the case of this Nocturne in G minor (Op. 32), transposed to E minor and an octave above its original register, the effect was almost barbarous. The Beethoven Concerto was on the whole a very fine performance, very broad and noble. Some of the exquisite grace of the lovely composition (it is one of the pearls of our Beethoven literature) was lacking, and somewhat of warmth. The Cadenza, also, strikes me as over-long and pointless. Of the three that I know—those of David, Joachim, and Vieuxtemps—either is preferable from a musician's standpoint. But Wilhelmj played his superbly, and would probably have done so had it been twice as difficult. The Chaconne of Bach was also a thing to be grateful for; it is in the broad, grand style of Bach that Wilhelmj is finer than any violinist I have ever heard, excepting only Joachim. What he lacks that Joachim has is what he will never attain: the fully satisfying quality of tone, suggestive of great warmth held in artistic reserve, and the immense sweep of the bow that makes it seem almost inexhaustible. Wilhelmj shifts his bow constantly in what in a player of less repose would seem a nervous manner; he frequently cuts a note in two (dividing it between an up and a down bow), and occasionally plays sad havoc with his rhythm (especially in anticipating the commencement of a measure) through his carelessness in this respect. The Concerto of Max Bruch (the first, in G minor) was new to me; I had previously heard only the slow (middle) movement. It impresses me as one of the finest compositions of its style that we possess, worthy of a place with those of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Joachim. Wilhelmj plays it as though he were of the same opinion, and in a manner that can not fail to impress this upon his hearers. It was a very noble performance.

The Piano-forte Recitals of Mr. Henry Ketten—Dashaway Hall, on Tuesday and Thursday evenings—have been successful beyond all expectation. Mr. Ketten has proved to be not only an immensely brilliant bravura player, whose remarkable tours de force dazzle the general audience, but a thoughtful and intelligent musician as well. His programmes have ranged from Handel to Liszt, including music of a great variety of styles, in all of which he seems to be equally at home; and perhaps one of the most remarkable features of these recitals has been the fact that the popular success of the Beethoven Sonatas played by Mr. Ketten has been not less great than that gained by the lightest and most catchy things he has done. I reserve a more detailed notice of Mr. Ketten's playing until after the concert (or matinée), which I understand it to be his intention to give some time during next week.

SOCIAL SACRAMENTION.

SACRAMENTO, January 27, 1880.

DEAR EDITORS.—'Twas not a gift of the gods sufficient to listen to Ketten's music, at the Congregational church last week, but Mrs. John McNeill must needs send us little "informal" invitations to meet this talented gentleman Friday eve, after his recital. What had Sacramento people done to deserve all this? Have we submitted gracefully to our New Constitution, and our legislators' manoeuvres at the Capitol? Have we paid our debts, acted our virtues, that we were allowed to know him personally, and converse with him in unstately conversation? Pray, dear friends, did you learn how charming he is, how versatile are his talents, and that he knows something else than how to make a Chickering talk? What a "pity 'tis 'tis true," there aren't more such gifted people in the world! Why do you suppose God had it that way?

Well, after we'd heard Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Liszt, Weber, Ketten, Chopin, for two fleeting hours, we were whisked down to Front and L in one of those noiseless hacks, and in another whisk Mrs. McNeill was saying, in her bewitching manner, "Mr. Ketten, allow me to introduce 'Betsy and I';" and then we were talking and laughing as comfortably as if we were quite as high up on the ladder of genius as Mr. Ketten. We confess, with blushes, that he's only a few rounds ahead of us! I heard a San Francisco lady say he hadn't left a whole heart amongst the fair sex in San Francisco, and I think Sacramento ladies are not behind their sisters, for we know ours are irretrievably, unpoetically smashed. Mrs. McNeill has elegant rooms, and is a delightful hostess. I'm sure she made the acquaintance of Ponce de Leon long ago, else how could the mother of a bearded son look like twenty-two? During the evening she sang—perfectly, as she always does; at least I heard Mr. Ketten say so, and he ought to know. And that male quartet—Freeman, Putnam, McNeill, and Crandall—gave us a little ballad, which would have been very commendable had not Ketten sung just before, and sung with a very powerful and cultivated baritone voice, and after all the encoring and playing at the church, too.

Mrs. McNeill served us a delicious little supper later in the evening. Around the table I noticed Mr. and Mrs. Felter and two daughters; Mrs. Berkeley, Mr. and Mrs. Cheney, Mrs. Houghton, Mrs. Glover, Mrs. Chesley, and Mrs. Gallatin (she has returned recently from the East, and is calmer, sweeter than ever; I never could blame Albert Gallatin for his infatuation!); the Misses Wait, Smith, Seeley, Gee, and Mrs. Hughson, Butterfield, and Mott, and some others who also embraced the opportunity of meeting the eminent pianist. I don't believe I told you, did I, that Mrs. McNeill assisted him in his recitals, and was enthusiastically received? At an early hour in the morning we parted with our host and hostess, with many thanks for the note which had given us such a thoroughly enjoyable "informal" evening, and took Mr. Ketten's hand with warmth and gratitude for the pleasure he had given us, and a last look at his poetic face.

Last Thursday night Mrs. W. R. S. Foye gave a candy-pull to a few of her young friends—not an old-fashioned, but an "imported" one, where a scientific candy-maker comes and makes the candy, and you do the eating of it, and the dancing.

Ada Ven (poor thing, everybody "picks onto" her!) has had a good deal to say about "teas" given in San Francisco. We suppose she thinks Sacramento ladies don't know anything about such things, because we have not mentioned them. Well, they do, but we haven't been invited: that's what's the matter. Sacramento matrons have not been backward in coming forward to drink the health of their fair neighbors in this Celestial drink. But, of course, until we are invited—ignorance will be bliss of all the naughty nothings and charming compliments said over these dainty cups.

We heard on one of the street corners that a four-cornered duel is to come off shortly; bankers and printers indiscriminately mixed. When the last sham shot is fired we'll tell you of the affair.

BETSY AND I.

On Mardi-Gras, February 10, 1880, an entertainment will be given at the California Theatre by a society composed exclusively of members of G Company. The parquette and stage will be floored over, and the entertainment will consist of a representation and tableaux on the stage, a grand march and character dance of a novel style, after which the guests will join in the dancing. This is not a military affair in any particular, but entirely different from anything ever produced in California. Guests are expected in party dress, and none but members of the representation will be in costume. The list of invitations will consist of only our very best society people, and no effort has been spared to insure a delightful party to the favored few who may be so fortunate as to receive invitations. All invitations will be complimentary.

Planquette's pretty opera, The Chimes of Normandy, has filled the house at the Bush Street Theatre during the past week, and will probably continue to do so until its withdrawal to make room for Pinafore, which is in preparation with an immense cast that includes—besides the entire personnel of the Melville company—Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, the admirable tenor of the Patti concerts. Pinafore is to be sung this time, as well as acted, for all there is in it, and will no doubt be a very different affair from the semi-amateur performances that have prevailed hitherto.

On the 12th of next month, at Platt's Hall, an entertainment will be given for the benefit of the "Old People's Home," a most excellent charity—in debt, as a matter of course—supporting some thirty old people of both sexes and all nationalities. The entertainment, under the patronage of such men as Gov. Perkins, Dr. Stebbins, Mr. Irwin Scott, and Mr. W. W. Dodge, will consist of vocal and instrumental music, concluding with a leap-year party, at which one may dance with his neighbor's wife as often as she may be pleased to compel him. Go.

M. Straus, the artist, has removed his studio to 319 California Street.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Just So.

Some men were born for great things,
Some men were born for small;
Some—it is not recorded
Why they were born at all:
And some (the worst of the lot)
Should have been born, but they were not.

The Lovers.

Silently fall the dew-drops
In the solemn eventide;
Ready a girl is getting
To take a buggy ride.

Soon will the maiden's lover
His arm around her slide,
While to his manly bosom
Her head will gently glide.

Savagely bites the mosquito,
Merrily bumbles the bee;
But all that the maiden sayeth
Is—once in a while—"Te-he!"

A Hymn of Perdition.

Heah dem wicked niggahs shout
When dat brimstone's ladled out,
In de mohnin', in de mohnin';
Dat time 'twill be too late to pray—
No time left 'on judgment-day,
In de mohnin', in de mohnin'.

It Might Have Been.

There was a young man with a shaddock,
Who met a young maid with a haddock.
He thought, "How I wish
She would give me that fish
In legal exchange for my shaddock!"
The maiden, who did not like haddock,
Thought, "Oh, what a beautiful shaddock!
If I were not so shy
I should certainly try
If he'd give me that fruit for my haddock."
He went on his way with his shaddock;
She went on her way with her haddock;
And so cruel is fate
That, until 'twas too late,
Neither one of them heard
That, by speaking the word,
He might just as well have had haddock,
And she might as well have had shaddock.

Col. Andrews, of the Diamond Palace, is again about to illustrate his enterprise and untiring energy in the prosecution of his business. This time in a direction that even his rivals in the same line of trade will admit is legitimate and commendable. He goes to the leading Eastern cities, and to London, Paris, and Amsterdam, for the general purpose of keeping himself advised of all that is progressive in his line. He will see all the newest styles of jewelry merchandise, observe the markets, bring out new and rare goods, and at the same time will take with him, for exhibition and sale, an extensive assortment of quartz jewelry. We who are familiar with these beautiful goods, from our daily pilgrimage through Montgomery Street, do not realize how really attractive and beautiful is this peculiarly Californian production. We look into the show windows of the Diamond Palace and other jewelry stores, and see it so profusely displayed, we see so much of it in common use, and it is so cheap, as compared with its heavy and intrinsic value, that we come to regard it as common. But taken abroad it will attract great attention, and command, we believe, ready sale. It is so genuine, and the gold is so harmoniously blended with the richly colored and clear quartz crystallization, that it is inimitable. Col. Andrews makes of this a simple business trip. He has so often visited Europe that sight-seeing or pleasure will take none of his attention from the objects in view. The manufacture of quartz jewelry ought to become an extensive and profitable industry to this coast, and if the Colonel can succeed in introducing it to the more favorable consideration of the Eastern and European trade, we shall reap an advantage from it, as from any other general and legitimate industry. It is the encouragement of an art as well as the promotion of an industry. Col. Andrews takes pride in hearing away with him the very best letters of introduction, and the very highest testimonials of his social position and commercial standing; among others, from his commercial brethren a traveling letter, and from the Red Men a strong endorsement over the great seal of the order.

A BRIEF STORY ABOUT CHAMPAGNE.—Champagne, like everything which is nice, keeps improving, and each brand has its season in the world of fashion. The Russian soldiers, in 1815, when marching on Paris, bivouacked in the vineyard of Mons. Clicquot, the husband of the afterward famous widow, and they liked the champagne so well that it became the favorite brand among them for fifty years. New Yorkers who are sixty years old can recall the time when Schneider Champagne, Anchor brand, was all the rage; then came Heidsieck, the Moët, then Roederer, then Mumm, as the successive fashions—and lastly, POMMERY. One finds this brand, with its modest and scarcely discernible label, at all the swell banquets and receptions. It is dry, and has a nice bouquet. It is better than a Seidlitz Powder or a fresh Congress, and there is not a headache in ten bottles of it.—New York World.

Not the least important feature in Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites is the Comfort, Buoyancy, and Vigor which is inspired by its use, and which is developed as the patient recovers from sickness.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

An old physician, retired from practice, having placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. W. SHERAR, 149 Powers' Block, Rochester, N. Y.

NORTHPORT, Wis., May 6, 1879.

JAMES I. FELLOWS, ESQ.—Sir: I have been using your medicine for over a year now and with the best effects. I have used twelve bottles of the Hypophosphites, and it has made a new man of me. I have been ailing over six years with a number of diseases, but lung difficulty was the most prominent. I have been under the care of a great many doctors, and have taken quantities of medicine without any apparent benefit, but appeared to be still growing worse and weaker until I accidentally came across one of your circulars, and was constrained to try your medicine; and I found its effects were almost magical upon me, and I was a surprise to myself and friends, having gained so rapidly in flesh.

I remain, respectfully, LAWRENCE DORAN.

The California Street Railroad is to be extended from Central Avenue to First Avenue, and, if possible, the road will be in condition for the running of cars before the seventh of next month. The extension will be about half a mile in length. Baldwin Steam Motors will run on the new section. All that is now required to place the road in running order is the removal of a small quantity of drift from the road-bed, which has been already prepared. The additional section will add greatly to the utility of the road, and will undoubtedly make it more popular. The building property, which it brings so much nearer the heart of the city, will be enhanced in value by the road, and the city's prosperity increased.

A good Baptist clergyman, of Bergen, N. J., a strong temperance man, suffered with kidney trouble, neuralgia and dizziness almost to blindness over two years after he was advised that Hop Bitters would cure him because he was afraid of and prejudiced against the word "Bitters." Since his cure he says none need fear, but trust in Hop Bitters.

I.

Leave me, grim Care, a little while,
I'm tired of frowns, let Fortune smile.
The roses open their hearts to the sun,
The west wind kisses them, one by one,
And they bloom to-day without a thought
For the ruin to-morrow's storm will have wrought.

II.

I, too, would fain forget the strife,
The grief and passion and strain of life,
And only know how the ardent sun
Kisses the roses, one by one,
And west winds waft their odors where
Birds sing and swing in gardens fair.

III.

Grim Care sits still and faces me—
Nor leaves me for my passionate plea;
Yet the west wind's breath is sweet to-day,
The roses are blooming their lives away,
And I can catch their odors rare,
Despite your frowns, O tyrant Care!

SANTA CRUZ, January, 1880. ISABEL HANMELL RAYMOND.

GOSSIP GRAY.

A Georgian Sketch by a Georgian.

"I reckon I've been livin' here mos' fifty year," said the old man, my neighbor Gray. "It's more'n fifty, ain't it, old woman?" appealing to his wife, an even older looking person than himself, who sat, white and aged, stolid as an Indian, calmly smoking her cob-pipe by the big fire-place.

"It must be fifty-three year," the old woman said after a due pause; "the widow was jus' leavin' to walk then. I remember how the little thing used to git about; an' she's goin' on to fifty-two, now, the widow is."

It sounded so strangely, this world's name for their eldest daughter, from the lips of her own mother, who remembered her a toddler on the cabin floor. I wished, with vague discomfort, that she had called her Jane or Betsy instead of the "widow." But—twenty-nine years! For this eldest daughter of the old couple had been "the widow" all those long years.

I sat in the old log cabin, by the bedside of the invalid daughter, Sarah, to whom I had brought some new magazines to read. For twenty years this most uncomplaining of Heaven's creatures had lived a life of quiet, helpless suffering. It had refined her till she was like a lily—the whitest human being I ever saw, with a pure, plain, reserved face, lying there placid in her bed, the pale, brown hair smoothly and neatly ordered, the hands long, white, and thin, with the delicate nails of a lady. Her voice was low and pleasant, too—not a jar of complaining in it, not an approach to whimper or impatience. I revered Miss Sarah as a real saint, although the chinks and walls about her were papered with "penny dreadfuls" which she had read during those motionless years—picture-papers of the rankest sensational type.

Miss Sarah's bed occupied one corner of the big square room, and the bed for the old folks the other, with a small high window between. At the foot of the old folks' bed was the front door, with its primitive fastening—latch and bobbin—and opposite, at the foot of Miss Sarah's bed, the door leading into the second room of the log-house, which was dining-room and kitchen together. The fourth side of the room was taken up by a huge stone chimney eight or ten feet wide, with a fire-place three or four feet deep, and by two small windows, one on each side of the fire.

The old mother had her regular seat by this fire-place, and whether I found her there in summer-time, when only a few embers glowed among the ashes, or in winter, when the great "back-log" simmered slowly and the lesser ones roared and blazed merrily, her trusty pipe was never far from her hand. I did not like Mrs. Gray when I first made this lady's acquaintance, I admit, but she "grew upon" me. At first she almost alarmed me—so frail and sickly was she, with such a flaccid white cheek and faded white hair, covered with a spotless, dead-white cap, but with dark, deep eyes which had a way of resting upon you with a serious not to say malignant fixedness; these dark, fixed eyes, and a large brown mole or so, contrasting strangely with her pale complexion. She spoke little, and the little she said came forth suddenly and unexpectedly. Altogether she seemed to me an uncanny old soul.

The old man was always as cheerful, on the contrary, as the sparkle of a winter fire. He is a tiny, brown old man, whose general aspect suggests that he was bigger once and has shriveled to his present proportions. He is a great gossip, and always comes in to talk when I go to see Miss Sarah, sitting in a low rusk-bottomed chair, a broad-brimmed felt hat on his gray head, no coat on his back, but wearing a plain homespun cotton shirt, an old pair of gray breeches, and a waistcoat. He wipes his mouth and shaven chin a good deal, as he talks, with his trembling old brown hand, and looks at you with twinkling brown eyes where life and vivacity still linger, though the old man has passed his eightieth year.

"Yes, it was fifty-three year ago that we come here to settle," the old man said. "The ground was all maiden-cane and pea-vines then, an' the cattle roamed through the country in herds. This house had been built an' one acre fenced in, but not cleared, when I come here an' bought it. There wa'n't no neighbors for miles an' miles. There was only a few houses in a settlement whar Decatur is now. An' that was all kyinds o' wild beasts in the woods around. An' deer! I've shot a fine buck standin' here in my house door, as they dashed right across below yonder whar the widow lives now."

"Wasn't it dangerous to let the cattle roam around loose, in those times?" I queried, in order to keep him talking.

"Well, every man owned more'n he could house; thar was a hundred or more runnin' loose with each man's mark on 'em; an' the owners'd all git together an' divide off, and the calves in the reglar season, an' git up a lot to sell. Thar was lots of profits for little work. Cattle wa'n't no way harmed—not often. Sometimes a calf after a new-born calf, but it'd blate, an' its mother an' try to defend it, an' all the herd'd come runnin' together an' gather round, an' the wolf 'd git out for fear o' tramin' to death. The most dangerousest thing I ever hearn tell on around here was when some neighbors o' mine, that lived about sixteen miles off, set out to hunt up their cattle—a woman, 't was, an' her son. They each tuk thar guns an' set out—"

"Did the woman know how to shoot a gun, too?" I rashly queried.

"Shoot?—Like smoke! That's what I'm tellin' ye! She was standin' off thro' the woods, some distance from her son, when she noticed there was a motion in the leaves not far from him, an' lookin' sharp she saw what it was—a painter jus' wigglin' its tail an' crouchin' to spring on her boy. She was the coolest, spryest hand you ever see. She leveled her gun—ker-bang! An' the painter jumped an' rolled an' bit the dust. She killed him dead as a door-nail, that woman did; shot him right thro'!"

"We came here from North Car'lina, in the fust place—from near Raleigh; an' after we'd been here a year or two, I was 'bleeged to go back to see 'bout some property my uncle had lef' me, an' some o' the other nices an' nephews was tryin' to june me out of. My cousin was with me that year—a likely boy, about eighteen—an' I left him in keer o' the place an' the folks, an' got on a horse I'd bought a year back, with some saddle-bags an' provisions, an' set off in a bee-line for home. I got along all right the first o' the journey, an' got to a house for the first night's sleep; but the next day I got kind o' turned out o' my course, on account o' a skeer o' Injuns, an' when night came I was off in the woods alone. I got off my horse an' rubbed him down, an' as well as I could calc'late I was sixteen mile from any place o' shelter, an' about two an' a half off 'n the reglar road. My horse was a good un, an' he would a stood it I thought, but he was some tired, an' so was I, so I made up my mind to camp out that night, an' was just unloosin' my saddle-bags, when I noticed how uneasy my ole horse was. He twitched his ears back an' forth, an' snuffed, an' fell a tremblin'; an' I hent my ear down an' listened, an' harkened, an' by an' by I caught it—a far-away sound o' wolves in chase! I knew thar wa'n't no time to lose, then; so I up on the horse's back, an' jerked up the rein, an' off we went like the breeze. I never took breath to listen untill I'd put five miles an' more between me an' that spot. Then I brought the ole horse down, an' listened. In a minute I caught the cry, an' we was off again, on a pretty fair road just then, an' goin' for all we had to lose. Mile on mile we went, an' ever an' on we hearn them beasts gittin' nearer an' nearer, an' ever an' on I knew my horse was goin' what he couldn't keep on at. At last they come in sight, an' my poor horse was most crazy with fear an' trouble, an' e'en about spent. He kept on, an' I got out my pistols, and turned in the saddle. They were gettin' close. It was moonlight, an' I saw the moon shine on the whites o' their eyes, an' saw their ugly black shadows chasin' after 'em. Thar was one big feller in front I kep' my eye on, an' as he gained on us, I took aim an' fired, an' he stumbled clean over hisself an' fell dead. I gave 'em the tother, an' they halted for a little; an' just then I saw ahead the place I was makin' for—an old deserted cabin that stood by the side of the road. I cheered up my horse, an' he hearn me like a human, an' on he drove, an' on them fellers come after us; an' one jumped on my horse's flank. I dealed him one lick with my whip that knocked him off just in time; an' I rode at the door o' that cabin an' busted it in, an' dashed inside, horse an' all. As I jumped off'n the horse an' flung myself back to try an' bolt the door, I hearn a great "Ugh! ugh!" an' up from the floor o' the cabin rose aginst me a big Injun that had been asleep thar! Lucky for me, he was a friendly one, an' as sharp's a brier, too. He understood in a minute, an' helped me bar the door, not a minute too soon neither; an' we made the old place tight, an' tended to the horse, an' staid there safe all night. I slept, too, like a baby, in spite of all their howling noises; an' next day the Injun an' me set off together, an' I got on all straight after that, an' home agin safe, too, you see."

The old lady, who had been listening calmly all through, without one sparkle in her eye or one movement in her chair, now took her pipe from her mouth and said, abruptly, as she always did:

"Silas, git Miss Alexanders them locusts I had picked up for her last time the wind blew so hard. Whar'd you put 'em?"

The old man got up and hobbled out at the door.

"Ma's remembered you said you hadn't had none since you were a little girl, and she wants you to have some now," Miss Sarah gently explained.

"Why, Mrs. Gray, how kind in you!" I said. "I had forgotten that I told you, but I remember now; you said there was a locust tree down the road, and I told you of those locusts I tasted once in Central Park, when I was a little girl, didn't I? I wonder if they will taste just as those did now?"

And I remembered—

"For you know, old friend, I haven't eaten
Mulberries since the ignorant joy
Of anything sweet in the mouth could sweeten
All this bitter world to a boy."

The widow now came in—a plain-faced, good-natured woman, wearing a Bismarck brown dress and a "false front" of hair very much the same color. She greeted me heartily, and presented me a big white plate, with raised blue figures on it, piled with clean, long, brown locusts, looking like gigantic withered pea-hulls. I broke one open and tasted the sweet fibrous brown lining, with the attentive eyes of the old woman upon me. It was the well-remembered pungent taste. I thanked the old mother over again.

"Pa, he gethers 'em to make beer," the widow said. "He ain't gethered many this year, tho'. He ain't gethered no persimmons yet, neither. He's 'mazin' fond of persimmon beer."

"The old man's gittin' feeble," abruptly declared his wife and relapsed into silence.

"He ain't follered the plow none for two year now," observed the widow, in a confirmatory voice. "He just does keep the gyarden goin'."

He reëntered as she spoke, with a basket in his hand, which he brought to me.

"Here's some groun'-peas for you, Miss Alexanders," he said, setting them down by me. "I done fust rate in groun'-peas this year. These is just fresh dug, an' I want you should eat some."

"Maybe Miss Alexanders likes hern roasted," the widow said. "Some folks does. I boil 'em for the old folks reglar. How do you like yourn'?"

"I think they're better roasted," I said, thankfully, for the prospect of eating freshly-dug, damp pea-nuts out of politeness was rather a distressing one. "And, by the way, talking of your garden, Mr. Gray, how did your cabbages turn out?"

"Well, they give me a heap o' trouble, fust an' last," the old man said, crossing his knees and putting up his hand as usual. "But I tried an old charm on 'em, an' it acted fust rate."

"How was that, Mr. Gray?" I asked.

"Well, you know the worms was in 'em bad; an' so I set out an' dug out nine of the worms, like the charm goes, an' put 'em in a bag, an' hung 'em up on a nail in the chimney here, to pehish (perish); an' they told me that when these nine should pehish, all the rest would pehish, too; an' I tried it; an' shore enough, they did. The very last one o' 'em was cleaned out!"

"Yes, they was, Miss Alexanders, for a certain fact," the widow added.

"Well, I am glad of it, for the sake of the cabbage," I said, "though it does seem a little uncommon, doesn't it?"

"Uncommon things is common as others, sometimes," abruptly ejaculated the oracle by the fireside.

The Mysterious Customer.

Toole relates the following story in a recent number of the Stage Door:

I was playing "Mr. Spicer Rumford" in Artful Cards, and you know in the second act he goes to an evening party, and has bought a pair of white kid gloves—regular party-going gloves, warranted not to split, at one-and-six. But they do split, and here is the fun of the introduction of those comical articles called hand-shoes by the matter-of-fact Germans.

The gloves were necessary for the fun of the play; they must be split, or there is no fun; and I usually keep a dozen pairs ready in case of emergency, as I have to split them before going upon the stage.

When acting in a celebrated provincial town, where they are extremely critical and particular, down to the smallest detail, my dresser told me that I had no gloves; I had used them all.

It was a dreadfully wet night, pouring cats and dogs, and all the best shops were shut up; so I told the coachman to stop at the first glove shop he came to. We came to a halt at a miserable-looking fourth-rate shop, where they sold cheap braces and mouldy neckties, fly-blown shirts, and the most alarming brass studs fixed into card-board.

The proprietor of this dingy emporium was just about to close, and seemed half asleep. I could see at once he was a surly, ill-conditioned fellow, and I don't think I improved his temper by making my request very earnestly and in a low tone, accompanied by a gibberish which he could not understand.

I heard him muttering to himself, "What does he mean? the man's a fool!" When suddenly, as he was bouncing about and losing his temper, I said, as distinctly as possible: "Have you got any white kid gloves? I don't understand your provincial dialect."

It was as well to turn the tables at once, and put him in the wrong.

He groped about until at last, when he was red with the exertion, he found a forgotten box of white kids. They were uncommonly dusty, and had evidently been the original stock of his grandfather's shop. I picked out a pair, and he went through the stupid formula of doubling them across my knuckles.

"I think these will do," he said.

"Oh! will they? Then give me a pair of scissors."

"They are untied; you don't want any scissors."

"Yes, I do."

I then deliberately cut the gloves in five or six places. The man positively shuddered, and said "Oh, don't!" It seemed to hurt him, although the gloves were mine. The more he shuddered, the more I cut away.

"But I could have got you a larger pair without that," he whined, as if he were in dreadful pain.

"They are quite large enough, my dear sir," I replied, hacking away; "but I like plenty of ventilation."

He shuddered again.

"Give me another pair!" I said fiercely, as if I were thirsting for destruction.

"Will you have a larger size? Do," he murmured. "Don't hurt them," he added with real pathos.

"No," I said, melodramatically. "Give me some larger scissors!"

I saw a large pair of scissors on the counter, and, seizing them, cut away at two or three pairs as eagerly as a child cutting up paper. The more I cut, the more puzzled and distressed he looked.

"There, that will do," said I, throwing down the money and pocketing the gloves.

"Will you have any paper? Oh, dear!" he roared, as if the scissors had been ripping him open, and he was recovering from the shock.

"No, indeed; not I. Belinda shall be revenged," I groaned between my teeth. "Thus will I destroy my hated rival."

He backed away from me as I waved the scissors in the air, and I could see by his terrified face that he thought I was stark staring mad. As I was leaving the shop I looked out and said:

"It's a lovely morning, isn't it?"

It was seven o'clock in the evening, and raining in torrents.

"Don't talk nonsense, sir," he replied angrily, but evidently very frightened and astonished.

With a hideous grimace I left the shop and jumped into the carriage. In five minutes I was at the theatre, trying to amuse the audience with the perplexities of "Mr. Spicer Rumford," while the puzzled shopman was brooding in the little back parlor over his strange adventure with his "Mysterious Customer."

"I have been looking inwardly lately a great deal," said Denis Kearney to Mayor Killoch, who instantly reproved him by saying that he ought not to gaze on vacancy.

THE TEST.

Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulteration, and will either cut or wear shiny.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE THIRD-TERM CONSPIRACY.

[COMMUNICATED.]

There is no longer any question as to the fact that General Grant is a Presidential candidate, and that he is a formidable one need not be denied. Two questions remain to be answered: Will he be nominated? And, if nominated, can he be elected? The first question will be answered in less than five months, the second in less than ten months. Upon the answer to the first question depends the life of the Republican party. Upon the answer to the second depends the life of the republic. If General Grant can be elected the third time he will be the fourth, fifth, sixth—for life—and would doubtless be able to name his successor. In view of such a result the questions of the probability of his nomination and the possibility of his election are of vastly greater importance than the mere election of a President for four years. This third-term business, if successful, is the thin edge of the wedge which is to destroy the republic. It is the "gopher-hole in the levee" which precedes the inundation. As no man can possibly have any claims upon the presidency, it is then but just to examine the ground upon which the pretensions of General Grant rest, and the motives which actuate that small but noisy band of conspirators who are so clamorous for a third term for General Grant.

No candid man who has carefully studied the history of General Grant's administration of the government for the eight years he was President, can fail to be impressed with the wonderful opportunities afforded to make it a most brilliant, a most successful administration, and of his complete failure to grasp the opportunity, and to add to his fame as a general that higher title of statesman. In history he will be known as the man who led our soldiers to victory and our politics to demoralization. Nor is his the first instance in history where a great soldier has been a very bad civil administrator. When General Grant was nominated for President in 1868 it was well understood that he was as ready to accept the nomination from the Democratic as from the Republican party. But before accepting the nomination from either party, and resigning his commission as General of the Army, he wished to be assured of a second term; and it is well known that Colonel J. W. Forney made him this promise on behalf of the Republican party. The result shows that the promise made by Colonel Forney was kept by the party. In fact, so completely had the control of the party passed into the hands of what is known as the "machine" in 1872, that General Grant was renominated without opposition by the Philadelphia Convention, although it is probable that that convention did not represent the wishes of a majority for the Republican party.

Much was expected by the people from General Grant as the successor of President Johnson, and it is doubtful if any President was ever inaugurated under more favorable circumstances than was General Grant; or if Congress and the whole people were ever more ready to give the President a cordial and generous support. The republic was but recovering from the terrible effect of our civil war, and in the settlement of the many difficult questions growing out of that war, especially the question of the reconstruction of the rebellious States. This had long absorbed the attention of Congress, and was watched with feelings of the deepest interest, not unmingled with fear, by the whole country. The question demanded the highest talents of a statesman. It was hoped and generally believed that General Grant possessed the qualifications which would make his administration at least successful. It was known that he had been in accord with Congress in its long and acrimonious contest with President Johnson. His election brought a feeling of relief to the whole country, and his inauguration was hailed as the beginning of a new era. It was, however, soon discovered that if the President was a great general he was very far from being a statesman. The peculiar traits of character which have since shown themselves so disagreeably conspicuous, and which have made his administrations so disgraceful, showed themselves in the appointment of his first cabinet. That he should have appointed A. T. Stewart Secretary of the Treasury is not perhaps surprising; but when it was found that under an Act of Congress Mr. Stewart was ineligible for that office, the President's insistence upon the repeal of that law was a matter of surprise to many. This law, it is understood, would have been repealed but for the determined opposition of Senator Sumner, so anxious was Congress to gratify the wishes of the President. But if the persistent and determined effort on the part of the President to make Mr. Stewart Secretary of the Treasury was a matter of surprise, what shall be said of the appointment of Mr. Borie as Secretary of the Navy? A more unfit appointment, it was thought at that time, it would be impossible to make; but President Grant found means, before the close of his second term, to make the appointment of Mr. Borie appear respectable by comparison.

Attention needs be called to only a few bad—not to say outrageous—appointments, made during the eight years of his Presidency. It is certain that these appointments contributed largely in bringing about the present disordered condition of the Government. In fact, the Republican party was broken down by its attempt to carry President Grant and his appointees; and that that party is now in the minority in the House of Representatives and in the Senate is wholly chargeable to the outrageous appointments and political blunders of President Grant. When Judge Hoar resigned the office of Attorney-General, his successor was a Mr. Ackerman of Georgia, a man whose qualifications for that office were that he was a third-rate lawyer; that he lived when at home thirty miles from any railroad or telegraph station; that he was wholly unknown; and that he would not make himself disagreeable to those who wished to control the patronage of that office. Since his retirement from office he has passed into that obscurity which he is doubtless best fitted to adorn. His successor was George H. Williams, who as Senator from Oregon had deserved and obtained the respect of the Senate and the esteem of his party friends. But the kitchen cabinet of the President determined to make him Chief Justice of the United States, and the ambition of his friends rather than his own was his political ruin.

When Governor Boutwell resigned from the Treasury, he was succeeded by Judge Richardson, an obscure judge of an obscure probate court in an obscure county of Massachusetts. Judge Richardson will be remembered as the Secretary of the Treasury who resumed specie payment with a quart-cup full of quarters, dimes, and five-cent pieces. He is now preserved as a fossil curiosity in the Court of Claims at Washington, D. C. Mr. Belknap, it was understood, received the appointment of Secretary of War on the recommendation of Generals Ingals, Dent (F. T.—a brother-in-law of the President), and Babcock. He was not known to possess one qualification for that office; but was appointed for substantially the same reasons that controlled the appointment of Ackerman. It is not probable that he would have been retained one day in office by Lincoln's great War Secretary, and yet he was selected by General Grant to occupy the place which Stanton once filled. But it was understood that he would not be in the way of the "friends" of the President, who thought themselves entitled to "run" that department, and who were determined to do so; and who, in fact, did succeed so well in this that the General of the Army (Sherman) was driven from Washington, and had his headquarters in St. Louis. Secretary Belknap was permitted to resign by the President after acknowledging he had committed a crime which is, and which ought to be, a felony. But whatever may be said of Belknap and his utter unfitness for the position he held and disgraced, he was in every moral quality infinitely the superior of Columbus Delano, so long Secretary of the Interior. Mr. Hamilton Fish—who held office longer than any other one of the twenty-six gentlemen who were members of President Grant's cabinets during his two terms—is in every way a very respectable gentleman, and gave great dignity to the office he held, the duties of which were ably discharged by Mr. Fred. Seward and Mr. Hunter. Mr. Fish is, however, in point of ability and by disposition, better fitted for an English bishop, with a seat in the House of Lords, than for an American Secretary of State. Mr. Bristow—a small man in any place except in President Grant's cabinet—was considered by the President as a suitable man for Secretary of the Treasury, until it became apparent that he had presidential aspirations of his own. He was at once driven from office—not to say "fired out." Governor Jewell, the successor of Postmaster-General Creswell, was summarily removed, on the suspicion that he did not favor the President's third-term aspirations.

Disgraceful, however, as were many of the cabinet appointments of President Grant, they were respectable when compared with other and less important appointments. He had for his private secretary General Babcock, who was not sent to the penitentiary, and for his most trusted and confidential friend A. R. Shephard, who many people were so uncharitable as to say ought to have been. This same Shephard was nominated by the President for one of the Commissioners to govern the District of Columbia, after Congress had abolished the territorial government as the only means of ridding the District of the ring thieves, of whom Shephard was the notorious head. Only five Senators were found base enough to vote to confirm him. California has the credit of furnishing one—Sargent, and Nevada another—Jones. It was not enough that John Lothrop Motley should be removed as Minister to England because he was the friend of Charles Sumner, but the vacancy thus created was occupied, not filled, by the appointment of General Schenck, who was retained in that position long after his connection with the Emma Mine swindle had become a disgraceful scandal. But if General Schenck failed to achieve a great or desirable reputation as a diplomat, he certainly made himself a reputation as the author of the best rules yet written on the "interesting and scientific game of draw poker." It is as the author of these rules that he will hereafter be known. The appointment of the Rev. Mr. Cramer as Minister to Denmark was doubtless a good move on the part of President Grant; one brother-in-law was thus sent out of the country when there were still too many left. But it was hard on Denmark. The appointment of "Jim Butterworth" as Assistant U. S. Treasurer at New York—of "Tom Murphy" as Collector at the same port—of Simms as Collector at Boston—of Casey, another brother-in-law, as Collector at New Orleans—are but samples of a long list of appointments which should not have been made, and for which President Grant, and not the Republican party, should be held responsible; but which served nevertheless to break down and destroy that party.

The effect of this class of appointments was plainly seen here in California. Here they will be long and bitterly remembered by the old and respectable portion of the Republican party who were Republicans when there was nothing to gain and much to lose by being Republicans—when that party was in a hopeless minority. These men were Republicans from principle, Republicans before the war, during the war, since the war, and will be Republicans when the camp-followers and plunderers—who came into the party to hold office, and when they could hold office no longer or control that organization, have attempted to destroy it—are found voting the Democratic ticket, or a worse one if a worse can be found. The trinity which was all powerful in controlling appointments in California, which consisted of Gorham, Carr, and Sargent, made it possible for La Grange, Van Dyke, Coghlan, Rollins, Coey, and Pinney to be appointed and retained in office here. By the inefficiency of some of these appointees, the dishonesty and downright villainy of others, large sums of money were illegally paid out at the mint, much larger sums were squandered at the navy-yard, and the merchants and bankers were swindled out of nearly one million dollars.

It is to the insolent arrogance of Gorham, the weakness, obstinacy, almost imbecility, of Sargent, the presuming ignorance and cupidity of Carr—to the assumed and self-appointed leadership of these men, and to the fact that they were able to control the Federal appointments here—that the Republican party owes its defeat at the State elections in the last twelve years. It was this that elected Governors Haight and Irwin, and sent Farley to the United States Senate. The same result was accomplished in Massachusetts, which in 1868 gave General Grant sixty-five thousand majority, but before he left office the Republican party in Massachusetts, under the control of his appointees, became so demoralized and disgusted that a Democrat was elected Governor of that State by more than five thousand majority.

The administration of General Grant was the golden age of aspiring mediocrity, shoddy contractors, and successful stock-gamblers—when wealth was considered the test of respectability, and to be connected with the Dent family a sufficient qualification for office. His was the only administration in the history of this government when an obsequious Senate formed its committees to suit the President. And the disgraceful fact remains that Charles Sumner was deposed from the Chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations at the dictation of the President.

It is perhaps needless here to call attention to the Santo Domingo farce, and the attempt of the President to force the Senate to ratify the "Bayas Treaty" in the interest of one of the most infamous rings ever formed. The testimony of ex-Senator Cole, if the whole truth could be had, would be particularly interesting in regard to this Santo Domingo business. Neither may it be necessary to recall the tenacity with which the President clung to his friends of the historic Whisky Ring—how he followed them to the very door of the penitentiary, and only left them when that door closed leaving them on the inside, and left them then only to write their pardons.

Is it to reward such an administration as this that General Grant is to be elected the third time President of the United States? Is it to revive and perpetuate the régime of Shephard, Babcock, Belknap, Delano, and the Dents, that the rule which has governed in all our presidential elections—which should be in the Constitution, but which is not the less sacred because unwritten—is to be disregarded and set aside? This may not be the avowed purpose, but it will be the inevitable result, should this third-term infamy succeed. Are the people of this country still so greatly indebted to General Grant that the debt can be paid in no other way? Have the services he rendered been greater than were those of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, or Jackson? Or is his patriotism greater than was theirs? Is it not rather the sublime selfishness of General Grant, his inordinate self-appreciation, his boundless capacity for accepting presents, aided by a few unscrupulous and aspiring politicians, and a much larger number of cormorants who would hail his return to power as the return of the "good times" when the White House was the heart, the center, of the "Military Ring," the "Indian Ring," the "Santo Domingo Ring," the "Whisky Ring," and every other combination formed to rob the government. Not that General Grant ever certainly did, or ever probably would, profit by any of these schemes of robbery; but he was the President who "stuck to his friends," when his "friends" were thieves.

If the Republican party is so poor in statesmen that there is no one in that party but General Grant fit for the office of President, or no one who could be elected if nominated, then the time has arrived when it should die and be decently buried. And let Blaine, Garfield, Washburne, Sherman, Conkling, Edmonds, and a hundred and fifty other Republicans, any one of whom if nominated could certainly be elected, die with their party, and their epitaph shall be: "Here lie the political remains of one hundred and fifty-six gentlemen, any one of whom the Republican party in 1880 were able to and would have elected President of the United States; but they chose rather that their party should commit suicide, and died each for themselves, and all together, rather than any one of the remaining hundred and fifty-five should be elected President."

The name of General Grant for the great services he rendered the republic in the suppression of the rebellion deserves to be, and ever will be, held in grateful remembrance by his countrymen. But his administration of the government for the eight years he was President should be, remembered only with shame and sorrow.

ROSEMARY.

Only a little green and bitter spray
Of fading leaves I give into thy keeping,
A bunch of rosemary, chilled by the frost,
And withered by the tears my eyes are weeping.

"'Tis for remembrance," love. Oh, pray remember
Our spring-time wandering and our summer days,
When you were all the world, and I was happy
In winning from the world my meed of praise.

There's not a path which we have walked together
But seems a hallowed spot forever more;
There's not a page whereon thine eyes have rested
But I have learned its lessons o'er and o'er.

There's not an hour, however dark and dreary,
But hope revives with memories of thee.
Then take this rosemary—'tis for remembrance,
And oh, I pray you, love, remember me!

I left the heart's-ease and the purple pansy
To fade and wither under wintry skies;
I could not wear the one, nor bear the other,
So much of thought was in their honest eyes.

But from my garden bed this little spray
I rescue from the pitiless November,
And bid you wear it for the thought it brings—
Wear it for me, and oh, I pray, remember!

RICHMOND, IND., January, 1880. MRS. D. M. JORDAN.

MAGDALENA'S CRIME.

I.—THE TEMPTATION AND THE CRISIS.

Genoa in June. In clouds of visible blue the heat hung from the house-eaves in the narrow streets, while upon the terraced hillside, on palace tower and cathedral spire, lay the rich sunshine, touching the gray stones with mellow light, twining the vine leaves with golden tendrils, and dying away in the pleasant recesses of shade. Outside the city, and overlooking the slumbering fields and vineyards, Monte Faccio, garlanded with the sun, stood against the deep blue sky,

"The lord of many lands."

Near by, in the valley of the Bisagno, nestling among the vineyards and almost covered with vines, stood a stone villa shining in the sun. Viewed from a certain angle the effect was unpleasant, because of the glare from the white stones, but the massive portico, with its spillars wreathed with vines, was homelike as well as beautiful. This villa in the heat of noon seemed asleep, with its heavy red curtains closed against the day, like a toper's eyelids smitten by the sudden dawn. Even the great blue-bottle flies were afflicted with the general weariness, and droned upon the dusty leaves. Around this spot was no sign of either life or motion. The laborers in the vineyard who toiled in the shadier hours—not for the reward which cometh of the Father, but for the silver and copper which cometh from the wealthy employer—were courting perspiring sleep in sylvan couches beneath the rugged wall; dreaming, perhaps, of heaven as a vineyard of lovely women fenced in with icebergs of sliced oranges, confetti, and wine.

In a cool arbor, about a rod from the house, half sat, half reclined, a young woman. Her dress was that of a house-servant, yet her face bore upon it the stamp of the softened beauty and pride of the earlier Romans, which generations of poverty and ecclesiastical rule have failed to erase from the Italian countenance. In her hand she held a roughly written note which she read with rising color and heaving bosom. Suddenly springing to her feet she thrust the note into her bosom, and muttered through her set teeth, while her eyes gleamed with triumph:

"Maria, it has come at last. Netted and fairly caught. Why not? There's not a girl in Genoa of my station with a prettier figure than mine—aye, or face either. Giuseppe Corticelli will have reason to be proud of his wife. I give him beauty for wealth, and the hargain's a fair one. He asks my hand in marriage. I shall not say no. Giovanni Arata must not stand in my way."

"Magdalena!"

She turned quickly round, with a nervous twitching of the lips.

The speaker stood bareheaded at the entrance to the arbor. He was a pleasant-faced young man, about twenty-five, with broad shoulders and clustering black hair.

"Giovanni."

The tone in which the word was pronounced was irritable, and was followed by a look of annoyance.

The young man observed the glance and gesture, and repeated it as if he were a mirror.

"You do not seem pleased to see me here, Magdalena."

Notwithstanding the assumed calmness with which he spoke, his voice faltered as he pronounced the name of the woman who was dearer to him than all else in the world—dearer to him than his God.

"Is it necessary, Signor Arata, that I should fly into transports when we meet?"

As she spoke, her cheek paled, and a hard glitter was in her eyes. This woman had a task to perform, and her mind was fixed upon its accomplishment. She loved the man before her as far as it lay in her sordid nature to love. It was not her fault that she did not love him better. She was born in selfishness, and the trait, which was first moulded in her mother's womb, grew with her growth, stronger and stronger from infancy to womanhood, darkening every noble thought and bright resolve, and dragging her down deeper and deeper into a quagmire so foul and so fast that all the angels could not pull or pray her out of it. Yet it was not her fault that she was selfish any more than that she was beautiful. Yet do not believe that the part she was acting gave her no pain. Her moral perceptions were not so dulled that she could not feel the cold hand of remorse knocking at the door of her conscience and pleading for admission. Giovanni was a handsome man, and what was better, as good as he was handsome—but then he was poor.

Even as she stood there before him, choking down with a strong hand whatever old-time tenderesses might be struggling with her resolve, her heart was sobbing within her. As her eye fell upon the curly locks, dropping upon the broad shoulders, she remembered, with all the sting of pleasure faded away, how often she had twined her white fingers through them; how often she had wound her shapely arms around that bronzed neck; how often she had rested her head, with a little flutter of joy, upon that broad chest. And shading all the tenderness that such a feeling inspired, came the thought—sharp and sudden—that another might some time seek the same resting-place.

Even while such reflections flitted through her mind there rose within her a voice like a great foaming wave, drowning all other voices, "Why should I regret luxury and wealth, when offered by the man I do not love, for the sake of toil and poverty with the man I do?" And her spirit of selfishness answered her as she willed it.

Her lover was quick, as sensitive lovers usually are, to observe the change in her. The hard gleam in her dark eyes, and the compressed lips as white as her cheeks, told him that the pen of self-interest had already signed the death-warrant of love. But the shock of humiliation was quickly succeeded by the smart of angered pride. As he reflected that this woman had permitted his caresses, had told him with her eyes and with her lips that his love was hers and her love his, a hot flush colored his brow, and he replied, hoarsely:

"No, Magdalena; it is not necessary that you should fly into transports when we meet, but—what has happened? How have I offended you?"

This gave her the opportunity she desired.

"No, Signor Arata, you have not offended me; but don't you think it is time that this folly should cease? I think it is selfish in you—yes, selfish—to think of wedding me. We are both too poor. Let us go our separate ways. We can still be friends. Why should I throw away the brilliant future of a young life for love and poverty? It is better that I should speak of this now before it is too late."

"Before it is too late," murmured he, mechanically.

"Before it is too late," she repeated.

"You mean that all is over between us?" he exclaimed, almost savagely.

"I mean that marriage between us is impossible, as well as unwise. In short, Signor Giuseppe Corticelli has asked me to be his wife, and—"

"You have consented?" interrupted Giovanni, passionately.

"I have consented," she replied, cowering before him now that the truth, or rather the falsehood, was out.

He sprang forward and fiercely grasped her wrist.

"Look at me, she-devil!" he hissed. "Nay, do not imagine that I am about to sue you for the return of your worthless love. Corticelli got it for the asking. Bought it for his gold. For his gold! d'ye hear? And this is the thing I lavished my affection upon! The painted courtesans of Genoa may point to Magdalena Serpelli and say 'She has been more fortunate than we. She sold her charms for gold to one man, while we must trade with the many.'"

The unhappy woman sank, terrified, upon the hench. Her lover was white with passion, and as he raised his clenched fist to emphasize his words she thought he was about to strike her, and drew back, shuddering.

"Spare me!" she cried.

"Spare you?" he shrieked. "Curse you! In the name of all that is pure and holy and good and true, in the heart of man and in the soul of woman, I curse you! In the sacred name of virtue, I curse you! In the name of love, which you have betrayed, I curse you! Yes, with my eyes which will not weep for you, with my heart which will not feel for you, I curse you! Beneath my feet I crush your serpent eyes and tiger heart. I call on God, who is love and justice, and whom you have outraged, to curse you. I call upon the sun to burn you with fever, and upon the stars to shine pestilence upon you! And if the great God should choose to curse an innocent babe with your likeness, I pray that it, too, may bring down upon you sorrow and disgrace!"

He paused, with outstretched, quivering arm.

Magdalena, overpowered by the torrent of invective, sobbed convulsively, with her face in her hands.

When he spoke again his voice was in tears.

"You have broken me like a toy. I curse you, I despise you, I pity you; but oh, God! how I loved you. Farewell!"

Her handkerchief lay on the ground near the entrance to the arbor. He picked it up, pressed it passionately to his lips, and placed it reverently in the breast of his blouse.

She never saw Giovanni Arata again.

When he had gone, this woman sank to her knees and prayed to the Virgin.

II.—THE FULFILLMENT OF THE CURSE.

December 31st, 1875—nineteen years later. In that part of Broadway which lies within a stone's throw of the notorious Barbary Coast of San Francisco, there are several narrow alleys, inhabited by a mixed population of Irish and Italians. In one of these alleys nearest Montgomery Street stands a rickety wooden tenement-house, a dilapidated piazza on the second story distinguishing it from its less aristocratic neighbors. Some of the broken window-panes in this building were stuffed with paper, while the piazza was decorated with sundry articles of underwear. In a wretched apartment on the second floor of this tenement sat a woman and her daughter, the former engaged in sewing a dress, and the latter, a girl of seventeen, seated at a table, with her head bowed in her hands. Like her mother, she was a type of Italian beauty. The daughter was fresh and fair, while the mother was pale and careworn. The girl sat in a sort of reverie, and cast uneasy glances at the clock, which was ticking as industriously as if there were no such thing as an old year to fret over, or a new year to be welcomed. At length she raised her head, and exclaimed, in a weary tone:

"I wonder what keeps father out so late. It is almost nine o'clock."

"I don't know, Magdalena," answered her mother, with a sneer; "over at the Bottle King's, drinking beer with his besotted companions, I suppose."

The girl sighed, and watched the clock uneasily. The child of Magdalena Corticelli inherited all her mother's self-will, with her father's generous and affectionate disposition. Her child-heart had always yearned for something warmer than a mother's indifferent kiss. There were bright days that she remembered, when her father was not a drunkard,

But she never could forget—and she was always grateful for it—that her father, whether in his cups or out of them, had always a gentle word and a kind glance for her. It gave her special pleasure to recall the dear old time when she used to sit upon his knee, and listen, with the simple wonder of childhood, to his stories of the fairy land, far, far beyond the stars. So in the heart of the grown-up shop girl the flower of her father's affection bloomed fairer day by day, in spite of poverty and the degradation of the feeble old man. He looked to her in his declining years and utter helplessness for protection against the bitter words and angry glances of a wife who did not love him when fortune smiled upon them, and who hated and cursed him when reverses came. There was something touching, also, in the trustfulness with which he appealed to her in such moments, and in the happy smile with which he greeted her presence. And as she sat watching the expressionless face of the clock, now and then furtively glancing at the unsympathetic face of her mother, the tears welled into her eyes with the thought of the dear old times, gone by forever, when she grew and blossomed into womanhood under the sunshine of a father's smile. The very contrast of those days with the present wrung her soul almost as much as the one great grief which she had to hear in silence and in shame, alone. She felt like crying out in agony for help, for sympathy, even as He cried out in the Garden of Gethsemane, not for His own sin, but under the burden of the sins of the world. Under the burden of her own sin she was suffering a crucifixion and a bloody sweat, all the more agonizing because unseen. Even such crucifixions are going on every day around us, and they will continue to darken the Calvary of the erring soul away.

A sigh broke the silence. Her mother had finished the dress which cost her many long hours of toil, and was wrapping it in a newspaper. Magdalena Corticelli had altered very much since that warm summer day when she crushed the love of Giovanni Arata beneath her feet. Care, sorrow, and remorse had left their traces on her countenance, but its expression had not relaxed one jot of its cruel selfishness. As she tied the parcel neatly, every movement of her white and supple fingers, every turn of her head, and every motion of her rounded figure was replete with grace and harmony. Carefully arranging her bonnet and shawl in front of a small mirror, not without a touch of that coquetry which does so much toward enhancing the charms of a beautiful woman, she moved to the door.

"If that drunken dog comes in, you will find some cold meat for him in the cupboard."

Saying which, she closed the door behind her and went out into the darkness.

Minute after minute passed by, and found the girl still in reverie. When at last a slow, uncertain step was heard on the creaking stairs, a flush of joy covered her cheeks, and a terrified face, with mild blue eyes, a broad brow, and gray hair, surmounting the tottering form of Giuseppe Corticelli, appeared in the aperture. She threw her arms about him.

"Oh, papa! I'm so glad you've come. There, sit down, and I'll get you something to eat—you dear, good, naughty papa."

His eyes lighted up as she kissed him, and he nodded to her smilingly while she set the table.

"That's right, Birdie; that's right. My little canary will sing for her father—will sing for her poor, tired father."

His chin sank upon his breast, and he was silent. Blacker and blacker upon the night fell the shadow of a great cloud that shrouded the face of the moon.

Magdalena sat opposite him and watched him eat, with tenderness and love beaming out of the great shadows that lay within her eyes; and when the old man had finished, and the table had been cleared, she sat upon his knee with her arms encircling his neck.

"Ah! that's my little canary; you love your poor old father yet. You won't let your mother strike him any more, will you, Birdie?"

"Hush, papa," she replied, with an apprehensive nod toward the door; "you must not talk that way."

"I must not talk that way? Eh, Birdie?" repeated the old man, with a bewildered air.

"No, papa."

"Then I will not—I will not. If my little Birdie says so it must be right—it must be right."

"Papa," she said, brushing back his hair fondly, and gazing into his eyes; "papa, do you remember the happy days, long, long ago, when you used to take your little girl on your knee, and tell her of the bright home in heaven, where there is no more sorrow and no more pain?"

"Yes, Birdie. Ah! happy days, happy days! My little canary sang for me often then. She does not now. The days are darker now for my Birdie. The sunshine does not come so often."

"Yes, papa; and I want your attention to what I am going to say, dear, because—because we may not have so good an opportunity for talking together for a great while."

"Yes, my Birdie, yes," murmured the old man.

"And papa, you remember how you used to tell me of the love—that the good Christ has for wretched sinners—how he listens to their prayers when their hearts are sore with sorrow, and fills them with a blessed peace that they could never know without. It was you, my dear papa, who first taught me that Christ loved me and other poor girls so well that He came down from Heaven, and died for us in pain and humiliation."

She paused and sighed. The shadow without grew darker and darker, and the moaning of the wind more plaintive.

"I have often thought," she continued, laying her cheek against his forehead, "that the good Christ sometimes gets tired of all the sin on the earth, and closes His ears to our prayers. I have prayed, oh! so hard, lately, that God would make me a good woman; for then I would be oh! so happy."

The young face nestled upon the gray head. When it raised again the cheeks were wet with tears and the voice was broken.

"I was happy once, when I used to tell you everything—even my silly little thoughts in my childish way, and looked up to you for advice and sympathy. And I am ever so grateful to you, dear papa, that you never closed your heart to me when I needed your love. You said to me once, and oh! how bitterly it comes to me now: 'Magdalena, my girl, whatever may befall you, never lose sight of your self-respect or your sense of duty.' I did not fully understand you then. I do now. You also said; 'I would rather see my little girl lying dead at my feet, much as I love her, than to hear a whisper of deserved reproach upon her name." Papa, dear," and her voice sank to a mournful key as she said it, "that happy time has gone forever. You will always love your Birdie. Pity her now. Forgive her for all the pain she has ever caused you. Pity and forgive her."

She laid her head upon his shoulder and sobbed bitterly. He, partially stupefied with liquor, did not take in all that she had said. He knew that she must be in distress, and that was enough for him. Taking her hand in his, he kissed it affectionately in his half-dazed way.

"Don't cry, Birdie, don't cry. Has any one hurt you? Did that she-devil scold you? I am not so strong as I was, Birdie; not so strong. My head is weak, and I can't understand all this."

Magdalena sobbed as if her heart would break. Then, dashing away her tears, she sprang to her feet with an imperious gesture. Her face was deathly pale.

"Papa, you told me once, long ago, that the blood of a Corticelli would stagnate if tainted with dishonor unavenged. Whatever else your little girl may have forgotten, she has not forgotten that. Come with me, my dear, dear papa."

She looked at him pleadingly, with outstretched hands. Her cheeks were wet, but her eyes bright and determined. With an air of mute surprise he rose and followed her through the dark alley in silence. Three blocks down Broadway she turned to him suddenly and said:

"Wait here until I come back to you."

She paused for a moment before a two-story dwelling, walked firmly up the steps, and rang the bell.

Her father, becoming sober under the influence of the cool air, watched her movements with increasing interest.

The door opened, and, after a few words too low for him to overhear, he saw her walk out upon the sidewalk with a man whom he had known for some time as a sweetheart of hers.

"H'm! Luigi Gallipoli—I like him not. He has a fox face and a bad heart. What does my little girl want with him now?"

"Well, out with it. What do you want?"

His voice was harsh, and had a sharp sneer in it. His face was in shadow, partly illuminated by the red glow of a cigar which he held between his teeth. The moonlight fell full upon the girl's upturned countenance. Her reply came clear and sharp on the night air:

"I want you, Signor Luigi, to redeem the promise you made me—the promise which I confided in, to my shame. I have waited too long already."

Her eyes seemed to burn into his. A hurricane was raging within her. Despite his brutal coldness she was even then yearning for a kind look from him; despite his perfidy and his mean and cruel nature she loved him. She felt this, too, and almost despised herself for it.

"You talk in a rather commanding way, miss. You want me to marry you."

The words were followed by a low chuckle of disdain which stung her to the quick. A hot flush darkened her face, and when she spoke again her voice was husky:

"Yes, Signor Luigi, I want you to marry me. I did not shame you as a sweetheart; I would not shame you as a wife. You must marry me, and atone for the wrong you have done me."

She struck her dainty foot upon the pavement, and quivered with passion, like an arrow vibrating in the heart of an oak.

"Marry you! The thing's impossible. Go away from me."

He rudely shook off the hand she had laid upon his arm, and turned away. She followed him with a quick step, and grasped him by the coat lapel. With a muttered execration he turned upon her.

"Signor Luigi, I tell you you must marry me."

"Let go of me, you —"

He took the cigar out of his mouth and deliberately spat in her face.

A flash of steel, a dull thud, a heavy fall, and the girl stood bewildered, with a blood-stained knife in her hand. The pallid face lying on the pavement at her feet, and looking up to her with glazing eyes, would never sneer again at anything in God's world.

Among those who rushed to the spot, attracted by the cry of Giuseppe, was a powerfully built man attired in the garb of a fisherman. He knelt by the corpse, and felt its wrist.

"Girl, you have killed him!"

As he glanced upward at the white face of the girl the blood forsook his own, and he exclaimed, in the Italian tongue: "My God, how like her!"

"Magdalena, my child, what have you done? Come away from here," said her father, taking her by the arm.

"Giuseppe Corticelli!" gasped the stranger. Then, after a pause: "Oh, God! how terribly have I been avenged!"

Giovanni Arata bowed his head upon his breast. The curse uttered nineteen years ago, on that sunny day in Genoa, came back to him like a revelation.

JOHN P. COSGROVE.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1880.

The resentment of the Roman Catholics (says the New York Tribune) at the treatment they have sometimes received in Harper's Weekly has probably led to their effort to establish an illustrated paper for themselves. The first number of The Illustrated Catholic American is just out. It is a close imitation of Harper's Weekly in size and general appearance. The first page is occupied with a handsome portrait of Cardinal McCloskey in his robes of office, and several other illustrations are distinctly Catholic and well done. The paper evidently aims at being a sort of Catholic Harper's Weekly. After outlining its plan it says: "We shall not forget that a principal office of such a paper as ours will be to develop and foster a school of Catholic American writers and artists."

Courage, dash, and energy, quite unusual with the South American republics, have characterized Chili in the recent little affair with Bolivia and Peru. It is true that the former State has done all its fighting by proxy, but it is quite evident that Chili could have easily whipped any Bolivian army which might have been sent against it. For a South American State, the military and commercial prosperity of Chili is anomalous, despite the recent neglect of both Mr. Seabough and Mr. Sam. Williams.

AMERICAN PATOIS.

And a General Dissertation on Dialects.

The ancient Greeks had a class of words which they styled onomatopœia, because they carried their signification with their sound, and there are many philologists of this day who believe that in this very thing that the Greeks called onomatopœia lies the origin of all language. To be plainer, and using our own language for the purpose of exhibiting the idea, such words as the crash of a falling tree, the whizz of a bullet, or the growl of a dog, are supposed to be sufficiently lucid examples. In our coinage of words we are continually producing those of this character, for what can be more expressive of the idea of running rapidly away than "skedaddle," or what could say plainer that one has a limping gait than to observe that he goes "hippithop"? The term "jimjams" seems to thoroughly convey the idea intended, and its spontaneity is undoubted, while "rambunctious" is full to overflowing with meaning. "Skedaddle" has already found its way into the dictionaries, and the others will, with the unerring certainty of coming editions.

In the beginning men imitated the sounds of nature until they had established sufficient word-signs for the foundation of a language. With all the centuries that have passed, and with the changes of countries and climates, other languages have grown from the first great root; and that their extraneous enlargement should come from similar causes as those which produced the first language, is as natural as, that we should have ever so many dialects hanging to every language. Sufficient evidence of the correctness of this part of my theory lies in the fact that where language was introduced by the Latins, for instance, the natives of different geographical divisions, having tongues distinct from each other—so very distinct that they cannot converse together intelligently—can easily do so by becoming familiar with the mother tongue; and any one, no matter whence he comes, who knows Latin, finds no difficulty in quickly acquiring French, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, or English. Our language in its purity, if it has any, is a compound of Latin and Saxon, and "the United States language" is a mixture of everything in the shape of language on the face of the earth, from the mumbling of a Piate to the pedantries of a professor at Harvard. The English, of course, largely predominates. This has been caused by the cosmopolitan make-up of our population. We have gradually and unwittingly incorporated into our actual vernacular many words clearly French, Spanish, German, Celtic, Indian, and what not, and it is plain that if our form of government and our influx of immigration shall continue a few centuries longer, we will eventually have an aggregated tongue, which will be omnivorous, swallowing up all other languages. The people will then speak French, German, Spanish, Scandinavian, English, and everything else, and yet speak only the vernacular. In this manner the world will, in time, if it live a reasonable period, get back to one universal tongue. But, under all circumstances, patois and provincialisms in language will flourish. They do now, always did, and he who can account for dialects and patois, aside, from that portion of them which is onomatopœic, must have either more philosophy or more time than I have.

In these United States a Southern hoy may be educated at Yale and be an honor to his class, and yet he will go back to his home, after school days are past, and live out the remainder of his life pronouncing where "whar" and there "thar." Moreover, all that he has learned will not deter him from coolly asking you to "shet de do" when he only wants you to shut the door.

In the section of country about Cumberland Gap—comprising a part of Eastern Kentucky, West Virginia, East Tennessee, and Northwestern Georgia—one will find that a majority of the natives say "we uns" for we, "you uns" for you, and "they uns" for they. Some wag of a rhymster has epitomized this peculiarity of speech in a stanza which he puts in the mouths of the damsels who thus bewail their sweethearts gone to the war:

It's hard for you uns to lay in camps,
It's hard for you uns to fight the Yanks,
It's hard for we uns and you uns to part,
For you uns has got we uns's heart.

In almost any other part of Kentucky, and over a line not wider than a hair, which might be geographically drawn, we find the people almost unanimously saying "they all" for they, "we all" for we, and "you all" for you. Not further away than across the Ohio River on the north, the people will say "side 'ill" while the Kentuckian says "hill side;" and while the Ohioan speaks of something being "down to the house," the Kentuckian says it is "down at the house." In Northern Alabama it is common for the people to speak of anything that pleases their fancy as being "right"—as, for instance, "that is a right horse you are riding," or "that hat of yours is a right un."

The typical "down-easter" talks with a nasal twang, and pronounces cow, "keow" and "guesses" at things, while out West the intonation is from the lungs, the pronunciation is full-mouthed and broad, and the people "reckon" instead of "guessing."

The differences in border dialect east and west of the Rocky Mountains are distinctly marked, and California is particularly full of provincialisms that would to this day be astonishing to the people of "the States." The new-comer to California loses two and a half cents many times before he learns that a "bit" may be either ten cents or fifteen, and to many sections of the East a "bit" of any kind is an unknown quantity. Quien sabe, though Spanish, is, by adoption, thoroughly Californian, and the Chinaman's "sabbie" is ours by right of acquisition, possession, and use; and from the same sources we have many words that the unlettered among us think they were horn with, and certainly many of these terms were here, in common use, before the rising generation had blessed us with its presence.

Our mines have been a prolific source of new words and slang, much of which has been diffused throughout the country, but much more of which is yet peculiar to the Pacific Slope. The San Francisco hoodlum dialect would be an amazing disturber among languages anywhere outside of this city, and right here this subject runs into a hole under a wharf.

ARTICLES DE PARIS.

A soldier asks a three-days' furlough to go and see his old mother, who is on her death-bed.

"Take it," says the captain, a rigid disciplinarian, "but if you're deceiving me and the old girl doesn't kick in the three days I'll jam you into the guard-house for fifteen days."

We were demanding of a gummy who passes his life at the cards:

"Of what is then dead that poor Titine?"

The gummy, of an air distract:

"Of one malady of the club."

"What? Of one malady of the club?"

"I would say of the heart!"

"Josephine, you have altogether too many cousins for a family that is fond of cold meat—you must look out for another place."

"Oh, madame, please —"

"It's no use—I give you warning."

"All right, ma'am—I take your warning, ma'am—and heaven knows, ma'am, it's glad I'll be to get out of this house, ma'am. There's not a living soul in it I'll regret, ma'am, except Ponto."

"Except Ponto?"

"Yes, ma'am, except Ponto. The steps that dog saves a lady that has dishes to wash —"

At a "proprietary club":

"Say, old fellow, come and let's make up a little party at draw."

"Who's going to play?"

"Oh, we'll scare up a set—Rotibal'll take a hand."

"Then you may count me out."

"What! Do you think he cheats?"

"Think he cheats! I know he cheats. I know all about him. Don't you recollect I proposed him for admission?"

A blind man was begging for alms at the church of St. Roch, whining piteously:

"Have pity upon a pore blind man with two small children dependent upon him!"

A week later a gentleman who had given him something happened to disembark from a train at a suburban station, and there the first person that he met was the same beggar, whining piteously:

"Have pity upon a pore blind man with five small children dependent upon him!"

"Ha, my friend!" he says, "your wife has presented you with triplets, has she?"

"No, sir, no; but, you see, whereas in Paris, where everything is so expensive, two children are amply sufficient to move people's hearts, out in the country it takes at least five to knock the grangers. That's why. Have pity upon a pore blind man."

Talma, when he was to play the part of the tribune "Proculus" in Brutus, appeared on the stage in a costume faithfully prepared from classic models. The role only contained some fifteen lines, but the actor, whose experiment—so long antedating that of Fechter in oriental garb—was at first received with silent surprise, was successful, and he was loudly applauded. One of his fellows, when he was at the wings, asked him if he had put wet cloths on his shoulders, and the charming Louise Coutat cried in horror: "Oh, do look at Talma—what a guy he is! Why, he looks just like one of those old statues!" And when he went on, Madame Vestris, while "Brutus" was addressing her, had a brief dialogue with "Proculus," as follows:

"Why, your arms are bare, Talma!"

"So the Romans had theirs."

"Cochon!"

"Behold," cries M. Zola, commenting upon this anecdote, "behold the cry of reactionaries in art. Pig! pig! We are all pigs—all of us that desire truth."

In the good old days when the Belgian publishers were pirating French books, and even selling them in Paris, Balzac suffered very severely from the competition, which was all the more aggravating because he could not lay hands on the publisher or his agents.

One day, however, as he was going through the Palais Royal he espied, impudently displayed in the window of a dealer, one of the books in question. The blood in his veins boiled, and, lifting his cane, the author of the Comédie Humaine smashed the pane of glass into a thousand pieces.

Out rushes the shopkeeper, white with rage.

"Sir, I saw you smash my window."

"I do not say that I didn't."

"You know what the proverb says: 'Men who break windows have —'"

"To pay for them.' I have heard the proverb in question, and generally it is correct."

"Do you mean to say, sir, that this is to be an exception to the general rule?"

"It may be."

"You are jesting, sir."

"Do I look as if I was?"

"Are you going to pay for that window?"

"Not if I can help myself."

"I'll send for the Commissaire."

"Send for the Commissaire, then!"

The magistrate arrives, and, having heard the evidence, bids the stranger pay fifteen francs to the bookseller. The stranger does so, and adds, politely:

"M. le Commissaire, through this pane, which I broke in order to obtain the pleasure of your acquaintance, you observe a novel by Honoré de Balzac, which Werdet alone is authorized to publish. You will perceive that the publisher's name is Meline, of Brussels, an eminent pirate of French books. This gentleman, whose window I took the liberty of smashing, is dealing in illicit goods, a matter for which he will have to answer before the courts. In order to secure his conviction it was necessary for me to have the evidence of his guilt impounded in a manner that there could be no doubt about, so I lured him into sending for you."

YOUNG CHRISTIANS.

Male and Female Created He Them.

If we have done the Young Men's Christian Association any harm by laughing at it—as Dr. Cox thinks we have—we are sincerely anxious to repair the injury. The Doctor tells us that he and his associates are doing a great deal of good—and perhaps they are; that they could do a great deal more good if they had the money—and we have no doubt they could; only the Young Men's Christian Association's way of doing good is not our way, and we like our way best. We do not believe in the efficacy of prayer, except as a means of saving grace; we do not believe in relying upon Divine Providence; we do not think street-preaching, and tract-distributing, and prayer-meetings three times a day, and all day on Sunday, either profitable or cheerful. We observe that those people who preach most at sinners seldom give them a helping hand; and those who pray that God will temper the wind to the shorn lambs of temptation and poverty do the least real practical good in the world. We think the best answer to prayer comes from the petitioner's own exertion; we think God likes the people who lean the least on him and the most on themselves. We have very little confidence in those who profess much and do little. We judge the tree by its fruits, and not by its blossoms of promise. We have watched this Young Men's Christian Association for these long years, and it is our opinion that when it comes up to the celestial gate St. Peter will ask its members some questions very hard to answer, and if they all get in we shall bid St. Peter good morning, and cheerfully pass over to the establishment on the other side of the gulf.

And yet, it would be a very ungracious thing for us to speak lightly of an institution composed of seven hundred zealous, earnest Christian gentlemen, who are devoting themselves with zeal to labor for their unfortunate fellow-men. If there is a body so numerous, composed of our best citizens, working with unselfish devotion, not letting the left hand know the right hand's charitable doings, relieving the sick, aiding the poor, lifting up the disheartened, encouraging the worn and weary ones along life's journey, then it is a shameful thing that we should do anything to lessen its power of usefulness, or write a line that would binder other generous hearts from aiding in the good work. The thing we most condemn in this world is sham, and of the shams that are most contemptible, are those which hide themselves under the cloak of religion.

But there is an institution that commends itself to our regard. It is the "Young Women's Christian Association." We wish it had another and a better name—a name that would admit a broader membership. However, as the name is unimportant, and none of our business, we will not stop to cavil at it. We believe in women, and think they are good and charitable. They are natural, sympathetic humanitarians; they are honest, earnest, pious; they are sincere, zealous, enthusiastic, and good. When they form charitable institutions they do it from a simple, generous, kindly impulse. We never knew of a work of charity entrusted to women that was not honestly performed; we have known of very few administered by men that were entirely honest. Some hypocritical and sanctimonious old butter-fingers is almost sure to wring himself in as treasurer, or secretary, or colporteur, or tract-distributor, or something else, and bum on the institution. The Young Woman's Christian Association is an admirable, practical, working charity, entitled to the good wishes and spare change of everybody who has money to spend in charity. It ought to be, and is fast becoming, the almoner of the bounties of those who have not the time or the inclination to attend to this part of life's duty. To give indiscriminate alms is oftentimes money misappropriated. The ladies of this institution know where each dollar of their money goes, and the community may be satisfied that it goes in the right direction.

Desiring to repair our error if we had stayed any charitable act by our comments on the Sutter Street institution, where Dublin Pete gave his set-to, we sought an interview with one of the young women Christians interested in this work, and obtained the following points in regard to the nature of the work in which they are engaged:

"We have about seventy-five members. Our dues are $1 for annual members, and $3 for life membership. Our desire is to increase our monthly subscribers; already we have some paying 50 cents, $1, and $2 a month. The work is systemized, so that each day our rooms are filled with workers, except Monday and Saturday. On Tuesday the most important of our committees meet. The Chairman of the Industrial Committee is Mrs. C. J. Follansbee. The treasurer is Miss Lizzie Atkinson. Six ladies meet with them at 10 A. M., and remain all day, cutting out garments of cotton and flannel, which are given to women in need of work. At present we supply about forty-five, and have more demands than can be supplied. They take the work home, make, and return it on the following Tuesday, when they receive the pay for it, and the garment if they need it; otherwise it is put aside for others more needy. It is the desire of the committee to be self-supporting, and it can be made so if ladies will give orders for fine work and sewing, and the money received therefrom will buy material and provide pay for the coarser work not ordered. The Chairman of the District Nursing and Diet Kitchen is Mrs. James Burling. The district nurse visits the poor who apply, and reports to the ladies on Friday at the meeting, so that if further care is needed than providing nourishment of beef-tea, soup, oatmeal and corn-meal gruels, rice, and such light diet, it is attended to. If some flour mill would give us our oatmeal, cornmeal, etc., it would assist much. The nurse gives out the beef-tea, etc., each morning, and spends the afternoon in visiting and relieving the sick patients under her care.

"The Fruit and Flower Mission is under the care of twenty-three young ladies, Miss Mary D. Bates, chairman; Miss Mary Eldridge, treasurer; and Miss Carrie Story, secretary. These young ladies meet each Thursday morning, and arrange the flowers in bouquets fit to lay on the sick pillows, and then assort the fruit, and put it in baskets labeled with leather tags, ready for the City and County Hospital, St. Luke's Hospital, German Hospital, Clay Street Hospital, Old Ladies' Home, etc., beside the private cases. After noon, the distributing committees come in and take them out to their destinations. Many donations of jellies and dried fruits, prunes, gelatine for wine jelly, and nice jams are made and needed for long illness.

"The Public Schools have been so divided that four schools give fruits and flowers each Thursday, each child giving of what they have. Sometimes a bit of cake, an egg or two, a few figs, a banana in a paper-bag. (One little one once sent a white pigeon, which we had cooked and divided between two poor old ladies ill of consumption.) Their one and only need is a wagon to be at their disposal on Thursday, as they have difficult contributed to supply all demands upon them, but the fruit is too heavy for the young ladies to carry. They are now under examination, sending large parcels to the far-off hospitals and Alms House. The Children's Aid Committee, Miss Annie Beem chairman, meets Wednesday A. M. in a room arranged especially for them. They have children's clothes, and the twenty-one young lady members make these garments and distribute them among the poor children under our attention. Second-hand clothing is much used in fitting up destitute families. On Friday the chairman of each committee meets the members of the society in a general meeting at 10:30 A. M., open to all, and presided over by our most indefatigable president, Mrs. P. D. Browne. We hear reports from all these various committees, and from our Sewing School No. 1, cared for by Mrs. Argeltner, No. 531 Pacific Street. They meet Thursday and Saturday afternoons—learn to sew, thereby improving themselves and being kept off the streets after school hours. The usual attendance is one hundred and forty. These same children meet on Sunday for Sunday-school. The Kindergarten No. 1, at 51 First Street, is taught by Miss Phillips and a corps of volunteer teachers. These young ladies each have one day that they devote to assisting the teacher (free of all salary). Mrs. Stetson sings and instructs them daily in exercises calculated to amuse them. These children are all under six, and we feel we are striking the root of hoodlums through our efforts with these poor children. In all we have about one hundred and eighty-five under our care. Our work has increased far beyond the printed account of last year. It seems to have received a new impetus, and all we need is the steady help of our gentleman friends, whom you have so kindly promised to try and interest in our behalf."

This institution ought to be sustained. When the Sutter Street building is sold by the Sheriff, it should be purchased for these ladies and become the home and centre and workshop of their most excellent and generous endeavors. Everybody should become a contributor to it, in proportion to his means. Some can pay one dollar and some ten thousand dollars a year. Its members are from the best among the ladies of our city, and there is every guarantee that money contributed to it will be honestly and properly expended.

A Fatal Defect.

Such is the heading of an article in a morning paper in relation to Assembly Bill No. 270—the Tyler water bill. The only "fatal defect" we see in the reasoning of the article published under that heading, and in the construction put by the writer upon the Constitution. We are fully aware that the editors of the paper referred to "unbesitatingly advocated the adoption of the article of the Constitution in relation to the fixing of water rates," as it did every other part of that instrument, good or bad; but we did not think that it was foolish enough at the time to suppose that the framers of the Constitution had put either the people, or the owners of water works and their property, into the hands and at the mercy of a Board of Supervisors or Common Council, with power to act arbitrarily in the interest of either the one or the other, without being subject to any restrictions, restraints, or guidance of law whatever. To confer such a power without any restriction, as it is claimed by our contemporary was done, would be preposterous, and would be even more likely to be "fatal" to the interests of the people than to those of the owners of water works. Do our people want to see absolute power conferred upon the Board of Supervisors of this city to fix water rates as they please, without being subject to any restraint, or governed by any principles prescribed by law? It would seem that the experience of the past should warn them never to seek to have such a power placed in the hands of the Board. While it might be possible that in the hands of some Boards they would be safe, very recent events show that they would be just as likely to be by that means placed entirely at the mercy of the water company.

But the people need not fear that they have been left in that dilemma. The framers of our Constitution have given to our Board of Supervisors no such arbitrary power, either over the rights of the people on the one hand, or of property on the other.

It is true that Section 1 of Article XIV of the Constitution provides that the "rates of compensation to be collected for the use of water shall be fixed annually by the Board of Supervisors," but that is only a proviso annexed to a section which starts out by saying that such use shall be "subject to the regulation and control of the State, in the manner prescribed by law;" and the proviso does not prescribe the manner, but simply says that in each city the Board shall fix the compensation to be collected by the company doing business in that particular city. That is not a grant of power, but a mere designation of local officers to exercise the power of the State in the mere matter of fixing rates in their particular locality; and by the very provisions of the section, that power must be exercised "in the manner to be prescribed by law." The Constitution does not pretend, in and of itself, to prescribe the manner, but expressly says that it is to be prescribed by law. Language can not be plainer, and we need not go beyond this section to see that the Constitution is not self-operative. But we are not limited to this, for if we look into the very next section of the same article, we find that the right to collect rates or compensation "is a franchise, and can not be exercised except by authority, and in the manner prescribed by law." There is nothing anywhere that gives to the Board of Supervisors authority to grant a franchise to collect rates, or to pass any law on the subject. All that they can do is to pass an ordinance fixing the rates, or in other words making the apportionment. This can only be done "in the manner to be prescribed by law," and when done, the right to collect such rates can only be "exercised by authority of and in the manner prescribed by law." The reason, and the only reason, for delegating to the Board of Supervisors any authority whatever in exercising this power of the State was, that the mere matter of rates or apportionment could only be made just by being made local, for in no two cities would the elements necessary to be taken into consideration in the making of just and equitable rates be the same.

So we find that by the terms of the article of the Constitution on "water and water rights," the manner of fixing water rates is to be "prescribed by law." The instrument by which it is to be done is to be an ordinance or resolution; but the ordinance or resolution fixes the rates only, it does not prescribe the manner or establish the principles upon which they are to be fixed, or authorize their collection when fixed. All this must be done "by law." No law exercising the power of regulation and control belonging to the State can be passed by the Board of Supervisors, for the sole power of the State to pass laws is vested by the Constitution in the Legislature. As we read the Constitution, even an attempt on the part of the Supervisors to fix rates, without an act of the Legislature prescribing the manner of doing it, would be utterly void.

Life is a beautiful night, in which, as some stars go down others rise.

TALLY FOR KALLOCH.

We should have made somewhat extended extracts from Mayor Kalloch's speech at Union Hall against the purchase of Lake Merced, but since the scheme is dead we deem it unnecessary to insult the corpse. We should quote from the bill filed by Mr. Swift in the Supreme Court, upon which the restraining order was granted, but we deem this also unnecessary, as we presume that on the 16th the order will be made perpetual without discussion. We say to the seven Supervisors who gave us this scare, that we do not thank them for reconsidering what they and each of them knew they had no right to do, and which they were compelled to undo. To the individuals of the minority of the Board we are grateful that they stood by the party that elected them, the principles that they professed, and the promises they made. We sympathize with the Mayor in respect of his declaration of a fearless disregard of that public opinion which arises from a mean and narrow suspicion of a man's motives for any public action. We know of no community where there exists a more contemptible, narrow, and jealous suspicion than in San Francisco. The public man or journalist that undertakes to reason from principle, from an independent standpoint, who presumes to think for himself, is at once arraigned by inferior minds as having been controlled by mercenary or other base motives. Mayor Kalloch of himself says:

"Another pressure is made in the charge that Spring Valley is opposed to this scheme: ergo, any man who opposes it is bought and owned by Spring Valley. At first it was said to be a Spring Valley move, and the first public declaration I made against it was made under this impression. It turns out that Spring Valley is against it. Am I to change my position on that account? I have nothing to do with that. If the devil is on my side I shall stay there, if I am on the right side. He may not help me much, but I can't help that. My business is to know whether I am sound in my position or not, and not to run around to find out who is with me or who is against me. There are plenty of men who make up their minds in that way. I am not one of their number. I am not alarmed by this Spring Valley bugaboo, nor any other. The people of this city have become so utterly demoralized that they attribute a mercenary motive to every man's action when it does not suit them. When I vetoed a railroad bill they said: 'He has got his pay.' When I went to the Palace Hotel for two weeks, so as to accommodate the city—to be where the Board of Health and other boards might come to me, as I was unable to go to them—they said: 'He has sold out to Sharon.' I wish such vile slanders could know in what detestation I hold them. I propose to treat Spring Valley and every other corporation as they deserve, to respect their rights, and to compel them to respect the rights of the people. I am half persuaded that there is no good, either to Spring Valley or the public, in the protracted, vexatious, and fruitless war which is kept up between them. I think it would be greatly to the advantage of all parties if the controversy could be settled on an amicable and mutually satisfactory basis. I have not had time to study recent proposed acts of legislation. I do not know whether there is 'a nigger in the wood-pile' or not; but it does seem to me in a general way that some plan might be proposed to find out what Spring Valley is worth—not what it thinks it is worth—to agree upon a reasonable rate of interest which it shall receive on the actual value of its works, and to raise by a general tax, as is done everywhere else, enough revenue to reduce the cost to poor consumers to an amount which they are able and willing to pay. I do not say these are my views. I know they are not the views of some for whose judgment I have great respect. I have no time now to attempt to elaborate them. I simply throw them out as extemporaneous suggestions not unworthy the consideration of unprejudiced and fair-minded men. But if the saying of this much subjects me to the charge of being, in any offensive sense, in the interest of Spring Valley, all I can say is, that I am too accustomed to being falsely charged to be greatly disturbed by it."

Mr. C. B. Plumber, elocutionist, wit, and uncommonly good fellow, has begun a tour of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and the central Western regions generally, in which he will give the people of those sections a taste of his quality in both humorous and serious elocution. Mr. Plumber's abilities are unquestionable, and he unites therewith a thoroughly gentlemanly style, which is no slight addition. The Argonaut asks its friends to go and hear Mr. Plumber, and stakes its critical reputation on the certainty of their satisfaction.

Advice to our Sacramento Solons: "The very substance of the ambitious is merely the shadow of a dream."—Shakspeare.

Obscure Intimations.

[Contributors must give us their names and addresses—not necessarily for publication. Manuscripts unaccompanied with stamps for their return will be destroyed if not used.]

B., SACRAMENTO.—Thanks; it is more important for the Legislature to know what we are doing than for us to know what it is doing.

ORDINARY SEAMAN.—We have an unconquerable antipathy to acrostics. They are fit for the puzzle column of the Evening Post only.

KAWAIIHA.—We are sincerely obliged for your good will and good wishes. You think almost as well of us as we do of ourselves, but not quite.

A SUBSCRIBER.—"Over the Hill from the Poor House" will be published, if it is Mr. Will Carleton's, as soon as we shall have learned to admire that gentleman's work. Would you be so good as to wait until then?

"MANAGER FOR A MONTH."—Letter referred to the Chancellor of our Exchequer.

TO FORTUNE.—You must remain for the present a youth "to Fortune" and to fame unknown, so far as we are concerned.

THE TAY.—In the course of the week we should naturally have thought to make that joke ourselves; now we can't use it without seeming to have stolen it from you. You see how you hurt the newspaper business by your officiousness in sending in a good thing early—and unauthenticated with your name and address.

J. K.—Answering social questions by mail is not an editorial function in this office. Whether it is offensive to call an old woman "an old lady" to her face depends much upon the disposition of the person so addressed. Try it upon Mr. Pickering and note the result.

GIOVANNI.—You make us blush.

S. S. H., SACRAMENTO.—Another on the same subject already in type when yours arrived. Thanks.

CXV.—Sunday, February 8.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Beef Noodle Soup.
Fried Clams.
Broiled Squabs. Saratoga Potatoes.
Green Peas. Baked Tomato.
Roast Pork, Apple Sauce.
Celery Salad. Orange Meringue.

TO MAKE ORANGE MERINGUE.—Five or six oranges, three eggs, one cup sugar, one pint milk, one tablespoonful corn starch. Pare the oranges and slice them into a pud'-ing dish, taking care to remove all the seeds; sprinkle the cup of sugar over them, and let them stand while you prepare the following custard: Heat the milk to boiling point, thicken with the corn starch—wet with a little cold milk; let it boil a few minutes, then add the beaten yolks of the eggs. Let the custard cool, and pour it over the oranges. Cover this with a meringue made of the beaten whites mixed with two or three tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar. Put in the oven to brown. To be eaten cold. Strawberries may be made in the same manner.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"Growler Vivisection."

SAN FRANCISCO, February 2, 1880.

THOU DEAR ARGONAUT:—"I now take my pen in hand to inform you that I am well, and hope you are enjoying the same God's-blessing," and to give that horrid "Growler" a stab. Oh, could I but write with a sword, that I might cut him up as a growler deserves! Who ever heard of a woman whom nothing could satisfy—whose everlasting warble was one continual growl?

He says he is "hostile," and wears "war-paint." He growls at the dryness of "Ganymede's Cup." I think, dear Argonaut, that the remarks of this gentleman (what satire, to call a "Growler" a gentleman!) seem to indicate that he had been on a had spree, got a black eye, and awoke in time to miss the 4:30 P. M. train for Sacramento, which certainly landed me in that mud-puddle on the fourth day of last month. Unquestionably, he prefers the cup of Bacchus to that of "Ganymede." Now, fancy the absurdity of a man too muddled to find the 4:30 P. M. train, and with a black eye, congratulating himself upon a "clear-coast." And fancy a woman, even in "leap-year," making love to such a one! Ugh! Don't I thank my stars that I am not a marrying woman, with "Growler" for the "last man!"

Again, what refinement of taste! He wants fifty-two letters from "The Old Pard" this year. Spare us, dear Argonaut, for your Judith's sake! Next comes that chambermaid story—eavesdropping at the door of our ex-President. It's just like a man with a black eye to go about questioning chambermaids. He isn't at all reliable. Don't trust him, Argonaut. Truth to tell, I am a little tired of having so much Grant-ed to us, yet, in pure perversity, I beg that you will just leave room for my "stab" at "Growler," in your next, and consume the rest of your space with G R A N T in your very largest type, and send the whole edition to that "Growler."

Then comes his talk of the disinterested nobility of his sex in affairs matrimonial. I could name one of the very highest of State officials, who found it profitable to make love to a woman who works for her living; who accepted many and valuable gifts from her, who put a ring upon her finger, and promised to love her all her life, etc.; and ended by striking her in the face, because she warned him that a bad woman was telling his secrets, and so endangering his good name. And I can name others, all through the social scale, in all degrees, nobly and disinterestedly loyal in affairs of matrimony! Did you but know it, "Growler," there are a thousand women loyal and unselfish to one man troubled with that complaint. Love is all—for a woman! He attacks "Ada Ven" with a venom worthy of a better cause. How is that lady to vent witticisms in a truthful disquisition upon a perambulating fashion-plate? If Ada told the humorous things that happen in our "genteel society" she would be brought forward for "libel" oftener than the proprietors of the Chronicle. "Growler" complains that "Miss Melville has big feet," and is "ungraceful." Tell us, is it graceful for two to sit in one chair? and, so sitting, are her feet small enough to hide? Don't throw stones. And where's the harm, if Wilhelm] chooses to place a superfluous letter on the narrative of his name? Is not our language full of such superfluities? Is "Growler" the fellow who complains because Mr. Wilhelm] "thinks he looks like Beethoven"? Why, let him so think; it is proof that he is not vain, for Beethoven wore lips fearfully large and thick. So does Wilhelm]. Now, "Growler," my wrath is appeased. Take Seltzer. Apply raw oysters, and if you favor us again, do so amably. Yours affectionately—

I am addressing the Argonaut now—I say, yours affectionately, JUDITH.

Horatio Seymour's War Record.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—In your opinion is the following an intentional error, or is it merely a lapsus styli of the Chronicle's Washington correspondent? I have waited long enough for its correction to appear, but it cometh not. And, by the way, who is this correspondent that signs his weekly rehash of nothingness "G. C. G."? No one who will ever be killed for his intelligence, I'll warrant. The following is the blunder he is guilty of:

"If the Southern Democracy gathers itself for a contest, it will dictate the nomination of some man who sustained the Union cause during the war; as Tilden, Hendricks, Bayard, Thurman, and Seymour did not, and as Field, Hancock, and David Davis did."

I thought everybody who pretended to know anything of the history of the Rebellion knew that Horatio Seymour was preeminently New York's "War Governor"; that he rendered the General Government more service in checking the invasion of the Northern States than any other civilian; that he spared neither money, nor work, nor his own personal influence, which has always been very great, to urge on volunteering and to forward troops to the front. President Lincoln and Secretary Stanton knew this, and again and again telegraphed their thanks to Mr. Seymour for his patriotic services. They called on the Governor for assistance, and his answer was twelve thousand men in twenty-four hours. I don't think any one ever honestly questioned Horatio Seymour's patriotism, or that he rendered effectual aid to the country in the time of her severest trial; but there is a host of petty scribblers who allow their partisan feeling to overcome the slight sense of fairness they were originally endowed with, and in this way Mr. Seymour has too often received injustice.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 4, 1880.

A Rebuke.

LOS ANGELES, January 25, 1880.

EDITOR ARGONAUT:—I am a contributor, and my wrongs want to cry to heaven if the Argonaut has any circulation there. The editorial lion has been roaring and lashing its sides a good deal of late. It is very grand, but grows tiresome, and the skin sometimes slips off at the corners. There is a gentleman in the Beaut's Stratagem named Scrub; I mean he would be a gentleman nowadays, formerly he "held a position" as body-servant. One of his sayings—I quote from memory—is like this: "I know they were talking of me, for they laughed comically." The Scrub family has increased and multiplied since then, and they are still conscious that there is something ridiculous about the figure they cut. One of these gentlemen—I would not hurt any one's feelings—resides in Chicago, and was quoted at length last week by one of your gentlemen. He holds up Mr. Delane as a good example of an editor, as who should say: "True, Delane is dead, but never mind, we are still left, we are intellectually capable, we are without reproach in our morals, we are orthodox in our religious convictions, and of such is the kingdom of heaven. Go thou, and do likewise." Who has disputed it? I know your orthodoxy is without fear, and your morality without reproach, but why protest like a prostitute before a police magistrate? Candidly, is there not something too much of this editorial attitudinizing? Please get down off your tripod, Sir Oracle, and nodog of a contributor shall bark when you open your mouth. Give us a rest, or I will call for a hundred thousand contributors, armed with rolls of tough manuscript, to march upon your office.

CONTRIBUTOR.

Insults to Womanhood.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—"Force of habit," 'tis said, is everything; but "force of circumstances," according to my experience, is a great deal more. A few days ago I figured in the columns of one of the morning papers as an applicant for a situation. To-day I am a contributor to the Argonaut, all through the force of circumstances. In my advertisement I enumerated my several qualifications, and mentioned the fact of desiring a position of "respectability." I received a "bushel" of answers. The two following are specimens of almost the entire lot: "I have read your whimsical 'personal,' and would like to see you. I am a professional man of middle age, single, and of ample means. I would like to meet you."

"Having read your 'notice,' I was much pleased with it, and should like to make your acquaintance. I may be able to do something for you, and shall be most happy to try, if you will let me, so that our meeting might be for our mutual benefit. I am about thirty years of age, and have a down-town office. If agreeable, please address."

How my heart throbs with indignation, and the hot blood flashes to my face, when I think of the thousands of women who are subjected to these dastardly insults from these fiends in human form. Is it strange that there are so many disgraced and dishonored women in this our

"Queen City of the Golden State" when the only resource, the columns of the newspapers—the trumpet through which the agonized call of helpless women for aid can be heard by the public—is blockaded by this motley crew, who scan the papers daily in search of a new victim?

In some cold, cheerless back room, in a narrow, squalid street, some poor girl sits and dreams over the contents of these bargaining letters, from professional gentlemen, single, of ample means, until the words burn into her very soul, and flash forth in the glistening eye and hectic cheek. She has visions of warm, sumptuously furnished apartments, fine dresses and costly jewels; and she hears the clink of

"Gold! gold! gold! gold!
Bright and yellow, hard and cold,
Price of many a crime untold—
Gold! gold! gold! gold!"

Of which, remember, she has less than none; until, in desperation, she seizes the pen, while the "jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that honor feels,"

And, with a few strokes, one more honest girl's name goes down on the "roll" of "fallen women."

A Complex, Impersonal, Social Query for the Million.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—How many sweethearts may a man have at one time without incurring the reproach of unconventionality? May a youth fall in love more than three times in one season, and still be unjustly termed insincere? Is it the correct thing for a man's friends to send him congratulatory cards when it is announced that he has fallen in love, whether they approve of the action or not? Is it good form to try and force a sweetheart upon the countenance of friends? Is it bad form to resent such action? Is it possible for one man to love two women at once? If so, is it good business sense to permit the self-indulgence?

Yours, confusedly,

FINETTE.

Unfortunately, the editors of the Argonaut are, for the most part, family men of wrapt, sugar-coated experience, and narrow, domestic-tinged philosophy, who have never tasted the bitter sweet of cruel love, and care not a rap how many sweethearts a man may have, so he trouble not their content of wife and home and hard work. We think, however, that Mr. Shinn, or other of the poets, may be able to answer the questions asked; or Finette might write direct to Ouida—or Mr. Pickering.

"L. M. B.," who is a friend of Mr. Benjamin F. Taylor, but who differs from that word-wealthy poet in being afraid to sign his or her name, writes to inform us that his or her friend has been wronged by Charles Leroy, the alleged author of a poem entitled "An Atlantic Picture," printed in last week's Argonaut. The facts of this hard case are as follows: Mr. Leroy, who is a broker, desired to climb into print as a writer of goody-goody verses, having his unlovely eye upon the one ewe lamb of a brother broker. To this end Mr. Leroy attempted to seduce our poetry editor. He found that gentleman in his cups and invulnerable. He next assaulted the political editor, but that gentleman was not in. As a last resort, he tempted one of the Argonaut's excused printers with a lottery ticket. His fell arts at last succeeded, and Mr. Benjamin F. Taylor's head was stricken from the tail of his vivacious verse and the name of Mr. Charles Leroy appended in its place. This is deeply to be regretted, but we trust the one ewe lamb will be plucked as a brand from Mr. Leroy's burning, through the promptness of "L. M. B."

Another kind correspondent sends us the following answer to our last week's query concerning the meaning of this stanza from Swinburne:

There lived a singer in France of old
By the tideless, dolorous, midland sea.
In a land of sand and ruin and gold
There shone one woman, and none but she.
And finding life for her love's sake fail,
Being fain to see her, he bade set sail,
Touched land, and saw her as life grew cold,
And praised God, seeing; and so died he.

"Giaufre Rudel, ch' usò la vela e l' remo
A cercar la sua morte."

Geoffrey Rudel, who used both breeze and oar
In haste to meet his death.—Petrarch, Triumph of Love.

This is Rudel, Prince of Blaye, who fell in love with the Countess of Tripoli, whom he had never seen, and made a voyage to meet her. She was informed of his devotion, and paid him a visit, when he died of joy. He was a Provençal poet. This is the meaning of Swinburne, who had probably just been fussing over Petrarch.

Mrs. Joseph Austin—whose graceful pen has made her more familiar to our readers perhaps over the nom de plume of "Betsy B."—sails in the City of Peking to-day, for rest, recreation, and a renewal of health in Japan. For nearly three years now Mrs. Austin has been with the Argonaut as a regular and valued contributor, her bright and breezy letters on matters general and theatrical having been one of the strong elements of the publication's success and popularity. As a critic, and an entertaining, cheerful, and chatty writer, Mrs. Austin has few superiors. A lady of brilliant attainments, large appreciation, and wonderful good nature, she has endeared herself to a large circle of friends, comprising most of the literary and critical element, who will sadly miss her in both a social and professional point of view. We commend the lady to Japan, the Japanese, and foreign residents, as a person of sterling quality; one who, with the inspiration of their own life-giving atmosphere, will not only drink in a true and thorough appreciation of place and people, but who is competent to its subsequent expression for our mutual instruction and advantage. Mrs. Frank Unger will accompany Mrs. Austin on the trip—a delightful compagnon du voyage. Good fortune, good rest, good-bye, and a speedy and safe return!

"The trout tickles of Santa Rosa are a faint-praised, princess-dressed sort of woman, and the manner of their effort is not too little in the following. When they reach beside the stream a narrow ledge; the foaming current whereupon it rests under, a scene of wild confusion ensues, over which there is too much display of round, white, ample leg for the diffusion of modesty. But they catch the trout in their supple fingers and fling them currently shoreward, as one might think less awkwardly than with great power."

The foregoing is extracted from a recent musical criticism in the Alta.

Billings, Harbourn & Co. have sent us the American Almanac and Treasury of Facts, for 1880, of which Ainsworth R. Spofford, Librarian of Congress, is editor. The book is full of interesting and valuable statistics, and ought to be on the table of every professional man who can afford to pay twenty-five cents for it.

ADA'S LETTER.

MY DEAR HELEN:—Since my last, teas and kettledrums have "followed fast and followed faster," until there has been one or the other nearly every afternoon this week. Mrs. Keeny gave a tea on Wednesday. On Thursday afternoon, Mrs. Floyd a kettledrum, which, on account of its numbers and brilliancy demands more than a passing notice. The many guests were distributed through parlor, billiard, and dining-room, the floors of which were covered with canvas. Ballenberg's music—always an agreeable feature—contributed its quota to the pleasure of the occasion, and none could fail to enjoy themselves. The costumes were very brilliant, but that of Mrs. Floyd completely filled my eye.

Friday afternoon Mrs. Boardman had a kettledrum, and in the evening Mrs. Nuttall a tea. A kettledrum at Mrs. Gwinn's on Saturday closes the festivities of the week; to be renewed on Monday by teas at Mrs. Lake's and Mrs. Low's in the afternoon, and a party in the evening at Mrs. J. L. Coleman's, on Sutter Street. Tuesday afternoon Mrs. Keeny has a tea, and on the same evening the "Mardi-Gras" ball, given by the young gentlemen of Company G, takes place. And then the curtain falls, for the morrow is "Ash Wednesday," and we must look demure, take up our prayer-books, and for a mantle must wrap ourselves in religion.

Thursday evening Mrs. McMullin gave a beautiful german, to which about one hundred and fifty guests were invited. The "favors" will doubtless be fondly cherished, as they are specimens of the handwork of the fair sisters. Miss Anna McMullin and Lieutenant Wilson led the german, in which about thirty couples took part, all of whom—with the exception of the leader and two ladies—were unincumbered for "better or worse." As regards the first mentioned, however, the closest scrutiny failed to detect the blemish imparted by a "settled married look." Many regrets were expressed that Miss Rebecca McMullin, in consequence of a severe cold, was unable to fill her part in the dance. Miss Anna, with her accustomed grace and vivacity, was worthy of the precedence assigned her. Miss Lilo, brilliant in person and costume, ably seconded her sister. Miss Wilkins gave unmistakable evidence of the admiration she elicited, in the numerous "favors" with which she was adorned. A cordon of chaperones, of various ages and attractions, seemed to find their chief pleasure in contemplating the floating figures of their swan-like charges.

This german was enlivened by no sprig of the nobility. "Sir George," of whom I wrote so enthusiastically, has betaken himself to other parts. His title and estates having vanished into thin air, he did not remain to face the disappointed females who had hung breathless upon his lips. I do not perceive that I am any sadder, but I think next time I will certainly be wiser. Your friend,

ADA VEN.

"The Lord helpeth him who helps himself." This apothegm was never more strikingly illustrated than in the following true story: In the early days of San Francisco, the omnibus was the best prophetic apology for the street car, and rumbled in half a dozen stated directions from the Old City Hall. One day the good priest of a very Protestant congregation started with his wife and child to call upon some friends in the Mission. After the omnibus was fairly under way, the good man discovered to his chagrin that he had left his purse, containing all his money, in the pocket of another pair of pantaloons. While he was debating whether to pull the strap, have a scene, and trudge homeward, a woman got out of the omnibus, leaving behind her a bright new quarter. The good priest discovered this quarter when too late to return it to the woman. It was half the requisite fare, and he placed it in his vest pocket with the resignation of true Christianity. A little further on a man pulled the strap and left the "bus." He, too, left behind him a shining quarter, which the good pastor discovered only after the wagon was well under way again. There then remained—other than the priest and his family—but one occupant of the "bus," and in a few moments he too left them, and in the straw where his feet had been the pastor found three shining quarters. The good priest paid his fare like a little man and went on his way rejoicing.

The North American Review for February is another monthly vindication of the wisdom of the new policy which the present editor of that sterling periodical has seen fit to pursue. There is not a dull paper in it, and its scope is all the way from the relation of the Catholic Church to modern society to the gossip of Mr. George Augustus Sala, the anointed sovereign of gossips. In Mr. Mayo W. Hazeltine the Review has a literary critic of notable qualifications, who, in discussing the sacred books of China, Machiavelli and his times, and the home of the Eddas, shines with a splendor hardly inferior to that of Sam Williams pointing out the poetic excellences of Mrs. Sarah M. Clarke. By the way, if as many good books appeared every century as Samuel finds every year this would be a world of astounding literary capacity.

The Bulletin of Tuesday evening contains two items of intelligence as follows:

"Samuel J. Tilden is to be married to Miss Fannie Rauck, of Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, this week."

"Tilden denies the report of his intended marriage. He does not even know the lady mentioned."

This illustrates the enterprise of modern journalism.

Cowper once said: "The rich are too indolent, the poor too weak, to bear the insupportable fatigue of thinking." Happily the poor have now the Call to do their thinking for them, and any one with a short bit may buy the Argonaut—for which Mr. Shinn and other gifted poet folk occasionally do write.

It is remarkable how many things are good for rheumatism. Celery is said to be a cure for it, and ditto lemon. And also several other simple things, including the lemon. And we have just discovered that the bite of a bee is also a sure cure for the complaint—much more so the sting of a bee. When a man dies of by, he never again heard to complain of rheumatic.

PERUVIAN PICTURES.

Sketched with Pen and Ink by a San Francisco Lady.

In front of the Grand Cathedral of Lima is a plaza, handsomely laid out in paved walks, with parterres of tropical trees and flowers, in which are numerous fountains and kiosks. This plaza was adorned and embellished from the proceeds of an English loan, obtained in the days of Peru's best fame as a guano producer. This plaza has been the scene of the most memorable events in the history of Lima. There culminated the four days' reign of terror during the Exposition of 1872, resulting in the assassination of the three Gutierrez brothers, in their attempt to establish a despotism. The alarm of fire is given there, and thither the people rush in time of earthquakes and political revolutions. There also pass the military reviews, grand funeral processions, and church festivals. In the days of the Viceroy of Peru this plaza was often the scene of dazzling splendor. In 1683, when the Duke de Plata came to take possession as Viceroy, the plaza, and many of the principal streets through which he passed, were paved with ingots of silver, which were twelve to fifteen inches thick. The Viceroy rode on a horse whose mane was strung with pearls and whose shoes were of gold. I lived near the plaza, on the principal street which runs by the cathedral; thus I became a spectator of the scenes on all the events which drew the people to the plaza, the cathedral, the palace, and the government buildings.

Early on the morning of August 30th, Santa Rosa's day, the cannon at the Fortress of Santa Catalina gave the signal for the troops to assemble. From the flag-staffs of the numerous foreign ministers and consuls in Lima floated the flags of the countries they represented. All business houses were closed. The church-bells proclaimed the advent of the glorification of Lima's patron saint. The military band announced the approach of the procession. Peru being at war, the roll of the drum and the strains of music electrified the people, who filled the balconies, the windows, the courts, and crowded the streets.

If we could believe the political speeches made on the plaza, we would think the Peruvians were the bravest men in the world, and the Chileans the greatest cowards. General Prado, who rose by his genius and military prowess from a humble station to the Presidency, greatly improved the condition of the army and navy. The officers are equipped in splendid uniforms, and the soldiers furnished with good military suits; a few years ago the men had no uniforms, their clothes were ragged, and many of them had neither boots nor hats. We may imagine the motley scene which such troops would present on parade. They are said to be well drilled; but they are not trained to stand up and throw out the chest like the British soldiers. They look like men with poor stomachs; and somebody has said that any man with this deficiency can never be either a great man or a good soldier. Many of these soldiers are also very small, and it would take two of them to make one of the Highlanders who formed the Viceroy's guard in India at the time of the imperial assemblage. Many of the officers are very young, enthusiastic, and handsome. The cavalry are larger men, and show more experience; clad in coats of mail, they inspire something of the feeling of war. In the artillery, the horses, the men, and the wagons are all large, but the cannon are the smallest possible, and the caissons are carried on donkeys. This sudden dropping down of appearances in the artillery is decidedly comical to one who has seen the great guns at Woolwich and the camel and elephant brigades in India.

From the parade ground it is but a step to the church. All the ladies wear mantillas to church. A hat or a bonnet on a lady's head gives rise to an amusing scene: the women turn to the wearer with the exclamation, sombrero! sombrero! (hat) making gestures for her to take off her hat, whereupon a priest comes up who is equally demonstrative on the subject of the hat, until she either conforms to custom or leaves the church. In order to see what was to be seen I glided smoothly into the current by putting on a manta, and going in among the women.

At the plaza the troops were drawn up all around the square in imposing array. In the cathedral, especially decorated for the occasion, was a grand orchestra composed of master musicians. Before the high altar was the archbishop, the bishops, and numerous officiating priests, with robes of heavy gold cloth, and mitres sparkling with diamonds and other gems. The imposing ceremonies closed with the elevation of the host, followed by the deep tones of the cathedral bells, with the bells of all the other churches in the city, accompanied by the firing of three salvoes by the infantry on the plaza. The golden canopy was then raised over the archbishop, and the image of Santa Rosa brought forth, glittering in its robes of gold.

The Peruvians are very fond of bull-fights. The largest Plaza de Toros in the world is at Lima, and it is generally crowded. The exhibitions are always on Sundays. These conflicts in the arena between man and beast are, of course, in the highest degree shocking and revolting to any one of refined sympathies. I have seen many foreigners in Lima who wanted to go to the bull-fights, having never witnessed such spectacles, who, on going once, could not be induced to go again. Many of the best Peruvian families generally resort to the amusements at the Exposition Garden. The architect of the Exposition Palace was an Italian, and the new world has scarcely a work of art surpassing it in artistic beauty. Surrounded by a garden of luxurious tropical trees, plants, and flowers, it is a pearl set in emeralds. The opening of the Exposition of 1872 was followed by a political revolution, which resulted in the assassination of President Balta and the death of the usurpers. The finances of the country have been in an embarrassed state ever since. Money borrowed of England was used to build the Exposition Palace, to embellish the grounds and the Grand Plaza. This money has never been paid.

The railway over the Andes would open up a great highway through the valley of the Amazon from the Atlantic to the Pacific, thereby rendering accessible to the world one of the most fertile and productive regions on the face of the globe. The mineral, animal, and vegetable kingdoms, as presented in this region, teem with untold riches. Lima then become a great commercial centre of exchange, an emporium of the Pacific trade.

Peru has ever been a synonym of wealth in all modern tongues, and the tales that are told of the gold, silver, and treasures found since the Spanish conquest, in the sixteenth century, seem almost fabulous. Now, the mismanagement of the government has effectually sealed this wealth to her suffering, almost famishing multitudes. Some time ago, a machine for separating silver arrived at Callao, to be sent to the Cerro del Pasco mines, which are among the richest in the world. It cost in the United States $300,000, and is said to be the best machine for the purpose that has ever been invented. This, however, has never reached its destination. It was taken to the railway terminus up in the Andes, and from thence it must be conveyed four days' journey on horses and mules to the mines. The war has taken all the men that can work the mines. Months ago a servant could not be sent on errands or a cook go to market without the risk of being pressed into the service. Ladies were seen going to market with their little satchels, carrying things under their mantas, who had been always before too proud to lend their thoughts to such affairs.

The money of Peru, if it may be called money, is nothing but ragged, soiled bits of paper. The sole, which corresponds to the United States dollar, has depreciated until it is worth only about twenty-five cents. The real, or ten-cent piece, is torn in two to make five-cent pieces. About the beginning of the war an attempt was made to bring silver money into circulation. The first step was to take the nice clean bills out of the treasury, and burn them before the public on the plaza, in a stove of peculiar form, made for the purpose. On the first day of each month, for several successive months, from 100,000 to 150,000 were burnt, and still specie was not brought into circulation. The second step was one often resorted to in Peru—a revolution. The people rose to assassinate the members of the Senate and the House while in session. The 16th of November, a day memorable in the annals of Peru, was selected for the deed, and the greatest statesman in South America fell a victim.

Don Manuel Pardo, ex-President, and President of the Senate, was shot by one of the guards as he entered the Senate Chamber, and expired in a few moments. The prompt action of an Englishman saved the other members from the same fate. Being on horseback he dashed off to a company of troops, who rushed to the spot, disarmed the guards, and quelled the mob. The news spread with electric speed. The aspect of the city changed like a transformation scene. It was 2 P. M. when I first heard the closing of the portalis, the great door opening on the street from the court of the house in which I lived. I went out of my room. All the doors and windows of the houses were closed. The street cars were stopped, also carriages and horsemen. Men walked the streets. Ladies filled the balconies. Patrol guards paraded all the streets. I reached the drug-store, feeling that the very paving-stones beneath my feet might prove treacherous, impressed as I was with thoughts of the martyred hero. I obtained, at last, a view of the plaza. It was surrounded by a cordon of soldiers and troops of cavalry. I stepped into a Peruvian shop where I often made purchases; there were some men on one side, talking in a low tone. The spirit of demons looked out of their faces; I heard the words: "We will have him to-night." Terrified, I started on, when an Englishman whom I met explained to me their meaning. They threatened to mob the house, and take the body of Don Manuel Pardo and burn it on the plaza, as was done with the three Gutierrez brothers when President Balta was assassinated. Such is the maddened fury of these torrid temperaments. Fortunately, the Government was so prompt and efficient in action that not the least disturbance followed, and all honors were paid to the memory of the distinguished statesman.

WELL-SEASONED WIT.

Taken at Random from an Author's Commonplace Book.

The passion of the French for theatrical amusements, and the patience with which they will wait at the doors of theatres for the sake of obtaining a good place for witnessing the performance, are well known. At a crowded French country theatre a woman fell from the gallery into the pit, and was picked up by one of the spectators, who, hearing her groaning, asked her if she was much injured. "Much injured!" exclaimed the woman, "I should think I am. I have lost the best seat in the very middle of the front row."

A son of the Emerald Isle, meeting a countryman whose face was not perfectly remembered, after saluting him most cordially, inquired his name. "Walsh," said the gentleman. "Walsh—Walsh," responded Paddy; "are you from Dublin? I know two old maids there of that name. Was either of them your mother?"

I clasped her tiny hand in mine; I clasped her beauteous form; I vowed to shield her from the wind, and from the world's cold storm. She set her beauteous eyes on me, the tears did wildly flow; and with her little lips she said, "You stupid! let me go."

A little lawyer, appearing as a witness in one of the courts, was asked by a gigantic barrister of what profession he was, and having replied he was an attorney, "You a lawyer?" said Briefless. "Why, I can put you in my pocket!" "Very likely you may," rejoined the other; "and if you do, you will have more law in your pocket than you ever had in your head."

An Irish horse-dealer sold a fine blood-mare, warranting her sound, wind and limb, and without fault. The purchaser, on her being sent home, found, upon examination, that the sight of one of her eyes was quite gone. Upon this he waited on the dealer, and desired that she might be taken back and the purchase-money returned, reminding the seller that he declared the mare to be without fault. "To be sure I did," replied Paddy; "blindness is not the poor creature's fault, but her misfortune."

Cornelius O'Dowd says that when a friend of his once met Sydney Smith at Brighton, where he had gone to reduce himself, by the use of certain baths in vogue in those days, he was struck by the decrease of Sydney's size, and said: "You are certainly thinner than when I saw you last." "Yes," said he, "I have only been ten days here, but they have scraped enough off me already to make a curate."

A gentleman in New Orleans was agreeably surprised the other day to find a plump turkey served up for his dinner, and inquired of his servant how it was obtained. "Why, sir," replied Sambo, "dat turkey has been roosting on our fence tree nights, so dis morning I seize him for de rent of de fence."

Jerrold went to a party at which a Mr. Pepper had assembled all his friends. Jerrold said to his host, on entering the room, "My dear Mr. Pepper, how glad you must be to see all your friends mustered!"

A slave who ran away from his master in Virginia was set to work by General Butler, and made to keep at it, much to his annoyance, which caused him to exclaim: "Golly, Massa Butler, dis nigger nebber had to work so hard afore; guess dis chile will secede once moah."

A Dutchman thus describes an accident: "Vonce a long vile ago, I vent intos mine abble orchard, to climb a bear tree to get some peaches to make vrow a plum-pudding mit; and when I gets on the tobermost branch, I vall from the lowermost limb, mit von leg on both-sides of the fence, and like to stove my outside in."

"Have you seed a fox go by here?" "Wal, yes." "Have you seed a dog go by here?" "Wall, yes; they was a runnin' along like blazes." "How was they?" "Wal, about nip and tuck—dog a little ahead."

Count Tracey complained to Foote that a man had ruined his character. "So much the better," replied the wit; "it was a bad one, and the sooner it was destroyed the more to your advantage."

There must be something very comprehensive in this phrase of "Never mind," for we do not recollect to have ever witnessed a quarrel in the street, at a theatre, or elsewhere, in which it has not been the standard reply to all belligerent inquiries.

"Do you call yourself a gentleman, sir?"
"Never mind, sir."
"Did I offer to say anything to the young woman, sir?"
"Never mind, sir."
"Do you want your head knocked up against that wall, sir?"
"Never mind, sir."

It is observable, too, that there would appear to be some hidden taunt in this universal "Never mind" which rouses more indignation in the bosom of the individual addressed than the most lavish abuse could possibly awaken.

A thick-headed squire being worsted by Sydney Smith in an argument, took his revenge by exclaiming: "If I had a son who was an idiot, by Jove, I'd make him a parson." "Very probably," replied Sydney; "but I see your father was of a different mind."

"Lawks!" exclaimed Mrs. Partington, "what monsters these master builders must be! I am told some on 'em have as many as a hundred hands."

Take your daily bread and be thankful; but don't pray to lay up for you the loaves for years to come, to make you rich. Many a man has died about the time his great baking of bread came out of his oven.

Every donkey thinks itself worthy to stand with the king's horses; every girl thinks she could keep house better than her mother; but thoughts are not facts, for the sprat thought himself a herring, but the fisherman knew better.

THE DWARF-SWORD TIRFING.

A Norse Fairy Tale.

Suaforlami, the second in descent from Odin, was king over Gardariki in Russia. One day he rode a hunting, and sought long after a hart, but could not find one the whole day. When the sun was setting he found himself immersed so deep in the forest that he knew not where he was. There lay a hill on his right hand, and before it he saw two Dwarfs; he drew his sword against them, and cut off their retreat by getting between them and the rock. They proffered him ransom for their lives, and he asked them then their names, and one of them was called Dyren, and the other Dualin. He knew, then, that they were the most ingenious and expert of all the Dwarfs, and he therefore imposed on them that they should forge him a sword, the best that they could form; its hilt should be of gold, and its belt of the same metal. He moreover enjoined that the sword should never miss a blow and should never rust, and should cut through iron and stone as through a garment, and should be always victorious in war and in single combat for him who bore it. There were the conditions on which he gave them their lives.

On the appointed day he returned, and the Dwarfs came forth and delivered him the sword; and when Dualin stood in the door he said: "This sword shall be the bane of a man every time it is drawn; and with it shall be done three of the greatest atrocities. It shall also be thy bane." Then Suaforlami struck at the Dwarf so that the blade of the sword penetrated into the solid rock. Thus Suaforlami became possessed of this sword, and he called it Tirfing, and he bore it in war and in single combat, and he slew with it the Giant Thiasse, and took his daughter Fridur.

Suaforlami was shortly after slain by the Berserker Andgrim, who then became master of the sword. When the twelve sons of Andgrim were to fight with Hialmar and Oddur for Ingaborg, the beautiful daughter of King Inges, Angantyr bore the dangerous Tirfing, but all the brethren were slain in the combat, and were buried with their arms.

Angantyr left an only daughter, Hervor, who, when she grew up, dressed herself in man's attire and took the name of Hervardar, and joined a party of Vikings, or Pirates. Knowing that Tirfing lay buried with her father, she determined to awaken the dead and obtain the charmed blade; and perhaps nothing in northern poetry equals in interest and sublimity the description of her landing alone in the evening on the island of Sams, where her father and uncles lay in their sepulchral mounds, and at night ascending to the tombs that were enveloped in flame,* and by force of entreaty obtaining from the reluctant Angantyr the formidable Tirfing.

Hervor proceeded to the court of King Gudmund, and there one day, as she was playing at tables with the king, one of the servants chanced to take up and draw Tirfing, which shone like a sunbeam. But Tirfing was never to see the light but for the bane of man, and Hervor, by a sudden impulse, sprang from her seat, snatched the sword and struck off the head of the unfortunate man. Hervor, after this, returned to the house of her grandfather, Jarl Biartmar, where she resumed her female attire, and was married to Hanfud, the son of King Gudmund. She bore him two sons, Angantyr and Heidreker; the former of a mild and gentle disposition, the latter violent and fierce. Hanfud would not permit Heidreker to remain at his court; and as he was departing, his mother, with other gifts, presented him Tirfing. His brother accompanied him out of the castle. Before they parted Heidreker drew out his sword to look at and admire it; but scarcely did the rays of light fall on the magic blade when the Berserker rage came on its owner, and he slew his gentle brother.

After this he joined a body of Vikings, and became so distinguished that King Harold, for the aid he lent him, gave him his daughter Helga in marriage. But it was the destiny of Tirfing to commit crime, and Harold fell by the hand of his son-in-law. Heidreker was afterward in Russia, and the son of the king was his foster-son. One day, as they were out hunting, Heidreker and his foster-son happened to be separated from the rest of the party, when a wild boar appeared before them. Heidreker ran at him with his spear, but the beast caught it in his mouth and broke it across. He then alighted and drew Tirfing, and killed the boar; but, on looking around, he could see no one but his foster-son, and Tirfing could only be appeased with warm human blood, and he slew the unfortunate youth. Finally, King Heidreker was murdered in his bed by his Scottish slaves, who carried off Tirfing. But his son Angantyr, who succeeded him, discovered and put them to death and recovered the magic blade. In battle against the Huns he afterward made great slaughter, but among the slain was found his own brother Laudur. And so ends the history of the Dwarf-sword Tirfing.

* The northern nations believed that the tombs of their heroes emitted a kind of lambent flame, which was always visible in the night, and served to guard the ashes of the dead. They called it Angar Eldir, or the Sepulchral Fire. It was supposed more particularly to surround such tombs as contained hidden treasures.—Bartholin, de Contemptu a Dan Morite, p. 275.

The Coming Leg.

Mr. Alden, of the New York Times, treats a delicate subject as follows:

"The leg is undoubtedly one of the most difficult parts of the human body, for a perfect leg is among the rarest works of nature. Of course, this remark is limited to the visible legs of the male sex, since it is obviously impossible to obtain any data concerning that large class of esoteric legs, the very existence of which is conventionally ignored, and can only be hinted at by the conscientious anatomist, when the interests of science demand such a sacrifice of personal feeling. A Baltimore man assures us that the human leg is about to undergo startling and painful changes. The next generation will be knock-kneed, and its children will add to this peculiarity that of bow-leggedness. The leg of the future will thus be shaped like the familiar typographical sign known as a 'brace.' The upper and the lower leg will each have a bold curve outward, and the knees will be in close proximity. A more varied and objectionable style of leg has never been placed before the public, and we can not look forward to it without dismay. The cause which is thus to blight the legs of our innocent descendants is the present fashion of female dress. The Baltimore person asserts that the extremely narrow skirts now in use bring the knees of the women into close proximity, and produce the deformity popularly known as 'knock-knee.' What with the narrow-skirt wearers of this generation is an acquired deformity will be a congenital deformity in the next generation. The vast majority of children born since the introduction of narrow skirts knock their wretched little knees together from the day of their birth, and a comparatively straight-legged child under three years of age is, our Baltimore authority assures us, very rarely seen.

"This is an alarming picture, and it deserves our serious attention. If the Baltimore anatomist's premises are right, his conclusions must be admitted, and we must recognize the fact that the legs of the future are in imminent peril. But is it absolutely certain that his premises are trustworthy? His whole argument rests upon the alleged fact that a class of legs of which the average man neither knows nor can know anything, are so confined by the narrowness of the modern skirt, that their assumed knees are kept in close contact. Now, it is, to say the least, highly improbable that the Baltimore man is an expert in this matter, and that he has been able to collect data which have hitherto been beyond the reach of scientific men. His assertion in regard to the unknown knees of which he speaks so coolly and confidently is directly contradicted by Prof. Harkness, of the Smithsonian Institution, who, in his able paper entitled 'A New Theory of the Narrow Skirt,' maintains, with much plausibility, that the effect of the skirt is to force one knee immediately behind the other, so that the hypothetical legs are placed, so to speak, in column instead of line. Although the Professor expressly admits that his theory is a conjectural one, lacking proper data for its foundation, it is apparently entitled to quite as much credit as that of the Baltimore anatomist, unless the latter has really accumulated data of which he makes no mention."

The Suicide of Thieves.

It is good to know that we Californians do not enjoy a monopoly of the cheap contrition which pays its debts of dishonor in the coin of suicide. Our big defaulters, and other high-handed, high-toned thieves, have set the fashion, and now New York has followed our lead, as is set forth in the following paragraph from the Tribune: "Fast upon the intelligence of the Haigh forgeries and the troubles of the Grocers' Bank followed last week the sadder exposure of Mr. Bogert's dishonesty, and his suicide under shameful circumstances. The latter varied a little the monotony of the story, a little old, of respectability found to be rotten. Indeed, Mr. Bogert seems to have had a standing high enough to have carried him through the emergency if his moral courage had been sufficient for the effort. He was so much liked and trusted that a frank avowal of his difficulties would have brought him sympathy and substantial assistance. 'Mr. Bogert,' said one merchant, 'would have been helped out of his trouble without any one knowing about it, if he had only spoken to us.' The remark was a kindly one, but the unfortunate man knew perfectly well that his were troubles out of which nobody could help him. It was too late. Too many people knew that he was not to be trusted any longer, and that henceforth, if he lived, there was nothing before him but distrust and shame, and comparative penury. Business men, after such a fall, seldom rise again. They hang about the exchanges, they make desperate efforts to reëngage in trade, they are pitied by some, they are helped just a little by others; but the old prosperity seldom, if ever, comes back again. Mr. Bogert had seen too many instances of such mortifying degradation to care to encounter it. He had played a desperate game and been beaten; he knew precisely the value of the good repute which he had lost; it was his capital; it was gone; and moreover it was a capital which, in the nature of things, could not be recovered. He did not choose to figure as a broken-down speculator; he preferred to die; and he is dead."

The Condition of Ireland.

The existing needs of Ireland—Mr. Parnell to the contrary, if he will—could scarcely be more clearly and forcibly stated than by the following paragraph from Lecky's Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland:

"The three great requisites of good government for Ireland are that it should be strong, that it should be just, and that it should be national. It should be strong as opposed to that miserable system which resists every measure of popular demand as long as the country is quiet, and then concedes it without qualification as the prize of disloyalty and crime, and which has made it a settled maxim among Irishmen that the favors of the Government are bestowed upon every class in direct proportion to the dangers that are apprehended from it. It should be just as opposed to that system which at one time leans wholly to Catholics or to tenants, and at another time wholly to Protestants or to landlords, which will suffer an illegal procession in one province that would be rigidly repressed in another, and which subordinates all questions of patronage or principle, and even in some instances the very execution of the laws, to the exigencies of party politics. By such systems the respect for law has been fatally weakened, and their abandonment is the first condition of political health. But, in addition to this, it appears to me to be perfectly evident, from the existing state of public opinion in Ireland, that no Government will ever command the real affection and loyalty of the people which is not in some degree national, administered in a great measure by Irishmen. If the present discontent is ever to be checked, if the ruling power is ever to carry with it the moral weight which is essential to its success, it can only be calling into being a strong local political feeling, directed by men who have the responsibility of property, who are attached to the connection, and who at the same time possess the confidence of the Irish people. As in Hungary, as in Poland, as in Belgium, national institutions alone will obtain the confidence of the nation, and any system of policy which fails to recognize this craving of the national sentiment will fail also to strike a chord of true gratitude. It may palliate, but it cannot cure. It may deal with local symptoms, but it cannot remove the chronic disease. To call into active political life the upper class of Irishmen, and to enlarge the sphere of their political power—to give, in a word, to Ireland the greatest amount of self-government that is compatible with the unity and the security of the Empire—should be the aim of every statesman."

Some one once wrote of the third Napoleon: "He owes his triumph to the audacity of his ignorance. Had he possessed more sense, he would have been less successful. Few recognize the fact that in a majority of instances, when 'fools rush in where angels fear to tread,' they make their rush a success. The wise discount obstacles in advance, and, hesitating to take the risks, lose the venture."

THE OTHER POETS.

A Last Year's Poem.

Dear Seventy-Nine, upon whose breast
A beard lies drifted like a snow,
Erect thy grand old brow, and rest
Thine eyes on us who love thee so.

Thy hand, that from the Summer's Land
Brought largess to us, waxeth cold
And flaccid, as with tears we stand
In marvel, thou hast grown so old.

When from thy cradle gentle Spring
The ermine lifted, through the calms
Came gossips, with swift beat of wing,
And hearts that throbbed and burst with psalms.

But on bare boughs that writhe and creak,
Where sang the birds mid leafy oaks,
Some Raven-wind broods, whets its beak
O'er empty little nests, and croaks.

Old Year, in our warm fingers slip
Thy poor numb palm, drink back the boon
That blessed Evander's hoary lip
And kindled him with restful noon.

Weird sentries stir without the door
Amid trailed leaves, or list and peer
Astride the chimney-top, or roar
Hoarse tidings of the coming Year.

And gusty rains go pattering by
In sudden sallies o'er the roof,
Like couriers, now and then, that fly
With eager speed and stealthy hoof.

Nay, moan not, Lear, "In such a night
To shut me out," for our eyes fill
As Kent's or fond Cordelia's might;
Our hearthstone hath no Goneril.

Vain, vain our plea—his eyes grow dull,
We sob, and search their glare of glass,
And whisper, in the awful lull,
"Vex not his ghost—O, let him pass."

And lo, the ghost of Summer howls
Without, and smites the dripping pane,
While clouds move o'er with bended cows,
And break their burdened hearts in rain.

The herald winds roll distant drums,
The sturdy trees stand mailed in ice,
And One, 'mid belfry clangors, comes
Through the blown arras of the skies.

Young Eighty comes; Get we to bed,
To our old year we choose to cling.
Until we feel the King is dead
Can we avow, "Long live the King"?

The wizard Frost in silence gropes
To exorcise our holy pain,
And at the windows tempts our hopes
With castles of some rarer Spain.

But far on through the awful night
Our fond dreams hasten to and fro,
And shape an urn within the white
And moonlit quarries of the snow.

Cacheville.

Far in the Sacramento valley, down
Amid the tule lands, is found Cacheville;
But did they call it Chills-and-Fever Town
I think 'twere better still.

And for the stream—so sickly and so small—
That flows near by, apt title did they seek
It, for variety's sake, they well might call
By name of Dead-Man's Creek.

No season respite here for plague folk bring—
The very cats and dogs with ague die,
And birds that o'er the town their passage wing
Go trembling through the sky.

Through its malarious streets its people wend,
With fever flushed, or shivering with the chills;
And, as one offers snuff unto a friend,
They offer ague pills.

Or silently they sit, with care cast down,
Beside the fire, who once were glad and brave;
For every hearthstone in this wretched town
Is tomb above a grave.

There is a school-house; but the merry sound
Of play and laughter it can little know,
For close beside it is the burial ground,
And there the children go.

This burial ground is larger than the town;
And strangers smile to read upon the stones
The name significant of Arsenic Brown,
Or that of Quinine Jones.

I think the trade of coffin-maker here,
Or that of undertaker, well must pay—
There is a babe born about once a year;
A man dies every day.

If it should ever chance that you be down,
My friend, close by the place of which I speak,
Then do not visit Chills-and-Fever Town,
And shun the Dead-Man's Creek.

—Richard Edward White.

Ashes of Love.

My cigarette! Can I forget
How Kate and I, in sunny weather,
Sat in the shade the elm tree made,
And rolled the fragrant weed together?

I, at her side, beatified,
To hold and guide her fingers willing;
She, rolling slow the paper's snow,
Putting my heart in with the filling!

My cigarette! I see Kate yet—
The white smoke from her red lips curling,
Her dreaming eyes, her soft replies,
Her gentle sighs, and laughter purling!

Ah, dainty roll whose parting soul
Ebbs out in many a snowy billow,
I, too, would burn if I might earn
Upon her lips so sweet a pillow!

Ah, cigarette! The gay coquette
Has long forgot the flames she lighted,
And you and I unthinking by
Alike are thrown, alike are slighted.

The darkness gathers fast without,
A rain-drop on my window plashes,
My cigarette and heart are out,
And naught is left me but their ashes.

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1880.

Those persons who love the Republican machine better than the Republican party, and General Grant more than the country, will rejoice at the triumph of the plundering political power of Pennsylvania over the people of that State. Don Cameron has led his clan through a hard conflict to a disastrous victory. In a Convention of 246 members the vote stood for Grant, 133; against him, 113; majority for him, 20. And this in a State where the "boom" originated, where the Camerons rule, where the first battle-field was chosen, where the solemn rites of the baptism of first blood were to have been performed. General Grant limps away, wounded from the house of his friends. New York will follow suit, and probably with like results; Conkling runs the machine. The South is likely to follow with its delegates. It now looks as though, if General Grant will make a life-and-death struggle for the nomination, he may succeed in becoming the leader of a divided and unsuccessful party. After the convention comes the election. After death comes the judgment.

The Southern Pacific Railroad has after short interruption, started again on its way to New Orleans. With abundant iron rails, ties, and other material, Mr. Strowbridge is now pushing his work of construction from Casa Grande eastward. Sixteen miles are already built, and unless some unforeseen obstacles should impede the work there will be no further interruption till the Pacific is connected with the Gulf of Mexico by rail. Three years is the time allotted for the completion of this second great trans-continental highway, but Governor Stanford and the Messrs. Crocker all express their confident belief that it will be finished in less than two years. This is the most important work that has ever been undertaken for our City and State. While we do not underrate the Central and Union Pacific roads, but realize the immense benefits that the coast has received from their construction, we regard the Southern Pacific Road as of vastly greater prospective advantage. The extent of this benefit is not comprehended. A road owned by a Californian company over a snowless line, across a level country capable of carrying heavy tonnage, developing the great interior of this part of the continent, connecting the Pacific and Gulf of Mexico, uniting San Francisco, the only Pacific port, with New Orleans, the natural depot and point of commerce of all the Southern States, is a consummation that every one interested in the present or future welfare of California must rejoice at.

If railroading and railroad interests could be lifted out of small local politics into the region of statesmanship—if all the mean and narrow intellects that intrigue their way into municipal and State politics and seek to clamor to some higher position by interfering in railroad matters, by meddling with what does not concern them, or if it does, with that of which they are entirely ignorant—could be retired to private life and kept there, it would be well for the country and its business. It is our judgment that the less legislation concerning transportation the better; that this is one of those matters that can only be regulated by competition. It stands to reason that the ordinary supervisor and the ordinary member of the Legislature can know nothing, or at least but little, upon a subject that is so complex and so intricate in detail. No one, either in Congress or State Legislature, or, so far as we know, in public life, has undertaken to master the whole science of railroad management, except Mr. Adams of Massachusetts; and the outcome of all his study and research is to recommend the gathering of reliable information in order that railroad managers may intelligently manage their own affairs. It is worse than useless for any legislative body to attempt to regulate fares and rates. Primarily, we are convinced that the power does not lie in any legislative body to fix the cost of transporting passengers or freights, and, secondly, if it did its exercise would be impolitic and dangerous. There always is, ought to be, and of necessity must be, discrimination in reference to conveying goods or passengers. One man or one article of merchandise from one point to another should be conveyed at the same cost, but beyond that there must necessarily be discrimination. Character of freight, quality, value, distance, grades, competition, climate, and a thousand other things must enter into the fixing of a railroad tariff—things that the local merchant or business man knows nothing about. To declare that merchandise must be transported from San Francisco to Bakersfield at half the cost that would be charged to convey the same merchandise twice the distance, to Los Angeles, is at war with every principle of business. Bakersfield is unfortunate enough to be inland. Los Angeles has her port upon the great ocean highway. To fix a tariff for conveying goods from New York or San Francisco to the city of Salt Lake in proportion to the cost of transporting the same goods between the two ports, is again absurd, because it undertakes to ignore the fact that steamers and sail vessels may go from port to port, but may not cross the Sierra or Rocky Mountains to bear freight to Mormondom. To say that corn shall be transported from Chicago to the Atlantic under any limitation of price, or in fact under any regulation other than that of general laws, or to declare that any one railroad shall or shall not charge more or less than another railroad, is to ignore the fact that corn may reach the Atlantic seaboard over any one of half a dozen roads, over the lakes and Erie Canal, across country by canal and the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers to New Orleans. The merchant in New York or London desiring goods from India or China may look eastward through the Isthmus of Suez, or westward across the American continent, or around the Cape of Good Hope or the Horn. He may look to steam vessels, or sail, or rail, to bring his tea or silk, and the agent at Bombay or Canton must look either way around the world to see how he may send his merchandise cheapest, quickest, and safest. The Central Pacific and the other roads from San Francisco to New York are but links of the chain along which the passengers or merchandise of India and Asia seek their destination. How, then, can the Congress of the United States, by the passage of the Reagan bill, or by any device, regulate this world-wide traffic? What, then, becomes of Mr. Senator Booth's narrow prejudices or personal quarrels with the Central Pacific Railroad folks of California? What figure, then, does Mr. Freeman of Yolo, or any other bucolic statesman of California, cut in this business of fixing the cost of transporting teas, silk-worms, and bales of silk across our State? What does the wheat or wool grower know or care about trans-continental or international commerce if he can get his produce cheaply to market? What does the San Francisco merchant know or care if he can obtain a tariff of rates less than his neighbors and profitable to himself? We do not mean to speak altogether contemptuously of this fault-finding and grumbling that come from a selfish desire to do a profitable business. It is natural. It is this struggle and competition, working all the world over, from which are evolved the laws that govern trade; but not till the American Congress controls the world and not till the California Legislature controls Congress can there ever be formed a law fixing fares and freights that shall not be injurious both to corporations and to individuals.

Most sincerely do we believe that this matter should be left to be governed by the laws of trade and competition; that there can be no legislation so profitable as no legislation. We have now, in process of building and built, five trans-continental railroads: The Central Pacific and Union Pacific, accomplished; the Southern Pacific, building; the Northern road, from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, building; the Canada road, building; the Atchison, Topeka and Kansas, threatened. The two oceans and the Panama Railroad are fixed institutions: De Lesseps, the French engineer, promises us an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus of Darien, and General Grant another across Nicaragua; while Engineer Eads proposes to give us an Isthmus railroad that shall take up ship and cargo and transport them from one ocean to another. Are we not doing well enough? And had we not better let well enough alone? San Francisco has in thirty years been transformed from drifting sand-dunes, upon the shores of an almost unknown bay, to a respectable commercial emporium. It is the present entrepot of a splendid and growing commerce. It is now in competition with the old routes of travel around the Cape of Good Hope and the Horn, and more recently it is brought into rivalry with the Darien Canal. It is a young giant; it is hopeful, strong, audacious, and ambitious. It will prosper if let alone; it will make speed if it is not manacled by vexatious legislation. It will grow and strengthen and develop if the small politicians will give it room to breathe. There is no other place on the globe so promising as this, if let alone. The nation is starting on a new career; four million dollars of railroad property has taken a new start; furnaces, mills, and manufactories have relighted their fires; industries that languished have been revived. All over the nation new blood and new vigor have been infused into the arteries of trade, while in California itself there have been formed new sources of wealth and new channels of profitable labor. We will not recapitulate the items of our productions, nor endeavor to schedule the sources of our unlimited wealth. All our State needs are patient industry and economy to give it foremost rank among prosperous communities; and all our city needs is a little more enterprise among its people—more work and less politics. All this narrow prejudice against rich men and corporations, now so prominent a feature of our State, is doing injury to us and to all our people. We do not admit that millionaires are indispensable to our comfort, or that great hanks and great corporations are indispensable to the future progress of our State; but we do say they are more necessary to us than we to them. We have no sympathy with that mean and petty provincialism that drives every successful man from this State for no better reason than because he is successful. We have no appreciation of that Spartan virtue that thinks itself virtuous because it is poor and unsuccessful; and at the same time we would not willingly have it believed that we would look with indifference or approval upon the attempt of any man or corporation, however rich or strong, to interfere with the rights of the poorest or humblest man or woman in the community. And while we recognize the obligation we feel toward railroads and railroad builders; while we acknowledge the wonderful benefits we have received from them, and look forward in confidence to their further aid in promoting the progress of our State, we are not unmindful that the power of great corporations may be and often is abused. And while we admit that discriminations must exist, we would denounce favoritism and unjust discrimination, such as that of different rates for the same service between the same points, secret bargains and rebates with favored persons, watering stock, fictitious sales, fraudulent and deceptive official reports, Credit Mobilier transactions, bonding roads for more than the cost of construction; and we would favor the passage of any general laws to insure honorable dealing between railroads and the public. While we deprecate the exercise of the sovereign power to control and regulate railways and railway corporations, we admit that they occupy a similar relation to the State as do all public highways and common carriers. We do not deny that the power exists, and must necessarily exist, as a corollary to the power of eminent domain so continuously invoked by railroad builders in their behalf.

Governor Stanford says that when the Southern Pacific road is completed there is no reason why immigrants can not be brought from Liverpool to San Francisco for fifteen dollars per head, together with their implements of labor and household goods. California, in the culture of grapes, sugar, tobacco, raisins, olives, fruit, flax, hops, in manufactories, in mines, in commerce, in forests, in ship-building, can furnish employment for ten millions of people, and can maintain them in comfort if they will labor. There is a twenty or forty-acre piece of land for every industrious working man that has enterprise to come from the Eastern States or Europe to occupy it, and a support in comfort and independence for every one that is willing to toil.

We are almost constrained to admit that some good may come out of the Nazareth of the sand-lot. We are ashamed to be compelled to confess that six Republican Supervisors have so treacherously betrayed the confidence reposed in them as to attempt, by covert and secret frauds, to steal a million and a half of money from the city treasury. We are sorry to think that we are indebted to a deliverance from this act of criminal vandalism to Kallach, "the demagogue," the "sand-lot accident," the "Baptist preacher," the "Rev. Mayor in God," but we are compelled, in common fairness and common decency, to "acknowledge the corn," and admit that the Workingman's Mayor has done an honest work in opposing a dishonest scheme. We should have greatly preferred to have been permitted to credit our rescue from the Lake Merced job to the Republican party, but it "fell down." We have had occasion to make friendly mention of Dunn, the Auditor, and of the Tax Collector, Tillson, and the Treasurer, Shaber; and we think the City and County Attorney is doing his duty well. It comes hard to admit that Kallach has done his duty, but we do confess it, and at the same time we confess that it is like walking with peas in our boots to acknowledge that any creditable act could be performed by him. His address at Union Hall on Sunday evening was a bold and manly protest against the consummation of a wicked deed. It was made before the restraining order was issued by the court, and with no knowledge that such a step was to be taken, and we are willing to believe that Mayor Kallach has done a right thing from a right motive.

Upon what honest reasoning does any legislator—except one from Santa Clara County—justify taxing the public to support a Normal School? Upon what rule is the argument predicated that would give school-teachers an education at public expense, while all other professions must educate for themselves? If the school-teacher must be instructed out of the public treasury, why not the lawyer, the doctor, the preacher, the editor, the shoemaker, the druggist, the printer, the cook, the laundress, the child's nurse, the milliner? Why not everybody?

AFTERMATH.

It is significant that the most full and minute reports of social entertainments in this city are published in Mr. Pickering's paper, the Morning Call, a low-class daily, mainly supported by the subscriptions of working men and the advertisements of domestic servants. We frankly confess that we can not compete with the Call in this department of journalism, from which we think of retiring altogether in consequence. Nothing, from a Sharon reception to an entertainment of the Milk-and-Morality Literary Club, escapes Mr. Pickering's searching eye; Grant can not come nor Budd Doble go away; Silky and Sappie can not marry, nor Bully and Brutie be divorced; a distinguished "scion of British aristocracy" can not put up at a hotel, nor plain John Jones buy a dog, but the fact is recorded in the supplement to Tuesday's Call, with an accurate sense of perspective, the most trivial event receiving the longest and most laudatory mention. Who can compete with a journalist who describes at dazzling length a birthday party to a child one year old, and publishes the invitation? Thus:

"Pease 'cept my 'spects and I sould he dad to hab you tum and teep my first birth-day wid me, Friday afternoon, January 16th, at my mama's and papa's house, 686 Twentieth Street."

Before such enterprise as this we hide our diminished heads and pale our ineffectual fires. We knuckle down upon our marybones and attune our larynges to hymns of admiration. It beats De Young; it beats MacCrellich; it beats Jackson; it beats most consumedly, tormentingly, and everlastingly beats us!

It is true the Call is not always and entirely clear as to the distinction between a lawn party and a german; it has not an altogether pellucid mind regarding the matters—elsewhere in this paper differentiated—wherein a tea is unlike a kettledrum; the line of demarcation that separates a conversazione from a musicale, or a New Year's Day call from a visit of condolence from the butcher, is not in every case preserved with sufficient severity to satisfy an exacting taste. But the Call—everything considered—gets on pretty well, and as it undoubtedly does in some mysterious way obtain elaborate information concerning social events in our best houses, where never a reporter of its own intrudes, and as these reports are more audaciously complimentary to the host and hostess than we could venture on without the fear of offending their modest sensibilities, we mean to draw out, as aforesaid, confining our humbler genius to the eligible runaway horse and the achievable dog-fight. This lower walk of journalism receives an accession of talent from this day, and Mr. Pickering will henceforth occupy in undisputed sovereignty the nobler field which he has made his own by conquest. For society news, the Morning Call; for incidents of the street, the Argonaut. This is a strong team.

If, when our paper issues, John M. Morton shall have been confirmed as Collector of Internal Revenue for California, we shall rejoice thereat. If he has not been, we say he ought to be. The opposition of the California delegation to his appointment was unmanly, narrow, and unbecoming. It was altogether unworthy of Senator Booth, and is to us the more surprising because the Senator was an admirer of Governor Morton, and we are sure has too much sense and too good a memory to admire Higby, the present incumbent. We sometimes wonder if Booth is not "forgiving his enemies," "turning his other cheek," and acting a role of Christian meekness altogether unbecoming a respectable politician.

Our fair correspondent, Ganymede, has recently been pitching into our society people for printing their menus in French, without having taken the trouble to learn the language and teach it to their guests. A better custom obtains in art circles in New York, it appears. At a recent dinner given by the famous Tile Club, whose adventures by land and sea have been made known to the world by Mr. Laffan's articles in Scribner's Monthly, the bill of fare was as follows:

Things
To be eaten and drunk
T. C. Private nourishment.
Oysters.
Some sort of wine.
Soup of some kind.
Another kind of wine.
A large fish with a Tilley sauce.
Certain small fishes with a kind of a spicy sauce.
More wine.
Mysterious small interpolations.
Select part of an ox with choice fungi.
Part of a sheep with small cabbages.
Cold arrangement with smokables.
Kind of a duck from Baltimore with things.
And another sort of wine.
Nice vegetables.
Cold matters and small things.
Other things.

This dinner was given to the publishers of the Atlantic Monthly, and was attended by many notables in literature, art, and journalism. Moreover, it was a good dinner.

Judging from the flickering naphtha lamps at certain street corners, by rostrums whence loud-voiced and vociferative men harangue the straggling populace, and convince them, if not against their will at all events beyond their knowledge, of things not to be met with in recognized surgical works, and only known to the favored heings who do the talking, there must not only be corn in Egypt, in the singular number, but the same commodity abundantly in San Francisco in the plural. Nature has put her foot down on this matter, and registers her objection to tight boots and high heels by hard and painful remonstrances. The street men exhibit impossible warts preserved in alcohol, and enclosed in the cylinder of a short magnifying glass, to the astonished gaze of idle boys and ragged loafers. And yet the old maxim of "Physician, heal thyself," applies as readily as it did on its first delivery. Most of the "physicians" are callous where they should not be; while one Loewenhorst writes with his toes, and extracts the corns of the other corn-doctors.

So the seals and sea-lions at that Locus Sigilli, the Cliff, are to be exterminated in the interest of cheap fish, and the Chinese fishermen protected in the interest of the Brotherhood of Man. Do our legislators know that the once succulent and abundant shrimp is becoming a tradition of the dim past? Do they know that he is getting scarce and—what his celestial captors call him—"slimpy"? Do they know that he will not much longer be gratis, and that, with a mind to self-preservation, he refuses to pull as well as he formerly did? These things merit attention. Why should the laws protecting seals be repealed and the laws protecting Chinamen and members of the Legislature continued in force?

She is not young; she is not fair;
She has no dower of gold or lands;
She has not even pretty hands.
And yet she has a certain air—
A strange sweet grace, that time, nor care,
Nor all the awfulness of fate,
May take from her, and leave her plain,
As are the girls who pass and pain
My weary eyes, while long I wait
Her coming at the garden gate.
You wonder why she is to me
The one sweet woman in life's camp?
Because the grub she gives is free,
And I—and I'm a hungry tramp.

What has become of the late "Emperor Norton's" head? We ask this question in all seriousness, for we have received a dark intimation that probably it is not in the grave with his body. True he has done with it. True, it served him but indifferently well when he had it. True, it is an interesting object to "the profession." But, after all, one likes to have one's head buried with one's body, and the poor crack-brained old man's "distracted globe" would in life have contemplated the possibility of being pawed and pulled about in a doctor-shop with aversion and confused horror. Messieurs the Doctors, where is the head of the Emperor Norton?

A negro was recently admitted to the Supreme Court of New York on motion of a female lawyer. "Some of the ladies of the congregation have expressed a preference for gin."

Those ladies and gentlemen of our best society who are overfond of basking in the beams of a title—no reference to the late lamented Sir George—and of shining by the reflected light of great artists, are earnestly requested not to read the following anecdote, for it has the disadvantage of being unpleasantly true: In honor of a famous violinist a little supper party assembled at the Maison Dorée. The repast having been concluded in a satisfactory manner, the guest of the evening exalted his feet and began soberly to pick his teeth with a fork. After an exchange of significant glances between the host and the less distinguished guests, one of the latter produced a silver tooth-pick from his pocket, and civilly offered it to the great man with a few well-chosen remarks explanatory of its use. It was politely accepted, critically examined, highly commended, vigorously used, and returned with many thanks. Money can not buy that tooth-pick now.

The Countess Hahn-Hahn—novelist and poet—who has just died in Germany, will probably not long be remembered by her books, but has an assured immortality in a few lines of Heine. It was of her that he wrote—we quote from memory: "A woman writes with one eye upon her paper and the other upon some man. This is true of all women but the Countess Hahn-Hahn, who has but one eye."

The proprietor of the New York Herald (following the noble example of Mike De Young, who gave $2.50) has subscribed one hundred thousand dollars to the Irish relief fund. Of course, the usual smirking miscreant will ensue to impute a selfish motive—as if a man should not be permitted to advertise his business his own way!

The Chronicle is engaged in an effort to depreciate the value of the Central-Pacific Railroad stock, to demonstrate that it pays but a small interest, and is endeavoring to defeat the effort to place it upon the world's market. The present argument, that the road does not pay, is quite in contrast with the burden of its writing during the campaign, that its earnings were enormous and altogether in excess of reason, and the consequences was exorbitant rates of fare and excessive charges for freight. We can not appreciate the motives of a journal that would defeat a California railroad corporation, now engaged in extensive railroad building, from acquiring money by selling "stock." It surely can not be from tenderness toward Wall Street, nor for fear that Jay Gould and his syndicate should be imposed upon. It can not be that there is any intelligent class in California that would desire to paralyze the arm of the railroad builders. It can not be from mean and jealous personal feeling at favors withheld. So far as we are concerned we hope the stock may realize fifty-four millions of dollars, and that this sum may be expended in constructing the Southern Pacific road to Galveston and New Orleans, the new road across the Straits of Carquinez, the new road to Monterey, the extension of the California Street Railroad to the ocean and elsewhere, new roads to the Sierra foot-hills as feeders to its main trunk, and new roads everywhere, till California, its mountains and its valleys, are gridironed with rails.

The fall of the bogus "Sir" George Bridges was caused, it appears, by his ignorance of matters about which he might have been supposed to know, and a knowledge of which was necessary to him in his business of social impostor. This ignorance, deep and deplorable, even in an untitled "scion of the British working classes," a writer in last Sunday's Chronicle mercilessly exposed. Alas! he concludes thus:

"Meanwhile kettledrums, receptions and teas are barren of a Baron, and deceived feminine family circles think of Lord Adolphus Vane Tempest and resolve once more to demand references of all the Peerage, from Gladstone down, who may come hereafter."

His own ignorance is denser, heavier, more metallic and impenetrable than that of his victim. The teacher who believes that Mr. Gladstone is a member of the Peerage may be excused from giving us further lessons, but he is not without a certain value as showing why such donkeys as "Sir" George find good pasturage where he guards the gate.

The Argonaut made a mistake when some time ago it advocated the appointment of a boiler inspector. We had just placed a new engine and boiler under our editorial room to run our new press; and although it was a new one, we felt nervous. The question of a future state of punishment had not then been fully settled. We thought of the many boilers in the city, and knowing that there was a Boiler Inspector law and no Boiler Inspector, we wrote a paragraph favoring his appointment. We take it back. We were fooled. We were writing upon a topic that we knew nothing of—a luxury that we seldom, and ought never to, indulge in. We have read the remarks of Mr. Gibbs, of the firm of G. W. Gibbs & Co.; and of Mr. Scott, of the Union Iron Works; of Mr. Ira P. Rankin, of the Pacific Foundry; of Mr. J. V. Hall, of the Sacramento Boiler Works; of Mr. Wheeler, of the firm of McAfee, Wheeler & Co.; of Mr. Moynihan, of Moynihan & Aitken; of Mr. Dickey, of the Risdon Iron Works, and of Mr. L. B. Benchley, of the Pacific Rolling Mills; all of which is in a printed pamphlet, and we are convinced beyond any doubt that there is a political cat hidden in this boilerfull of meal, and that the law ought to be repealed.

His admirers in the Western Addition, grateful for his effort to redeem that section of our city from a howling wilderness, gave him a kettledrum on Tuesday night. His secretary slobbered a solo of soft soap over him, while other enthusiastic patrons gave him taffy. Admission free. Refreshments cheap. Whole thing nasty.

Wilhelm's pleased to advertise
"Picked orchestras." No doubt he tries,
But there's a slip twist lip and cup:
His players simply are picked—up.

Mr. J. Ross Jackson, of the Chronicle, is one of the most talented base-ball reporters in the land. As a musical sharp, however, he is obviously too longitudinal. Vide the following excerpt from an unpublished report of the recent dedicatory services at Saint Ignatius College:

"Melodious Praise—Grand Choral Services—Roman Catholic religious circles have been on the qui vive for some time on account of the new choral service to be brought out at the Saint Ignatius Church last evening. The sacred edifice was crowded in every part by a very fashionable congregation of ladies and gentlemen. The comp d'air of the field from the scorer's stand, on the left of the organ, was indescribably beautiful. No sooner was the game opened than it was apparent to all that a champion nine were getting in their work in a masterly way. As soon as the organist's hand warmed to the bat he sent a daisy-cutter to the soprano, whose voice is capable of the best fielding seen in this vicinity for several years. The tenor was caught out on a fly by his voice giving way, but his bad play was compensated for by the magnificent work the basso did as short-stop. The nine played well together, and were under the complete control of their captain."

Fortunately Mr. Jackson was that evening excused from the arduous duty of editing his own copy, and the insight of the Chronicle's city editor saved the office the expense and "bother" of a religious war.

During Mr. E. J. Baldwin's trial on a charge of having defrauded the revenue, Silas Calvert testified as follows:

"Baldwin made a deed of the distillery to me. I suppose I own it now, but am undecided as to what I shall do with it. In the meantime I shall continue to act as Mr. Baldwin's coachman."

A noble example, worthy of general imitation. Let all owners of distilleries act as Mr. Baldwin's coachmen. We shall not have so much bad whisky, but Mr. Baldwin will, in consequence, have better driving. And at last he is dead, some sober sexton will "rattle his bones" tenderly and with great comfort to

A SONG WITH A MORAL.

[A wealthy gentleman of San Francisco recently said to a friend: "If I hadn't been born rich I might have been somebody."]

So you wish you were wealthy as I am—
No doubt that is natural enough;
You think my life's pleasant and easy.
While yours, as you call it, is "rough."
Well, I don't think my cash and etceteras
I ever shall quite give away;
But if I'd been born poor, as you were,
I might have been something to-day.

But, you see, when my honest old father
Struck quartz on the Comstock that fall,
He did for his future young hopeful
A thing he could never recall.
'Twas the dream of his life that his children
Should be learned and great and all that;
And so with bank-notes I was blistered
Till I made a grand failure—that's flat!

I think I had brains to begin with—
Not a prodigy, that I well know;
But you see I was petted and flattered
Until I half thought myself so.
I thought my "grand cash" could do all things;
I lived like a very young Turk;
I believed, like an ass, that there are ways
To get up in this world without work.

My good father sent me to college;
But there I "rode ponies" all through.
I laughed when I learned what a twenty
Slyly slipped to a tutor will do.
I "bought out" my examinations;
And in this way four years were passed.
I entered the college a blockhead,
And a blockhead came out at the last.

There was Widow Brown's son, you remember—
That red-headed, freckle-faced lad—
Who worked like a slave for his mother,
And came to school only half clad.
I laughed at his hair and his freckles,
And sneered at his second-hand clothes,
Till one day he "filed a remonstrance,"
As witness this twist in my nose.

Well, somehow, Brown went on and upward;
His plans never seemed to fall through;
He always was wanted for something
That no other fellow could do.
He's been toiling and grubbing and digging,
While I've been an idler for years;
He brought that big suit in Nevada
That's set half the State by the ears.

I could name plenty others who've passed me,
And are quite lost to sight on the road;
They could all get on faster than I could,
Though carrying an awful big load.
No, I've nothing but cash and etceteras;
I never shall give them away,
But if I'd been born poor as you, Tom,
I might have been something to-day.

STOCKTON, January 28, 1880. J. G. SWINNERTON.

A TRAVELED VAGABOND'S STORY.

The Odd Egg.

He was rather tall and bony, and showed a heavy, dragging limp in his right leg as he sidled up to the bar. His clothes had worn smooth on the cuff and collar, and were disposed to ventilation at the elbow, but were still sufficient to keep out ordinarily cold weather. With a not ungraceful movement, and a sleight that could only come of long practice, he dropped a well-chewed quid into his left hand, which he placed behind him, leaning forward with his right elbow on the bar.

"Egg-nogg? no, thank you. Jest a leetle whisky straight, barkeep, no sugar. I know it's liable to occasion remark shyn' at egg-nogg—so near the holiday season, too—and it's very kind and perlit in you, stranger, calling on me to come for'ard bere with these other gentlemen—an' egg-nogg bein' the drink of the crowd—it's not the do-se-do to refuse, but the truib is, I hain't et a egg or tackled any fruit of that description fur goin' on six years. Singlar, you think? Well, I've got my reasons. Praps you never knowed Dave Gilchrist? No? Well, me an' Dave was ol' pards. We was both in the same regiment in the last war. I'm older'n Dave: he was only a boy when he was shot through the lungs, at Stone River. Well, I nussed him through it, an' after the war we both come here to Indiany. I never was much account for farmin', but I went to work on Dave's father's farm.

"Dave was a mighty good-lookin' young feller, and his father owned a quarter-section of as good land as the sun ever shines on, with jest two heirs, Dave and his sister Artemesia—Meeshy for short—and the gals began to purr 'round him like cats 'round a cream crock. I soon saw he was hooked, an' by a grass widow who hadn't been in the neighborhood but a few weeks. She hadn't seen me, but I had her, and knowed her from the jump. Well, I tried to reason with him to give her up. She knowed every keerd in the matrimonial deck as it were, and she could stock the deal on him every time. Then says I to him:

"You don't want to marry a woman with a husband liable to turn up at any minute like Enick Arden in the play."

"'Whab's that to you?" says he.

"'Mub,' says I, 'I've been married an' divorced, an' know the ropes."

"Well, it was purty tough fur him, but he said he'd give her up. But he couldn't stay there, he said.

"Got to get her out of my mind, somehow, and the best way is to put a thousand miles between me and her," says he.

"I've got a brother," says I, thinkin' of him all to wunst—hadn't thought of him afore for years—"a brother out in Washington Territory, a steady feller, not a bit like me; and if you say the word, Dave, your old pard as recommends the vermifuge will help you take it."

"So we packed up our traps one night, very sudden, an' Dave left a letter to his sister Meeshy, an' I wrote one to the widder. We intended to go to California, and from there to Washington Territory, but when we got to Frisco we changed our minds, and went down to Arizona and went into the desert. Well, we went there and were gettin' along purty good when Dave took down with the rheumatiz. Stranger, I don't know what the square John Henry rheumatiz is, and you never will till you git it in the mines. Dave poked along for several months—couldn't work, couldn't even wait on himself, an' the little money we had begin to melt away. I knowed he'd never get well there. So one day I up an' tells him, 'I'm a goin' to California.' At this he moans out that he'd never a thought I'd give him the dirty shake that-a-way, after the years we'd been together, and broke down cryin' like a baby. Dave was a game boy, you betcher boots, but when we git weak an' low, stranger, sometimes the best of us'll squeal. 'You jest turn off that hydrant,' says I; 'we're both goin' together.'

"But I can't walk," says Dave.

"What's the dif," says I, 'you can ride, and here's y'r mule. You'll go if I have to carry you every step of the way.'

"So off we starts. Well, we got to Los Angeles, on the coast, in four weeks, an' it was no time at all after that before Dave begin to pick up. Then we went up to Frisco, the boy still improvin', an' from there we worked our way to Fort Klamath, in southwest Oregon. Then I told Dave we'd rasseded 'round about long enough; that I was goin' to see my brother, who lived in Washington Territory, about twenty miles from Walla Walla. Dave had got tolerable hearty, but do you s'pose he'd stopped frettin' about that widder? Not a bit—he still had her on the brain bigger'n a straw stack. Now an' then, when he'd git blue, he'd give me the wire edge of his tongue for havin' drug him away from Indiany. But we started for Walla Walla cat-a-cornered acrost Oregon, and follerin' the trail a clean four hundred mile. We walked it all, every step of the way. I had to carry most of the traps myself, for Dave was weak in the chest, and had to go light. Dave had on a pair of moccasins; I had a heavy pair of boots. Dave carried the revolver; I carried the double-barreled shotgun an' the other traps. Purty soon his moccasins cut to pieces, and I gave him my boots, which made it easier for him. That's a mighty lonesome trail from Klamath to Walla Walla, and people are sprinkled over it about as thick as gold nuggets is here. We didn't have much money, and sometimes were two days together without food. Then we'd take up a notch or two in our belts, to reef in our stomachs to suit the supply of grub, and go ahead. One day we'd jest crossed the Oregon line, an' was nearin' Walla Walla, when we see a thin curl of smoke risin' above the timber. I knowed from the wind in it that that smoke didn't come from any open fire, but came through a chimley, an' we soon sighted a cabin in a clearin'. Then up flies a big, yaller rooster an' gives a how-de-do that put more strange feelin' in me than I'd hed fur a long time—poetry and music together, you know. Carried me back to the days when I was a boy on the old farm, an' a lump came into my throat an' my eyes got moist. What do you suppose Dave said? Says he: 'Jim, we'll have eggs for dinner, as sure as the Lord made little apples.'

"The very thing I was thinkin' of," says I.

"The door of the cabin was open, so we didn't have to knock, an' a nice, tidy woman, with a fresh white biled apron, asked us in. Her man was in the field back of the house, and he and a hired man came in to see us. Travelers are scarce out there. The woman saw that we were hungry—we badn't hed anything to eat for two days but a handful of parched corn. She said she was sorry there was so little in the house an' all that sort of thing, but would try to get something up. Dave asked if she hadn't eggs, and said a dozen packages of that fruit, biled with the husks on, would be agreeable. Two round-eyed, tow-headed boys were sent out to find 'em.

"Well, there they was, heaped up before us, on a plate, in their nice white kivers—a dozen of 'em—an' Dave an' me pitched in. That wasn't all the meal, though, fur there was jerked venison, an' as good bread as ever was turned out of a pan, an' ginewine yaller butter. But it was the eggs that ketched me. Eggs an' civilization go hand in hand an' shoulder to shoulder. Did you ever think of that? We started in on a egg apiece. My first egg just struck the spot, an' I let out my belt a couple of notches, an' took egg number two, Dave lifin' his second one at the same time. So we kep' company, egg fur egg, right along. At the fifth or fourth egg, I don't know which, Dave says: 'Jim, this reminds me of old times. I used to have a little bow-legged humped-backed hen I got of one of the Brazier boys—Bill Brazier, dead now; killed out on the pike, east of Gray's mill; 'tbrowed off'n his horse down the steep hill there, an' struck his head on a boulder.'

"Then we both reached for the plate.

"I reckoned he'd lost count while tellin' his story, so I says:

"Go slow, old boy, that egg's mine."

"Not much," says he, 'you're off your nest.'

"This was too much. I flared right up. To think he'd tried to bilk an old pard outen a egg, after all that pard had done fur him, soured me clean to my heels. You see, I'd shared everything with him, drug him through his sickness, 'tended him like a woman, an' now to have him come the hog game on me! The devil was in me, an' I drewed the revolver; it was layin' on the floor between us, an' was goin' to let daylight through him, when the woman screamed, and the man of the house spoke up. This brought me to myself; but I tell you I had him down fine. We both got up from the table, leavin' the last egg on the plate, Dave takin' the shotgun from the place where it was leamin' outside the door. I scorned to take any advantage of him then, mad as I was, an' gave him a fair chance to git the gun. We walked on fur a quarter of a mile without speaking, each lookin' out of the corner of the eye for fear the other'd get the drop. 'Dave,' says I, 'this business has got to be settled.'

"Yes," says he, 'and some other things has got to be settled, too. I might have been an honest, happy married man in Indiany this minute if it hadn't been for you, instead of the tramp I now am. It was my money you wanted to bring you to California, and you made me run away from the only woman I ever loved.'

"Your money, you say; d—n your money. Do you want me to tell you who the only woman you ever loved is? She's my divorced wife."

"This staggered him some.

"Well, what of that—that wouldn't prevent her from makin' me a good wife, would it?"

"Dave Gilchrist, you was young, and I wanted to save you. I had some things in my own life I didn't care for even you to know. When I first met you in the regiment I had jest served a term of two years in the Ohio penitentiary."

"So you're a prison bird, are you?"

"Yes, I'm a prison bird. I loved that woman, and married her. We bad scarcely been married three months before we were both arrested, charged with stealing, and the goods, a roll of black silk, was found in the house. It had been stolen from a dry goods store one day when we were both in town. I had heerd of kleptermaniacs, people who can't help but take things, and I couldn't call my wife's offense stealing. I couldn't bear to see her, young and delicate, go to prison; so I confessed that I myself had took it, and, on a plea of guilty, was sent up. Well, the parting between us was a bitter one, but I thought I had done my duty. But in less than six weeks that woman applied for a divorce from me, an' got it on the ground of my being in the State's prison—me who had gone there to save her."

"If you'd told me this sooner I'd prob'ly have believed it. Now I think you're tryin' to pull the wool over my eyes some more."

"Well, stranger, this made me madder'n a bear with a gum bile, and there was nothin' for it but blood. We both made our little arrangements in case of accident, and then each got behind a tree. My plan was to watch my chance, and at the first show to let fire. Soon I see the top of his hat sticking out from the side of the tree, an' I was about to let him have it, when one of them Injun stories came in my mind. Then I see through his little game. 'Not much,' says I to myself, 'an empty hat on a ramrod to draw my fire.' Then I stuck my leg out to draw his, not havin' much respect for a shotgun—they scatter so—and thinkin' I could get my leg in again before he fired. But I didn't. He let me have it, and brought me down. But I held on to the revolver, and as I fell—he had come from behind his tree—I fired, but missed. Dave threw down his gun and rushed toward me, crying like a baby. I drewed up to let him have it, but he never flinched. 'All right, Jim, old pard, I deserve it as an ungrateful dog.'

"That was too much for me, stranger, and I throwed the derved weapon away for fear somethin' might happen. Next I knowed, Dave had his arm around me, huggin' me, and then—I jest got lost completely. Guess it must a' been from loss of blood. When things came round again I was in that cabin, and Dave and the man of the house and the tidy little woman in the white apron were standing over me, and, blast my eyes, if the owner of the cabin wasn't my own brother Josh, which I didn't know him from Adam's off ox, on account of the ha'r on his face. And I got well, all but this limp, and Dave forgot the grass widder, married the tidy little woman's youngest sister, an' settled down only three miles from Josh. But you bet Josh's wife has been learned a lesson she won't soon forgit. What? Why, not to lay out thirteen eggs for a dozen without notifyin' me. Oh, me? Why, I'm the vagabond I allus was."

"Here, barkeep, fill these up agin."

A Scene from "Sebastian Strome."

The heroine of Julian Hawthorne's latest novel is Mary Dene, the heiress of Dene Hall. Her wealth and her beauty are not of so much importance in the author's eyes as her extraordinary character and accomplishments, which he describes as follows:

She could not only saddle her horse and ride it, but she could exchange it for a better at a horse fair. She could mow a field, drain it, plow it, and rotate its crops. She could bring a pheasant down with a gun, as well as cook and carve it. She could not only listen to gentlemen's small-talk in the parlor, but she could oversee workmen digging a well or building a wall, and discourse such sense to them as to make their ears tingle. She could as easily instruct the London solicitors—Messrs. Fry and Griddle—when to sell stock and when to hold on to it, as she could check the housekeeper's weekly account. She was not very skillful at trilling Italian airs or warbling French cbansons, but she could sing a hymn in a way to make your heart beat. When she walked about the grounds she did not hitch herself along by her shoulders, with her skirts in one hand, her parasol in another, and her elbows in her ribs; but she stepped out boldly, with elastic feet nine inches long, and with her arms hanging at her side, like Juno's in the Greek statue. She had the full use of all her limbs.

Once, as she was returning home after pruning some trees in a neighboring preserve, with her axe in her hand, and dressed in a dark serge gown with a thick quilted under-petticoat of scarlet cloth, she was chased into a corner by a bull. As she ran she loosened the petticoat, and, watching her chance, stripped it off in a moment, and cleverly tossed it on the animal's horns as he was charging her. At the same time she sprang to one side, and, as he passed, brought down her keen hatchet just behind his ears, and tumbled the huge creature dead at her feet.

This deed of prowess was witnessed by Sir Hubert, the gamekeeper, and another man, as they were racing headlong across the adjoining field to her assistance. The bull was a prize animal, valued at five hundred guineas, and Sir Hubert, after heartily thanking God for his child's safety, turned to the gamekeeper and said, with a rueful twinkle in his eye:

"After all, Wilkins, you see, we were not in time to save him! He's quite dead."

Miss Mary overheard this remark and the laugh which followed it.

"No bull or anything else shall chase me across a field and live to tell of it," said she, very grimly. "If I hadn't killed him this afternoon I would have shot him this evening. Wilkins, give me my petticoat."

Napoleon the First turns out to be a blond, according to Madame Rémusat and Metternich. How different their pen-portraits from the traditional steel engravings and colored chromos that we have seen so often. These writers say that Napoleon's hair was of a reddish-brown hue and that he had blue-gray eyes, and both agree that his head and features were classic in beauty of cut and marblesque in palor.

Says the Oakland Itemizer of the Call: "The political cauldron is beginning to boil." Isn't that a rather daring figure of speech, neighbor? It appears to be a pretty happy metaphor, but its originality is disquieting; we do not remember to have seen it more than a million times. We prefer expressions which have the sanction of popular usage.

OLD MAIDS.

That there is a change in old maids is not generally appreciated, but I assure you the old maids of to-day are not what they used to be. True, the olden-time one is not yet extinct, and a dear ridiculous old mortal she is. There is Aunt Margaret, turned fifty surely, yet who would dare to utter that disagreeable term in her presence? She declares herself a man-hater from birth; yet how often have we sat in the gloaming listening to tales of the time when she was a lass. "Ah, dinna I lead the lads a pretty rig, though," she says. "But there was only one I e'er cared for. He was right good, and I think I loved him; but I dunno, and its just as well, for what would the boys ha' done without me?"

Then she stops, with half a sigh. We sit very quietly in the now dark room, feeling that there has been stirred the memory of a long buried love. After a while some one comes in and lights the candles; it would have seemed profanity in us. How relieved we are, yet hardly daring to look at Margaret, for fear there might be a tear in her eye or something tell-tale in her face which she'd not have us see.

Dear old Margaret, how she clings to things of the past! She never could be induced to don a modern overdress. "Only a frill or two; that is what I have always worn." So, slowly but surely, the good creature drops more and more behind the times. Still we all love her, and find in her a sympathetic confidant. She never advises, but thinks deeply, and then, with the sagest expression in her kind, gray eyes, replies: "Well, I think"—pause—"I dunno." No more do we—of these abstruse problems, girls' hearts. Margaret is the veritable old-fashioned old maid; truly very different from the article which adorns the page of romance. The modern old maid exists in several distinct types of womanhood. One of these—the blue-stockings—excites neither love nor sympathy. We are a little afraid of her—of her opinions, of her tongue; it is apt to be sharp. She has a masculine intellect, and, with it, manly ambitions. Perhaps she graduated from some university noted for its erudition. Perhaps she teaches school. Perhaps she has written a book, which never sold; but, as it is on pre-historic man, it makes a pretty gift to her friends at Christmas, and keeps before their eyes a proof of her genius. My bas-bleu is not beautiful, pities the mass of womankind, and is considerably left to her own devices by the other sex. She's not to blame, poor thing. It is the natural result of the "over-education of woman."

In one other example I fain would portray the ancient maiden of to-day: Beautiful, bright, accomplished, lovable, too. She adorns the best society. People say: "What a good wife she would make for some one!" She has no love tale, but is romantic enough to have an ideal. Occasionally she gets glimpses of him, but, be it known, he is married to a very superior woman. Her sisters say she is too particular, but her noble father, whose last days she brightens, looks tenderly toward her and says: "Well, I am thankful that men are not as they were when I was young, for then my precious girl would have been wooed and won, and I"—just then some one smothered his remarks with kisses, but the tale is told.

AUNT JANE.

SAN RAFAEL, February 1, 1880.

Kisses for the Million.

The Peoria Call man—unlike the Call man of our city—is not ashamed to investigate this tender subject. He says: "The inventors of the osculatory art are popularly supposed to have been Adam and Eve; although it is barely possible that so subtle a science may have originated in a still higher order of beings, for, as the poet insinuates—

'Unless the angels kiss,
How dull must be their bliss!'

Yet with theories of angelic, seraphic, or cherubic kissing we have naught to do. Plain human lippling is the fact before us which demands an inquiry into its causes and consequences. Kisses may be divided as follows: First, the kiss of courtesy, imprinted on the hand of some antiquated dame by the young elegant, who would fain become her residuary legatee. Next is the kiss of affection, by some authorities aptly termed the kiss of custom; this is placed sometimes on the lips, more often on the cheek, especially if papa is a chewer of tobacco or a consumer of whisky. Next is the kiss of tantalization; this is bestowed by girls upon each other in the presence of young men, and is almost universally denounced by unprejudiced observers as a wicked waste of raw material. Last in our list, but not least, is the kiss of love. Let us speak with bated breath. This, in its marvelous variations, is the key to all the secrets of life; the inspiration of poets, musicians, and painters. Oh, when four lips join to take one purple pull, there flashes through two hearts a sensation before which the glory of champagne evaporates, and the deliciousness of deviled chicken is no more. But if the kiss of two souls meeting is a foretaste of immortality, what is the kiss at parting? Ah, what is it but the solemn, sacred, solitary seal imprinted deeply on the tomb of Hope by the angel of Despair?"

And the osculation ogre of the New York Star—which would like to be the Chronicle of New York and does not quite know how—writes of the most modern kiss as follows:

"To kiss or not to kiss, that is the question. This doubt does not relate to the exhilarating and altogether innocuous game of billiards. There is the kiss paroxysmal peculiar to the City of Churches, the orthodox kiss which does not involve suits for divorce, and the kiss-but-never-tell. All these have their advantages, particularly the latter. The sort of a salute which racks men's souls, and is now sweeping the country like a tidal wave, is the variety known to the clergy. Recent experiences in this direction have left the public on the ragged edge of horrible suspense. New Jersey holds up its hands in holy horror. For a minister to kiss his cook once appears to be entirely satisfactory to all parties concerned. When the same reverend gentleman repeats the operation the result is fatal. If one is to take his pastor as an exemplar in these matters, how is one to know where to draw the line? Is it the cook who must be ignored and left to suffer at the absence of the coveted kiss? Is it the doctor of divinity alone who must be ostracised for indulging in the tempting propensity? Is it that we may only kiss the same person once, and so must be forever seeking new subjects for the performance of the painfully pleasing duty? A question of so vital importance to the human race in general and to each individual of that race in particular, should not be left to the adjudication of chance meetings with the cook. While under certain circumstances a young and good-looking cook would have great influence in settling such a dispute, we would suggest that it be referred to the Supreme Court of Maine, with a request that it give one of its remarkable decisions with as little delay as is compatible with its more important business of keeping the law on Senator Blaine's side."

Not to be supinely useless, the World querist adds the glimmer of his flashlight, and tells the other world this:

One of the prettiest of pastorals is the "Lendemain," by Dufresny, the clever poet, who, when Louis XIV. said to him; consolingly: "Poverty is no crime," replied, "No, sire, it's worse." "Le Lendemain" may thus be translated, almost with literalness:

Phillis, greedier far than tender,
Naught gaining by refusing, I wis,
One day exacted of Clitander
Thirty sheep for a single kiss.

On the next day the youth was gaining—
Prices had ta'en a downward leap—
He from the shepherdess was gaining
Thirty kisses for one sheep.

On the next day Phillis, tenderer,
Fearing to be denied her bliss,
To the youth did glad surrender her
Thirty muttons for one kiss.

Next day Phillis had been willing
To give both flock and sheep-dog large
For the one kiss she saw the villain
Give Lisette without any charge!

And even the staid Tribune confesses:

"If this ministerial kissing business goes on much longer," said a Hoboken church trustee, yesterday, "we who have any regular occupation will have to give it up or resign our positions in the church, for too much time will be needed for investigation."

A university should turn out versatile scholars. The University of California, we are informed, does so. As soon as the teachers, schoolmasters, or perhaps we ought to use the jargon and say the "learned professors," in buggy, on foot, or in street car, leave the University grounds, the "young gentlemen" are permitted to "go" it: that is, to smoke, to play cards, and to have a good time generally. We are informed that a "lively" faro game is encouraged; that poker, seven-up, and cinch are not neglected for the more modern and fashionable games; that frequent visits are made to San Francisco, and that the "wee, sma' hours" of morning find many a young tramp plodding homeward to his academic bed. That absences are frequently prolonged, and oftentimes without information reaching parent or guardian that the hopeful is playing hookey. If we knew some regent we would call his attention to these little harmless delinquencies, and ask him if the discipline could not be brushed up a little. We would be obliged to some good little boy who can not tell a lie, if he would give us some of the points on the sly, and faith we'll print them.

There is a private meteorologist in England who has published the theory that an exceedingly mild winter will always be followed by an exceedingly cold one. Of this fact there is no doubt; and so far the meteorologist is right. Nevertheless, he has paused upon the threshold of the true theory of weather, and has failed to make the great discovery that was almost within his reach. There is one great principle that must form the foundation of any satisfactory theory of weather. This is the axiom, hitherto unnoticed by meteorologists, that the amount of cold weather is limited. There is just enough of it to make a fair average winter all over the globe. In, perhaps, the majority of instances the cold weather is thus evenly distributed, in which case we find what we recognize as the proper winter weather in New York, Paris, Vienna, Rome, and elsewhere. Unfortunately, this distribution is often made with great apparent carelessness and inaccuracy.

There is food for thought in the following paragraph, written by William Hartpole Lecky nearly ten years ago. The reflection was meant for English readers, but it has a meaning which our national legislators may wisely heed:

"There are no errors in politics more common or more fatal than the political pedantry which estimates institutions exclusively by their abstract merits, without any regard to the special circumstances, wishes, or characters of the nations for which they were intended, and the political materialism which refuses to recognize any of what are called sentimental grievances. Political institutions are essentially organic things, and their success depends not merely on their intrinsic excellence, but also on the degree in which they harmonize with the traditions and convictions, and take root in the affections of the people. Every statesman who is worthy of the name will carefully calculate the effect of his measures upon opinion, will esteem the creation of a strong, healthy, and loyal public spirit one of the highest objects of legislation, and will look upon the diseases of public opinion as among the greatest evils of the State."

For many months the newspaper readers of San Francisco have missed from the columns of the Chronicle and the Call those cheerful paragraphic pleasantries concerning "circulation," which formerly so enlivened the pages of those industrious purveyors of fact and professors of forecast. The proprietors of the Star and the San, of New York, love each other as do Messrs. Pickering and De Young. But they do not permit their good fellowship to interfere with the entertainment which the semblance of a newspaper row always affords the intelligent reader. The Star man has just emphasized the fact that the San man is a pseudologist by offering to bet $50,000 that the solar circulation is less than is claimed. The reading San Franciscan would like to see some similar proposition couched in Mr. Pickering's inimitable English.

"Dog racing," says Forney's Progress, "has become a popular sport in San Francisco." But then we have no funny papers to read—like yours, Colonel.

ABOUT OUR BITTER HALVES.

You come, fair ladies, if you please,
Not here as talkers, but talkers.

There are menageries, but not womenageries.

Mrs. Mackay intends leaving Paris for Italy very soon, and the shopkeepers will deplore her departure.

Of the Princess Louise's contributions to the London water-color exhibition the Spectator of that city says "people will think them very able—for a princess."

A colored woman in Hayti some few months since began to grow white, and now there is not a trace of color in her skin. She is very much mortified at the change.

An old lady in Wichita says she never could imagine where all the Smiths came from until she saw in a New England town a large sign, "Smith Manufacturing Company."

Mrs. Ouray now wants a sealskin coat, high-heeled French shoes, and a velvet train dress. It would be a missionary work to aid in refining this promising candidate for civilization.

The marriages are announced in late English papers of Darwin's son, Mr. Horace Darwin, and Miss Emma Cecilia Farrer, of Abinger Hall, Surrey, and of Bishop Colenso's son, Mr. Robert J. Colenso, and Miss Emily A. Kerr, a lady from Ontario.

The Princess Amazulu, the Zulu lady who is at present visiting London, is a bright and volatile person about twenty-four years old. She is graceful, but not beautiful, has a fine flow of language and a quick sense of humor, sings well, and loves to dance. She is accompanied by a suite of two Zulu ladies and four male attendants.

Mayfair objects to wearing amber beads with a peacock-green gown, saying that the combination looks like everything horrible, but then Mayfair probably judges from seeing it worn by a blonde. Perhaps the sight of an American brunette, with the color in her dusky cheeks heightened by the brilliant contrast of the two colors, might change the Briton's mind on the subject.

Of the reported rupture of Miss Julia Fletcher's engagement, the London Globe says: "American society in Rome is just now much exercised by the abrupt termination to the matrimonial engagement which was announced between Miss Fletcher, authoress of Kismet, and Lord Wentworth. In this transaction no blame is attached to the lady, but the gentleman is greatly censured."

Persons who see the embroidery from the Royal Art School for the first time are usually astonished to find that the daisies are all crimson-tipped, seeming to think that Englishmen imitate Americans in calling a chrysanthemum a daisy. Burns's poem is forgotten, and the ladies almost insist on the substitution of the brown-centred, white-petaled field flower, for the prim little garden blossom with its delicate blush and pretty primness.

Lady Frances Wilson was of very plain personal appearance, yet one gentleman for several seasons perseveringly gazed at her from the pit of the opera house, so as to cause her considerable annoyance, until at length she was informed one day that Mr. — had left her all his fortune. Prompted by curiosity to ascertain if it was the same person who had admired her at the theatre, she requested to see the deceased, and identified the corpse as that of her admirer.

It was very clever of the Elberton, Georgia, girl, who, in writing a leap-year letter to a friend, said that she wasn't exactly engaged, but saw a cloud on the horizon about the size of a man's hand.

A life-saving station on the California coast has been named after Maggie Geddes, of San Antonio, the little girl who plunged in after a playmate who had fallen into a mill-race, and saved her from the wheel toward which she was being borne. Maggie is only nine years old.

An old aunty, in greasy kitchen raiment, grabbed the hand of Ulysses at Jacksonville, and shouted aloud as the red bandanna around her head bobbed like a cock's comb: "Hallelujah, Marse Grant. I 'spect you're like God A'mighty." Grant's two hundred pounds of coarse-grained beef showed signs of tranquil gratification.

The cold weather nipped the fingers of the French women to that extent that they found it necessary to carry muffs in the house, but they did not make use of the muffs which were designed to wear in the street, not they! They had muffs specially constructed to match their gowns, and hung them around their necks by a satin ribbon; and, in order that even an ignorant man might recognize the difference between them and the ordinary muff, they were shield-shaped.

A fair débütante at a late ball "received" with a large, almost embarrassing, armful of bouquets. To her is presented one of our "howling swells." F. D.—"No fewer than eight bouquets—just think of it!" Are they not lovely?" H. S.—"Yaas. Lovely, indeed. And how good of your papa."

Unlike the Belgian laundry established in London by Lady Sebright and Mrs. John Wood, which brought one of its leading shareholders into the courts, the one founded by Annie Thomas, Kate Field, and their coadjutors has marched steadily on to success. It is said to have been a pleasant sight to behold these ladies washing, with plebeian suds, the fingers soiled by writing stories for the Christmas annuals, and warming their pretty finger-tips with the flatiron and gauffrette.

A lady explained one of the reasons for the want of entrain in the ball, which was, alas! only too palpable. "You see," said she, "you men pass ladies in masks whom you are accustomed to see every day, and you don't recognize them; but we women all know each other. There are turns of the head, or peculiarities of gait, which you grosser creatures do not notice, but which never escape our delicate intuitions. There is Mrs. —; that is Miss —; surely you recognize them? I see you don't. You are as blind as the — your sex. We are all engaged in observing each other, and wondering who is first going to step over the be-masqued propriety and begin to be amusing."

It is really gratifying to think that in point of morality the Countess of Somerive is an improvement on Camille. We may hope now some beautiful day to see Miss Clara Morris select a play free from all taint, barren of all immorality; a play to which we may take those we love best without feeling in the least embarrassed; for, though I should despise myself if I thought myself the least bit prudish, and should consider it my duty to discontinue anything that would look like mock-modesty in others, I think that the stage was not intended for a camera by which all that is immoral or uncouth is to be portrayed. There is neither charm nor grace in a play like the Countess of Somerive, for instance. The plot, which at best is shallow, hinges on the elopement of the "Countess," who, after an absence of twenty years, reappears before her husband with a daughter, and, being old and fagged, of course regrets her naughtiness of twenty years ago. There is no more virtue in the repentance than there was in the elopement. I suppose when we get on the other side of fifty we shall all regret and repent the sins of our youth. And yet, improbable as it seems, the point on which the whole plot of this poor and highly emotional "Frenchy" play turns is only the elopement and return of the "Countess" with her daughter "Alix."

And "Alix" is the most emotional of all harrowing agonizers. She loves and she suffers, she hates and she suffers, and at last, being "clean give out," she drowns herself in a brook surrounded by weeping willows. No London Bridge business for her; she belongs to the artistic and highly wrought species, and could, in justice to herself and the world, only drown herself in a calm, silvery brook, surrounded by many weeping willows, and float down into the arms of her former lover, who has just gone to rescue her, dead and cold. It is sad, very sad; and the ladies and gentlemen in the audience wept. How they did weep! I saw an "old sport"—one of your regular faro dealers—in front of me, weeping. Tears wherever I looked. "Ah, bon Dieu! mes larmes! mes larmes! hoo-hoo-hoo!" came from a nice-looking American lady in the box next to mine. Poor lady, she was looking on a French play, and of course she had to weep in the same poetic language.

Of course everybody wept when poor "Alix" was carried in and laid on the sofa, "dead and drowned." As a pretty "dead and drowned" woman Miss Clara Morris deserves the palm. She looked so absolutely dead that I to this moment am uncertain whether she had on a wax mask, or the face was her own; and she lay there for full ten minutes without moving a muscle, depicting death so realistically that if Mr. Jimmy McGinn should have seen her, he would have measured her for a coffin then and there. When I come to pass the play in review I feel satisfied it is a moral improvement on Camille. In the Countess of Somerive you meet with some nice people, you move in half-decent society, and there is just this moral in it: if a wife forgets herself so far as to elope with the friend of her husband, or any other man, I suppose, she must expect some day or other to be severely punished.

At the risk of being considered presumptuous, I would suggest that Miss Morris select for her repertoire plays of a higher standard: plays in which the actress and the woman are not at sword's points with each other; in which an actress like Miss Morris may render the part of a pure and noble woman in a pure and noble way; for she is equal to the task, this frail, little artist, who finds her great art an antidote for her bodily ailment. It seems to me her duty to help to elevate the stage—she among all other of her profession. She acts well—let her act only fitting parts. As produced at the Baldwin, Alix forms a nice picture, set in a most incongruous frame. Miss Clara Morris gives to "Alix" a rather spirituelle shade; paints her, as it were, in water colors—calm and subdued, moving around noiselessly and gracefully, and speaking with musical intonation. Imagine, if you can, one of her prettiest sentences being interrupted by the "Marquis de Cesaranne," otherwise Mr. Bishop, in tones and gestures that belong to the stable, and not in the drawing-room of a French nobleman. Then we have Mr. Morrison as the "Duc de Mirandol." He was dead letter-perfect in the part; the words ran over his tongue as glibly as water from a faucet. He must have a very fine memory; and, in an actor, that is a good quality; but he lacks either the gift which prompts an actor to conceive his part ere he attempts to portray it, or he lacks the conscientiousness which makes him feel it a duty to take proper time to study the character as well as the words. Mr. Morrison had no idea of the kind of man the "Duc" was, there was a shameful lack of individuality, he appeared like a total indifference to the opinions of his audience or the duties of his position. He was an attempt at a fop one minute, an absolute cad the next, but never a gentleman. Had he given the matter the least bit of thought he might perhaps have reached the conclusion that a French "Duc," possessor of millions, may be flighty and hairbrained, but beneath these superficialities there run the veins of a true gentleman. He is never a Tony Lumpkin nor a Sam Weller. I can not conceive how actors can allow themselves to appear in any play not fully prepared; it is an insult to the public, and an absolute dishonesty to the manager who pays them; and I hope that, with the new stage management at the Baldwin, any neglect of this kind will be followed by immediate dismissal. We can get along very well without Mr. Bishop, or Mr. Morrison, or Mr. or Miss anybody else, rather than have our taste or ideas of propriety wounded. The part of the "Duc" should have been given to Mr. Welles; outside of a melodramatic Italian villain, he is the better and more painstaking actor. And Mr. Freeman came out nervously as the "Count of Somerive"—it was not his first attempt on the English stage. As a German actor and caricaturist Mr. Freeman has gained some local celebrity. Mr. Fred. Lyster is coaching him in his present venture, and he will no doubt succeed; but Mr. Freeman, in giving up acting in German, should give up the German style of acting—that intensity and demonstrativeness which have always made a German actor a failure outside of his own country.

How very pretty Miss Eleanor Carey looked as the "Marquise de Cesaranne." I could not hear what she said, nor exactly tell what she had to do, but she looked very pretty. Per contra, there was no misunderstanding what Miss Jean Clara Walters said, nor what she did, she is so very forcible. One of the differences between her and Miss Carey is, that the latter wants touching up, while Miss Walters wants toning down. To give the part of "Lucienne" to Miss Virginia Thorne was an injustice to the actress—and to the part.

"Alix" makes her exit with this week. When Miss Morris dedicates Camille to the flames let her be replaced by the Countess of Somerive, and make an auto da fe for her own good and the relief of an oppressed public. STEPHANOTIS.

Nellie Crocker.

SACRAMENTO, February 1, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—We have told you of gaieties and gossips without stint. We wonder, were we to tell you of a sadder tale, if you would read with as much eagerness as you have of the balls and hirths and brawls in our city. 'Tis so natural for humanity to turn from the piteous beggar, that he may not excite our sympathies two hits' worth! 'Tis so human to turn from Sorrow's grieving eyes to Mirth's laughing ones! And shall you, dear friends, turn from this letter of death and mourning to Ganymede's cheering cup, or to Ada Ven's accounts of festivities? Sacramento people, au contraire, flocked to hear the last words of Doctor Dwinell over poor Nellie Crocker to-day. The year is so young and gay and happy! We think we all made the smile between it and her. She was so young—only twenty-two—and led such a happy life, surrounded by wealth and friends! She looked very spirituelle in her coffin of flowers; and it was such a satisfaction to her many friends to look on her sweet face again, even though the gaze brought tears to our eyes for her dead beauty and her lost youth. Real grief is felt all over the city for her death. It is a great, irreparable loss. It is not only her mother and sisters, her relatives and young lover and intimate friends that will miss her, but the hundreds of poor, the public institutions, the eighty-five little orphan children at the asylum—to whom she gave gifts every Christmas—the art circles, the Bric-à-Brac Club, of which she was a prominent member. She gave freely and hountifully of her great wealth, and has done great good that none of us will ever know of. When we saw her in her coffin, so calm and cold, and the hand that had strewn so many blessings along the road lying so still, we thought of Wordsworth's lines:

"The good die young,
And they whose hearts are dry as summer's dust,
Burn to the very socket!"

The evil often live in triumph and power; the broken-hearted, who would take death as a boon, live on and on; but sweet Nellie Crocker, who would have gone through the world loving and beloved, doing good not moderately, but in excess, lies in our cemetery to-day, and a broken-hearted mother weeps over her, and a lover thinks how long life is.

At one time the public library in Sacramento was in debt, and did not know how to get clear. Miss Crocker presented them with a $1,000 check, and the use of the Art Gallery for entertainments. This is only one instance, but Sacramento people can tell of a dozen more like it. Nearly one hundred carriages followed her to her last home. At the entrance gate the orphan children strewed flowers in front of the hearse. Eighty-five little sorrowing hearts, who know they have lost a benefactor and a friend. And so life goes! The sun is just as bright to-day, the faces seem just as smiling on the streets, if one brave good soul has gone to God, and did leave an empty space in the community and in our hearts. And it will be just the same when we are gone.

BETSY AND I.

PRELUDES—IN DIVERS KEYS.

"The world's greatest violinist," who began by announcing his performances as the first evening instrumental concerts ever given in this city, when it would not be a difficult matter to reckon up at least fifty such within a few seasons; who promised a grand orchestra under Mr. Herold, and then gave a scrub band led by Messrs. Schultz, Schmidt, Vogrich, and Owens (more or less), during the tutti, but whose orchestral accompaniments have been of the rarest; who advertises Bach's "Chaconne" as rarely hitherto attempted in public on account of its "almost insurmountable difficulty," when, in fact, it is in the repertoire of any one of a dozen violinists whom I could name and who play it in public—this really great violinist, who plays the classical things superbly and does not disdain to lend his magnificent Stradivarius to the gallery for "Swanee River," will play at Baldwin's Theatre next week, beginning on Monday night with the Mendelssohn Concerto, which is sure to be a performance that no one should fail to hear. The great violinist has evidently a wrong idea of the country he has come into and the manner in which it is necessary to announce one's self in it, and also seems to have some foolish and ignorant newspaper friends. But he is a great artist, all the same; one whose like we shall not soon hear again.

The California Theatre recitals of Mr. Henry Ketten were terminated rather abruptly by the matinee performance of Wednesday; somewhat unaccountably, as the audiences of Tuesday and Wednesday were quite large, and the interest in Mr. Ketten's playing seemed to grow with each recital. To those who had heard Mr. Ketten during the first week of the Patti season, and formed their opinion of his powers from his performance of the hackneyed programme that had served him during the concert tour, his first recitals at Dashaway Hall proved a genuine surprise; in the concerts we had heard only the player who desired to catch the general public, in the recitals we made the acquaintance of the artist, and—setting aside all questions of a difference of school or methods—I may say that there can be no question that in many respects Mr. Ketten is a really great artist. His performance of Beethoven's great Sonata Op. 53 (the so-called "Waldstein Sonata"), of the Chopin Polonaise in A flat, of the Liszt transcription of Mendelssohn's Wedding March, and of parts of Schumann's Carneval, were masterly; nothing could possibly be finer. Along with an unflinching technical accuracy and beautiful control of his tone, there was a spirit of bravoure that exercised an almost electrical influence; it was the playing that makes an audience enthusiastic, and carries even the critic quite out of sight of his merely objective standpoint—it was great. In so wide a range of music of different styles as that played by Mr. Ketten there will naturally be inequalities; no artist can be expected to do everything equally well. If the Beethoven Sonata in C was a superb performance, that in F minor (the Appassionata) was in some things less satisfactory—especially in the variations of the middle movement; the Chopin Berceuse seemed to want both delicacy and repose; in the pieces of Handel one felt overmuch the modernizing touch of the brilliant concert pianist. The Schumann Romanza (in F sharp), as well as Mendelssohn's Rondo Capriccioso, suffered from what I take to be Mr. Ketten's weakest side, the want of a true legato, especially in cantabile passages. His own things he plays magnificently. And some of them—the "Sérénade Espagnole," "Castagnetti," and the famous "Caprice" I find charming; not great work in any sense, but beautifully made, and very fresh and original.

A more marked contrast than that between the piano-forte style of Mr. Ketten and that of Mr. Vogrich—of the Wilhelmj concert—it would be difficult to find. Mr. Ketten impresses the musician as an exceedingly intelligent artist with a technique made up of specialties which he uses with admirable judgment. In Mr. Vogrich, on the other hand, is to be recognized at once the intellectual musician, who, with a sound, genuine technique that is all-sufficient for musical purposes, subordinates his execution to its legitimate place, secondary to the thing that is to be done with it. He uses it as a means, not as an object and prime factor. His training at the piano-forte is admirable, and as a result his playing makes what I should call a thoroughly healthy impression. One thinks first of the beautiful music, and only on second thought of the beautiful manner in which it was rendered. Or, let me say, he shows us the inner spirit of his composer (always supposing it not to be Liszt); whereas in the case of Mr. Ketten it is after all likely to be this dazzle and glitter of the surface passage that attracts. Those who heard Mr. Vogrich's playing of the Chopin concerto and the Beethoven sonata will understand fully what I mean; it was Chopin and Beethoven, never Vogrich. To know how well he accompanies, one must have watched the delicate appreciation with which he filled in, while he conducted, the bits in the Beethoven violin concerto from the orchestral score. It was a delightful thing to listen to, and a pleasure to see. The single composition of Mr. Vogrich that we have heard inclines me to have great respect for him. Next week we are to hear an overture for orchestra, from which, however, we shall probably get a better idea of his powers.

The Pinafore revival at the Bush Street Theatre is particularly interesting from a musical point of view, as affording us the first opportunity of hearing the solo parts of Sullivan's bright and—to me—charming music thoroughly well sung. I doubt whether there has been a better cast than this one even in the crack performances of Boston and New York, or, indeed, whether there has been one so good. The beautiful voice and excellent method of Miss Montague are more than enough to make amends for the quiet—almost tameness, and yet hardly that—of her acting; and Miss Melville, in accepting the part of "Buttercup," has, so to speak, created it in this city. We have never before either seen or heard the part; in the hands of Miss Melville it is full of character and has its proper musical value. Mr. Toedt sings the music of "Ralph" with the same refined artistic sense and beautiful style that characterized his work during the Patti season, and has only to gain a little more repose of manner to make his performance of the role nearly perfect. Mr. Turner's "Captain" is thoroughly enjoyable in every respect—remarkably well sung and acted, with a good-natured bonhomie that leaves the final dénouement perfectly natural; while Mr. Peakes—whose conception of "Deadeye" seems to me to want humor—makes a really valuable bass part out of what has hitherto been the neglected musical side of the cast.

Mr. Barrows is my ideal "Sir Joseph." I don't think it would be possible to improve on the courtly dignity and refined humor with which he invests the part. The chorus is the weak side of the stage; it is about the worst I ever heard. The orchestra, also, does its work in a most inefficient manner; not because it has not plenty of excellent material in it, but because it is in the hands of a conductor who seems to be utterly out of place at its head. I never saw such a mess as he makes of the most simple rhythms and hits of accompaniments, and throughout the performance found myself in constant terror lest the whole thing should go to pieces over some trifling rallentando or change of tempo. I pity a chorus and orchestra under such an uncertain and timid baton. The solo artists can take care of themselves, but chorus and orchestra are obliged to grope about in the dark and get into all sorts of trouble, for which they get all the blame, when they are not in the least at fault. O. W.

Teas and Kettledrums.

Society is agitated. An important social question is being considered, viz., What is the difference between a kettledrum and a tea? We know—at a kettledrum there are music and dancing; at a tea there are peanuts and conversation, and the guests bring their own peanuts. The kettledrum comes from the army, where they have plenty of music and very little to eat. At a tea there are tea and coffee, confectionery, lady-fingers, and sliced lemon; at a kettledrum there are sliced lemon, lady-fingers, confectionery, coffee, and tea. A tea is served from 3 to 6, or from 4 to 7 P. M.; a kettledrum from 4 to 7, or from 3 to 6. At a kettledrum ladies wear their best bonnets and their street dresses; at a tea their street dresses and their best bonnets. At a tea gentlemen dress in frock coats, and carry their hats in their hands; at a kettledrum the gentlemen carry their hats in their hands, and wear frock coats. A tea is economic; a kettledrum is inexpensive. Mrs. Sillem gave a kettledrum; it cost two dollars and fifty cents. Mrs. Pixley gave a tea at an expense of two dollars and a half. Mrs. Ben. Brooks gave a tea. Mrs. Boardman gave a kettledrum. Mrs. Coleman gave a kettledrum. Mrs. Governor Low gave a tea. Some of the ladies gave punch, but it was tea punch, and not strong enough to either cheer or inebriate. The punch is cold; sometimes the tea is also cold. The punch is weak; the coffee is also sometimes weak. Teas and kettledrums are inexpensive; they afford an opportunity for wearing dresses that have been worn before, and gloves that have been rubbed up with bread-crumbs. At kettledrums and teas swell honnets of the latest Parisian fashion are in demand. The principal attraction of teas and kettledrums is that they afford ladies an opportunity to return their calls without making them, thus striking a balance to their social bookkeeping without the bother of making the rounds. Mrs. Senator Gwinn also gave a kettledrum last week, and between kettledrums and teas every evening is occupied until Lent, and by that time we presume the fashionable fever will be over. Delightful and pleasant and sensible things are these inexpensive and informal gatherings. One of our society ladies made an innovation in the somewhat dreary monotony of teas and kettledrums by securing four pretty waiter girls dressed in costume, a Swiss, a gypsy, a quaker, and a Spanish girl, each prettier than the others.

Many of our best people have opened their houses to these informal and inexpensive entertainments. We are glad to observe this social feature, and to note in it an endeavor to get rid of the idea that social gatherings must be formal, dressy and ruinously expensive. The few grand and costly entertainments that are given by millionaires and men of colossal wealth have had a tendency to discourage all less pretentious social endeavors, and the consequence has been that many families who would take pleasure in moderate hospitalities have been discouraged and their drawing rooms remain closed throughout the season.

The Midnight Cat.
O ye feline brutes, erotic!
Is there not some strong narcotic,
Some refined and rare hypnotic,
Some potent spell,
Soothing catnip, helleborus,
Anything to soothe the chorus
Of your piercing, wild, sonorous,
Nocturnal yell?

Oh, for catapults to snite ye!
Oh, let catalepsy blight ye,
And catastrophes invite ye,
Cataclysmal!
Cataracts be on ye falling!
Curse, concatenate, appalling,
Stop your ghoulis catterwauling,
Paroxysmal!

Gone Before.

Full many a colic-cramp and mortal throe
The dark, unfathomed depths of mince-meat bear;
Full many a soul the candy, white as snow,
Has hastened heavenward up the golden stair.

Take Him Back.

Oh, take me back to memory's isles,
In a silken-sailed canoe.
Oh, let some widow's pleasant smiles
Just thrill me through and through.

The Widow Aforesaid.

I recollect, with heartfelt glee,
One pleasant starry night;
Full many dainty rings had she
And an awful appetite.

The correspondent of the Alta who writes concerning what he considers the unjust treatment of Wilhelm by some local critics, asserts that one of their number offered himself as a business manager to the violinist, and, being refused the position, declared that Wilhelm should suffer for it through the press. The Alta, in publishing the article and in preferring such a grave charge against some one unnamed, imputes a dishonorable action to the whole corps of critics. If there is any truth in the statement it should not be couched in the form of an anonymous insinuation, but the name of the transgressor should be given.—Chronicle.

If the Alta man can not give the name of the critic, perhaps he will have the penitence to disclose his own.

At Platt's Hall, next Tuesday evening, that very excellent institution and wise charity, the Old People's Home of San Francisco, will take a benefit. The home, at present located on Francisco Street, between Stockton and Powell, consists of two old buildings, until recently in ill repair, and without such modern conveniences as seem to be necessary for the proper conduct of an institution. To make these buildings weather-proof and comfortable a debt has been incurred by the society in charge of the home. It is to liquidate this debt that the "Grand Concert" of next Tuesday evening will be given. The following musical ladies and gentlemen have volunteered: Mrs. Blake Alversen, Miss Ida Mohrig, Professor W. Toepke, Professor Moeser, Mr. Edgar E. Coursen, and Mr. Benjamin Owen. Governor George C. Perkins will deliver an address.

All your own fault if you remain sick or out of health when you can get Hop Bitters. No disease or ill-health can possibly long exist where these Bitters are used, so varied and perfect are their operations.

EXTRACT.—For persons suffering from exhaustion of the powers of the brain and nervous system, from long and continued study or teaching, or in those cases of exhaustion from which so many young men suffer, I know of no better medicine for restoration to health than Fellows' Compound Syrup of Hypophosphites.

AN INCIDENTAL ACCIDENT.

A Story Told in 1881.

Mr. Edward Ellis, in lieu of more critical companionship, talked sometimes to himself, maintaining always the pleasantest understanding with his audience of one; for talking to one's self is generally delightful, and the young man talked almost as well as he listened, which was very well indeed. But the habit has disadvantages which sometimes outweigh its fascinations—always, if one see through the untinted spectacles of common sense. It is at least clear that one ought to think twice before talking to one's self in the near neighborhood of an open window.

Mr. Edward Ellis was one of those unfortunates who had never learned to smoke. With a cigar and its attendant mental fog-banks he might have meditated in judicious silence, and this truthful chronicle would have been a vain imagining.

But he did not smoke and he did meditate, an incongruity of happenings which made it better he had never been horn, so crushingly fell the aftermath of punishment he had piled with careless and unskillful hands high above his hapless head.

The locality was Martinez, the situation the monster hotel with which the lavish enterprise of the great railroad triumvirate has embellished one of the loveliest of watering-places. The season was the early summer of 1880, the hour ten by the moon-lit dial in the ghostly tower of the Methodist church.

The big hostelry was well nigh deserted. Most of the boarders had gone on a moonlight excursion up the river. Two or three ambitious sportsmen had gone fiercely into the foothills in quest of a mythical bruin. Mr. Edward Ellis, two young ladies, and one or two drowsy old couples made up the party within the hotel. Strictly speaking, there was no party; for the drowsy oldsters had gone to bed, and Miss Clara Hearst lay on a sofa in her bedroom, nursing a genuine sick headache with the assistance of her friend, Miss Frances Haywards; while out on the broad piazza, within easy earshot, Mr. Edward Ellis, in a tilted chair, was babbling to himself and about his own affairs, as the pleasantest amusement his isolation made possible.

The young man, though talking to himself, talked in a tone sufficiently audible to be heard by the young ladies in the silent room a few steps distant; and the turn which the talking came to take was of a sort to compel them to listen—in response to that instinct of self-defense which puts every woman on her guard the instant she hears the sound of her own name.

But it was the very quintessence of misfortune that both young ladies should have overheard Edward's vagrant monologue. Had only one of them been a listener the outcome might have been relief from a palpable embarrassment, and the sequel might have been as charming as the two pretty women who made it possible.

Less than a year before, Edward Ellis had met Miss Hearst in that mausoleum of infinite acquaintanceship—the Authors' Carnival. He had thought her charming, and she had met his effort to be friendly at the half-way mile-stone of perfect breeding and careless amiability. He had met Miss Haywards less than a month before he met Miss Hearst, and had thought Frank charming also. And there was very little doubt that she liked him quite as well as did Clara—a mutual arrangement which might ripen into high regard, or wither on the branches like forgotten fruit.

If Ellis possessed even a single talent his lavish capacity for appropriating good fellowship was that talent, and the iron limitations of time and opportunity, and they alone, prevented the degeneracy of his appetite for friendship into omnivorous liking. The high gods had not given him either bewildering brains or dazzling good looks. He had the fatal faculty of appreciating verbal nicety, and placed all too high a value upon the artistic setting of intellectual paste. But his almost inexhaustible fund of good nature—about little things—and his somewhat purblind devotion to the people he liked, made him perhaps too universally tolerated for his best good. He had a sort of mania for making "nice people" acquainted, a generally harmless yet occasionally dangerous mania, in pursuance of which he was not content until Clara and Frank had met and liked each other. Fortunately they did like each other, and soon became "sworn friends," with a broader substratum of mutual esteem than the friendship of women commonly rests upon.

Clara's father was rich enough to give her all the luxury she cared for, and wise enough to have taught her the higher value of something better. Frances was a penniless half-orphan, whose family affairs were under the darkest of financial clouds, and it became a genuine pleasure for Clara to be kind to her friend in the way of invitations and society arrangements, which Frank could not but see were perfectly genuine, and which she had too much good sense to refuse. So it came about that Frank was Clara's guest at the Martinez Hotel; and as Edward Ellis happened to be spending a vacation there at the same time, he saw a good deal of both of them, and they of him, which left the honors by no means easy.

Mr. Ellis was not a vain man. So much belongs fairly to his credit. But he was the most plastic of wax to agreeable impressions. He had not met before—at the same time—two such delightful, two such gracious girls; and it found him unprepared for the emergency. No sooner, indeed, had these two pretty women come simultaneously within the continuous focus of his critical loggnette than he became perplexed to know which he liked the better, and—like Byron before him—ended by persuading himself that he loved them both.

It was the balmiest of summer evenings, and the young man's thoughts were as pleasant as the night. So pleasant were they that silent thinking could not half express them, and he began a most interesting conversation with himself, quite oblivious to the danger of being overheard.

It was easy enough for the young ladies to listen unthinkingly to the prelude of such a confession. It was impossible not to listen after the first few moments. And so, for almost an hour, the two women sat listening to poor Ned's heedless babbling, which came to them through the resonant stillness of the ludicrous surface seeming of a half-discovered secret, leaving behind it all the latent pathos which lurks in the very essence of human mistake, and would make us all more charitable had we clearer vision and less dross-dulled sensibility.

What Mr. Edward Ellis said to himself that evening, and its effect upon his listeners, is best told by the following letter, which a bell-boy delivered to the young gentleman about an hour after he had retired to his apartment:

MARTINEZ HOTEL, Room 180, 18th June, 1880.

DEAR MR. ELLIS:—We are desolated to realize that "crucial circumstance" prevents you from "marrying both" of us, and our unhappiness attains a climax in realizing how the late Congressional stand against Mormonism forbids the hope that the beneficent system of the lamented Brigham may be extended to California. But we are such good friends that neither of us can bear to think of appropriating your numerous husbandly excellences to the deprivation of the other; and as, therefore, we have resolved never to marry, we think it will be kindest for you to go away for a while—say a century.

Yours, devotedly,

CLARA and FRANK.

When Mr. Edward Ellis did not appear to greet the river excursionists at breakfast, there was a ripple of surprise on the surface of the matin chitchat; but about the eyes of Miss Clara Hearst there were no traces of sick headache, and the dimples around Miss Hayward's adorable mouth betrayed neither merriment nor wonder.

ALFRED HARDIE.

SAN FRANCISCO, January, 1880.

Operatic Reminiscence—Alboni and Others.

It was in the old Jenny Lind times that a real American tenor appeared—so real that Bajoli, the then great singing master of New York, and who, I believe, introduced Italian opera into the United States, took special pains with the development of this extraordinary voice. The tenor sang with Jenny Lind; and for the most of his short but brilliant career supported Alboni, in her operatic company.

We all know what Cary is; but even Cary never reached the height (or depth) of Alboni, who was as exceptional among contralti as Jenny Lind among soprani. Cary is not a fairy, but it would take two of her to compass what Alboni was, physically, and the wits of the time did their best (or worst) with the incongruity of her name. Of all the foreign tenors at her command, she chose this American, with the honest but not euphonious name of Snyder. He sang through one or more seasons under the more romantic cognomen of "Ashton"; then some climatic exposures—chiefly that of Boston—closed his career so abruptly that America had scarcely time to recognize her prize. If you step into the Oakland Free Library you will meet the once famous tenor in the shade of the gentlemanly janitor. Years of sickness, and therefore poverty, have left their marks. The office of janitor of such an institution is as honorable as the position of an idolized tenor; but it is not so brilliant, and the emoluments must be of a painfully contrasted nature.

It was some thirty years ago that New Yorkers did not fail to notice a black-eyed, coquettish little Italian girl, of the age of six or so, a faithful attendant upon the various concerts, who eagerly drank in every note, and who has since made all Europe eager to drink from her lips. How different her married fate from Jenny Lind's. Alas! poor Adelina Patti!

It was in the year 1853 that the silver-voiced Mario was in his prime—a wretched actor, though associated with Grisi. Salvi was another of the world's tenors flourishing then, and Roger was the star of the French opera house, for Rubini had disappeared. Ronconi was considered the chief baritone, but to my ear Saintley, the Englishman, excelled him. In that year The Huguenots was brought out at Covent Garden, and what a marvel of an orchestra Sir Michael Costa led! If my memory serves me right, there were thirty violins in that orchestra; what amount of brass and wood and parchment I can not tell; but they could "roar you gently as a sucking dove."

In the cast of the opera was a wonderful bass—not so finished a singer, they told me, as Lablache, but with even a greater volume of voice. It was as if two or three ordinary bass voices were rolled into one. His conversational tones seemed to shake the walls of a private dwelling, and one might easily fear that if he struck the key-note it would really bring down the house. Such was Carl Formes in 1853. Doubtless the walls of his San Franciscan home are safe enough from that embodied thunder.

BERKELEY, February, 1880.

JOHN MURRAY.

Henry Ward Beecher says, with a deal of truth: "In every age money has been a disturbing force. It stimulates the passions and vanity; it furnishes the power which pride loves. It fascinates the intellect, because it opens the way to culture and the possibility of self-development without the necessity of caring for one's bodily wants in the meanwhile. Men are very apt to despise the money they haven't got, but I never yet knew any one who had it to despise it. Where would religion be without money? Where would be the ships to convey our missionaries, the presses to print our religious journals? Where would we get our churches and our schools and our colleges? To deride and scoff at money is absurd, insincere, and positively harmful. In our own days the temptations which have always beset humanity are multiplied. The crops of crime are enormous, so enormous that no statistical tables are ever prepared. Men are dropping like untimely figs from the boughs of prosperity, and falling into every crime of sharp genius and fertile thievery. Dealing in stocks is perfectly legitimate business where the stock represents actual property, but where gambling goes on it is robbery. Lotteries bait their victims by telling them that they may get something for nothing. Yet how can we fight against lotteries when our churches and cathedrals, our church fairs and regimental fairs, resort to them as a means of obtaining money? I say that no man has a right to take that for which he does not render an equivalent."

Only philosophers who know the unknowable may fairly answer the unanswerable. Mr. Pickering was recently asked the value in United States money of "a draft for over one hundred pounds sterling." Mr. Pickering answered gravely: "It is a simple proposition," and then gave the answer in dollars and cents. If Mr. Pickering were any one else, it might be objected to that he should play fast and loose with the English language and arithmetic; but Mr. Pickering is a law unto himself.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Home and Foreign Blockheads Cheek by Jowl.

A Leap-Year Monody.

Ah me! ah me! I am lonely,
With sorrow my bosom is tossed—
In the hands of my sable laundress
My shirt all its buttons has lost.

With grief is my spirit bowed down,
With grief that can not be repressed—
'Tis Saturday night, and the tailor
Hasn't finished my new Sunday vest.

My cheek is moistened with tear-drops,
My heart heavy-laden and sad—
My coat is deucedly seedy,
And my "beaver" is shockingly bad.

While friends are joyous around me,
In silence and sadness I mourn—
There are holes in both ends of my socks,
And my trousers are hopelessly torn.

But by far my bitterest grief—
The bane of my comfortless life—
The most unendurable want
Is the want—the want of a wife.

A wife to enliven my home,
To lighten my sorrow and care,
To button my shirt at the top,
And to keep my clothes in repair.

But alas! 'tis fruitless to wish,
No children will e'er call me 'Pa,'
I never was handsome at best,
But now I'm too ugly by far.

Lone must I travel life's journey—
To Fate's stern decree I must bend,
Till death must I darn my own socks
And my own inexpressibles mend.

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

Lines

Respectfully dedicated to the winner of the late pedestrian contest at Sacramento.

"The man in the moon is looking,"
Said the saw-horse to his mate,
"And the sad-eyed stars are cooking
The goose of the bleary-eyed fate.

O love of my life! remember
That our board bill's overdue;
We were bought in the bleak December,
And the dun is coming to sue."

But his shy love made him answer,
As she leaned on the five-barred gate:
"A fig for a cowardly man, sir!
Do you love your Nancy Kate?

Then catch the dun by his collar,
And fling him up to the stars,
And serenely we'll hear him 'holler'
A stave of a thousand bars."

"Oh, hush!" said her long-limbed lover,
"One would think in hearing you bray
That a milk-jug minus the cover
Were a drunk on New Year's day."

Morning and Evening.

THIS WAS THE CAT,
With arching back,
At close of day,
It held its track,
The narrow way,
And as it trod the steep roof's edge beneath
In mocking tones it sang, "'Tis eve, 'tis eve!
'Tis ee-he-he-he-he-he-he-hee—
Hee—h—eeve!"

AND THIS WAS THE MAN.

With aching head,
With patience lost,
On sleepless bed,
He rolled and tossed;
And while he lists to Tompkins' mellow horn,
He sings in woeful strains, "'Tis morn, 'tis morn!
'Tis mo-ho-ho-ho-ho-ho-ho-ho-ho—
Ho! ho! Ab—Mourn!"

AND THIS IS THE PAIR OF THEM.

So all night long
From twilight gray,
They sing their song
Till break of day;
And 'tis a fact you'd scarcely believe,
'Tis morn below while yet above 'tis eve,
'Tis morn, 'tis eve, 'tis morn, 'tis eve, 'tis eve,
'Tis m-o-o-u-u-m! At eve!!

Perhaps.

Mr. Bob Burdette has been indulging himself at the expense of a printer friend by writing the following advice:

"DEAR JIM:—

If you have a friend and you love him well,
Let my advice through your actions glimmer;
Publish his faults in nonpareil,
But print his virtues in big long primer."

It is to be hoped that "Dear Jim" will reverse the use advised, and put in as many "display heads" as the exigencies of God-given truth may demand.

Boston has a new club, the "Saint Botolph," of which Francis Parkman has been chosen president. The club may have its "ladies' day," but it is unlikely that many "suffragists" will attend until some one else becomes president.

A wicked witling writes to an Eastern paper: "Chicago is now nowhere. Six hundred and forty-six divorces were granted in San Francisco last year. As God joins nothing together in Frisco, a putting asunder of things is quite correct."

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

We do not propose to be cynical, nor to write anything to hurt the feelings of those fond papas and foolish mammas who think their children marvelous prodigies of beauty and deportment; but when it comes to a column of description of half a hundred nursery children having a "grand ball" at a public hotel, it makes us feel qualms of the stomach. It is absurd enough that "good society" so delights to see the names and dresses, the silks and shams of older people paraded in the columns of a public journal, descriptions in which houses are styled "residences" and "mansions" and "palatial mansions," and the clever enough old gentleman who grudgingly pays the bills is styled "generous host," and the good-natured mother of the family is designated as the "superb," "queenly," and "magnificent," and her dress as "blazing in jewels," and everybody present described as "elegant," "accomplished," "beautiful," "graceful," "gorgeous," "splendid," "charming," "lovely," etc., till all the grandiloquent adjectives and superb adverbs are entirely exhausted. The feed is called a "banquet," and the fiddler an "artist." One description serves for all. The last "shindy" is "the party of the season." All this we can stand—we are compelled to stand it; everybody likes it. Some pretend they do not like to see their names in this connection—do not like to see themselves paraded in the newspapers. Ladies, with an hypocrisy that is as transparent as the enamel on another lady's face, affect to be annoyed if their dresses are described. They are a great deal more annoyed if they are not noticed, and we know one case where a lady went into a confection fit and had spasms because her splendid "point" lace was described as "Spanish." The female that does not like to have herself mentioned as "beautiful" and her dress as "lovely" is over seventy years of age, and has the rheumatism. She is an old maid who was jilted more than half a century ago by a man who was afterward hanged. When any female undertakes to tell us right down seriously that she objects to being pleasantly noticed in a respectable journal as "young," "lovely," and "well-dressed," or as having given an "elegant and successful entertainment," we always draw our handkerchief and blow our nose, to hide our blushes for the fib that she knows we know she is telling.

But let us come back to the Palace Hotel. That is another affair. Nursery trash—pinafores—bread-and-butter—little noses that want wiping—little fingers covered with candy—young "ladies" from "four to twelve" years old—"votaries of fashion," "graces of young womanhood," "gallant deportment," "dignity," and "stateliness"! The dresses of the little ones, says the Mrs. Jenkins who was detailed to "write up" the affair, were "elegant and costly." And then mark the names: "Emilie," "Flora," "Mamie," "Etta," "Jennie," "Pearl," "Lena," "Tessie," "Nettie," "Nellie," "Tudie," "Gussie," "Susie," "Lulu," "Eva," "Carrie," and a score of others. Not a good, square, old-fashioned, honest name in all the lot—baby names with their little diminutives—not a single Hannah, or Mehitabel, or Susan Jane, or Jemimah, or Mary Ann, or Jerusha; not an Elizabeth, or Susan, or Nancy, or Fanny; not one of those splendid old English names like Margaret, Maud, Blanche, Genevieve, Rosalind; not a name that Shakespeare has made immortal; not a Bible name like honest Martha; and even the beautiful name, the name of names, Mary, the mother of God, is blasphemed into the pet and meaningless diminutive of "Mamie"! There ought to be a law to compel foolish, romance-reading, fashionable mothers to give honest names to their children. We have told the story before; it will bear repeating. Mrs. Rose named her young daughter "Wilde." It was so pretty, so romantic—"Wilde Rose"! But when the young lady grew up and married a young butcher with the appropriate name of Bull, the lady was metamorphosed into "Madame Wilde Bull." And now let us quote from Mrs. Jenkins a description of some of these babies' frocks. "Check aprons?" "Red flannel petticoats?" "Oiled bib and tuckers?" "Diapers of white dimity?" Not at all. Miss "Emilie," a "pretty little demi-brunette, richly dressed in white satin, princess cut, high in the neck, and elbow sleeves; satin drapery, fringe of chenille; festoons of pearls, silk hose, and white satin sandals." "Flora," a "white satin dress; princess cut, Nile green overdress, trimmed with ostrich feathers; Valenciennes lace sleeves." "Etta," a "pale blue gros-grain silk." "Pearl," an "underskirt of pink silk, with an overslip of Swiss and fine lace." "Lena," "with basque-panniers and fine point lace." "Tessie," in "rose-colored silk, with an overdress of rich white lace, and delicate moss-rose buds." "Nettie," with "an imported French costume." And so on through a whole column of "pale blue gauze," "gold ribbons," "crêpe-lisse," "flowers," "jewels," "grasses," etc. And then, we suppose, their little stomachs were filled from the "sumptuous banquet," with lollipop, cakes, ice-cream, and candy, and that they all had the stomach-ache the next day. If this thing had occurred in Sparta these children would have been taken away from their parents, and educated at the expense of the State. We call attention to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and demand that Judge Hager, Senator Cole, Irwin Scott, James G. Fair, Judge Filkins, the father of Pearl Pixley, and these other unnatural parents, be brought before Judge Rix and dealt with according to law.

We hope the day will never come in the dark and gloomy future when any one of these now innocent and beautiful children will look back in remembrance of this to them fairy scene, and be compelled to contrast it with cold, hateful poverty. We hope that for each and every one of them there may be a bright and gorgeous sunset to their evening of life; that from the arms of fond and loving, wealthy and indulgent parents they may go to the arms of loving, honorable, wealthy, and indulgent husbands, to be in turn the mothers of a race of noble men and virtuous women. But will it be? Will not the wolf show his gleaming teeth to more than one of these bright and petted darlings? Will not the storm of adversity overtake more than one, and find them shelterless? We hope not. But we are old-fashioned enough to think this modern and fashionable way in which wealthy society people are bringing up their boys and girls is a mistake—we will use a stronger term, a "crime." It is not the way the parents themselves were brought up. There is not one rich man in San Francisco to-day who inherited his fortune. We do not know of one that did not come from either the very poor, or, at least, the middle class of society. We know of no exception among our men of great wealth and great success who, as a boy and young man, was not compelled to labor, and it is our judgment that in this form of government, with the possibilities as we see them opening up, the education that does not teach the sons of our wealthy people the value of money—that does not arm them with a knowledge of labor—that does not teach them the value of their inherited wealth—will be to them a misfortune. There are among our rich men some who have the sense to appreciate this, and their boys are being taught the healthful lessons of industry; they will take their father's wealth with some appreciation of what it cost him; and those who are not taught this lesson, or who will not heed it, will find their inheritance a curse and a misfortune to them. Few of the very great fortunes of America have escaped distribution by the second generation, and none have survived the fourth. Of the moderate fortunes most are squandered or lost by those who inherit them. As a rule, the descendants of rich men are neither prosperous nor provident. As a rule, it is a misfortune to inherit wealth. Nearly all the grand "swell" weddings, the weddings in "high life" that have occurred in San Francisco have proved unfortunate. The social beach is covered with domestic wrecks, and we are, as a society, less than thirty years old. The same is true all over our country, and so these fashionable mothers will excuse us if we do not gush over their giving grand balls and grand banquets to the children of their nurseries. They will please excuse and forgive us if we take the liberty to plainly say to them that in our judgment it would have been better to send their babies to bed at about eight o'clock on the evening of February 6th, and also to remark that if a "grand ball" and a "grand banquet" were indispensable to their children's happiness, it would have been in better taste to have kept its description out of the newspapers.

One day, some two years ago, when our lady friends were giving dinners to the idle bums who prefer to beg rather than work, and to go without gin rather than toil, the writer witnessed the following scene: It was on Jackson Street. Four stalwart and hearty tramps had filled themselves to repletion; they came out from the dinner, picking their teeth with contented satisfaction. They were happy; they were full: they had neither toiled nor spun—and yet Solomon had never so gorged himself in his most glorious days. "Give us your tobacco," said Van to Mac, "let's have a smoke." A broad plug of black navy was drawn from the pockets of one, a jackknife came forth, smoke-stained duds came out from their hiding-places, and each between his greasy palms ground the hard plug to fine cut for a smoke. "I say, Pat, this is better than working in the tules for a dollar a day and grub." "You bet, old fel, and thanks to Dennis; he has made the aristocrats come out with their grub, bad luck to them." For half an hour the writer listened to these vagabond tramps as they exchanged comments. Denis Kearney had been to them a veritable Providence. He had so frightened society that it fed them. He had so lied and agitated that these criminals were for a time enabled to eat the bread of idleness. This game is to be played again, and this time it is the Mayor of San Francisco that advises the gin-drinking, beer-guzzling, idle, vicious mob to agitate. "Labor or Bread" is the cry. It means "gin without labor and beer without toil." The able-bodied, healthy man or woman does not live in California that can not by toil secure a maintenance in comfort—can not be independent, and in time become rich. There is not a man or woman in health to-day in California suffering poverty that has not committed some mistake that accounts for their present condition. Men grow old, and sick, and poor—for them all have sympathy—but for the young, healthy, able-bodied male mendicant we have no sympathy, no alms. We advise them to commit suicide, and whenever they get heart and courage enough to rid the world of their useless existence we will give them money for rope, poison, or gunpowder.

A young gentleman of whom the writer inquired what he was doing, and how he was getting on, said he was "looking for employment." "Where?" "I hope to get into the County Clerk's Office for two or three months; can you help me?" "No; I can not help you if I would, and would not if

I could." He was surprised and offended. The writer added: "If I had your wealth I would disdain a clerkship." "My wealth?" he replied. "Your wealth, yes, your wealth—your youth, your health, your six feet of stature, your broad shoulders. I would become no man's slave." "What can I do?" he asked. "This: your mother has three hundred acres of mountain land—every foot good for grapes—go to the country, sleep under the fence, steal vine cuttings, plant and dig about them—live on potatoes and salt—in one year you will have grapes to eat with your potatoes, in two years wine. In three years you can sell your clusters, in four years buy casks, in five years build a cellar—in ten years you will be independent, in twenty years rich." The men who are shaking shot to rinse bottles in our wine cellars will in time own vineyards—they will be the rich men, the men of estates, the country gentry, the aristocracy, when everybody in the County Clerk's Office, or who hangs upon office by the eyelids, will be a pauper, a genteel good-for-nothing, a worthless old political "bum." Wine, brandy, and raisins will make any industrious man rich. Land is cheap. It can be bought on credit, and the time is not distant when the vine in California will beat gold and grain—when it will beat the cotton crop of America—and the young healthy man who does not see this splendid opportunity of a fortune deserves to be caught by the poundmaster, and drowned as an idle and worthless dog. The young men of San Francisco are an idle, good-for-nothing, cigarette-smoking lot of vagabonds. They lack enterprise, sense, ambition, and courage. They are growing up as vagrants. We have no sympathy with them. The young man that lives upon his father, and looks to inheritance, lacks both pride and courage. The young man that would be a mere clerk, or a bookkeeper, or take a position in the Custom House, Mint, or County Clerk's Office—that would take a place as a hireling in any man's service so long as the country is open to him, with its fields, forests, and mines—deserves to marry some slouch of a girl for a wife, and be cursed with children that he can not maintain, and that will grow up to be as dependent on him as he is on his father.

There are mountains of anthracite coal in New Mexico, and not far from the line of the Southern Pacific Railroad, better in quality than that of Pennsylvania. There are mountains of iron ores in California, making better iron than that of Sweden. England's greatness and wealth are largely attributable to the fact that, having abundant coal and iron, it became the workshop of the world. These facts suggest the importance of our new Southern Pacific Railroad. The Territorial Enterprise says of this road:

"It has been evident for a long time that the ultimate hopes of the Central Pacific people are centered in the Southern Pacific road. They have kept from that road the burden of a bonded debt; it traverses the richest portion of California; it is built mostly on easy grades and below any serious snow-belt, and will, from San Francisco, connect with the Gulf at Galveston in just about half the distance that it is by rail between San Francisco and New York. The difference in freight between Galveston and Liverpool and New York and Liverpool is only nominal, while between Galveston and San Francisco and New York and San Francisco the difference for carrying freight would be more than fifty per cent. in favor of the shorter route. This would make Galveston the shipping point for California wheat. Then the Southern road flanks Mexico, and from El Paso south a line of road 600 miles long would connect with a railroad from the capital of Mexico, and would command the trade of all the rich and populous Mexican States. Should the Southern Pacific connect with Scott's road, as it probably will, it would command the bulk of the through travel for nine months of the year. Any one can see that it is one of the grandest enterprises of modern times."

We think we see the beginning of a genuine and healthy rivalry in transportation matters, if Congress will not interfere and interrupt railroad building by unwise legislation. There has been a falling-out between the transcontinental railroads and the Panama Steamship line that indicates a good time coming for shippers and travelers. Freight is reduced, and passengers may now go or come by steamer between New York and San Francisco for $75, first class; $50, second class, and $35, steerage. By rail—$100, first class; $75, second class; $35, emigrant. The speedy completion of the Southern Pacific Railroad will still further complicate and make more difficult combinations raising freights and fares. When one company owns a continuous railroad between the two oceans, and the stockholders of that company live in California and have their interests here, we shall see the dawning of a new era of prosperity to this coast.

A propos of the existing complications in Ireland, Lord Longford pertinently says: "If all classes or individuals, without waiting for others, would spend on relieving the wants of poorer neighbors, to their own credit, what they now spend on whisky, to their own destruction, it would be less necessary to make frantic appeals to the Government, or 'the landlords,' or public charity. Temperance is its own government, its own landlords, its own Board of Works."

One of our Workingmen's officials, Auditor Dunn, has given new bonds for the faithful performance of his municipal duties—new bonds to keep the peace. He has entered into matrimonial bonds. He can not go to the sand-lot any more on Sundays. He can not attend his "night" at night, and, in becoming a good Christian and he will make Kalloch very much ashamed!

NAY, DO NOT ASK.

Nay, do not ask me, Sweet, if I have loved before,
Or if, mayhap, in other years to be,
A younger, fairer face than thine I know,
I'll love her more than thee.

What should it matter if I've loved before,
So that I love thee now, and love thee best?
What matters it that I should love again
If, first, the daisy-buds blow o'er thy breast?

Love has the waywardness of strange caprice,
One can not chain it to a recreant heart,
Nor, when around the soul its tendrils twine,
Can will the clinging, silken bonds to part.

It is enough, I hold thee prisoned in my arms,
And drink the dewy fragrance of thy breath;
And earth, and heaven, and hades, are forgot,
And love holds carnival, and laughs at death.

Then do not ask me, Sweet, if I have loved before,
Or if some day my heart might turn from thee;
In this brief hour, thou hast my soul of love,
And thou art Is, and Was, and May be—all to me.

SAN JOSE, February, 1880.

MADGE MORRIS.

O, Theuer Bist Du Mir!

Many I love to gaze on or to hear
Carol melodious notes of young delight;
But there is one, with brown eye soft and clear,
Who haunts my thoughts by day, my dreams by night.
And her I love: her face to me is fair
As early dawn; like a translucent veil
It overshades a soul—how pure and bright
And beautiful no features could declare.
Nor yet could any features half conceal.
A gentle spirit is thine, sweet maiden; thine
A timid, fawn-like nature, and we fear
Almost to love thee, lest a wreath we twine
Too heavy for thy gentleness to bear,
As for the gentlest flowers even dew-drops are!

MARYSVILLE, February, 1880.

OMNIUM GATHERUM.

THE STEEPLE OF SAINT PASTOUR.

From the French of E. Pouvillon.

He was a bappy man—unquestionably a very happy man—this M. Tourtarel, the curé of Saint Pastour. Happy! A glance at his honest, priestly figure revealed this fact. From top to toe it presented a rosy hue—his face literally shone with good nature; and he seemed to be, from perpetual laughter, in imminent danger of suffering a collapse. Only priests and children laugh in this manner—a laugh which is fresh and artless—above all, sonorous. It caused the very panes of glass in the vicarage to tremble, and, but for the intervention of the wind, it might have been heard at the other end of the parish.

First, be it known that it was not a large parish. The river and the hillock; the cool, moist earth and the burning sands; the fruitful hemp fields and the barren crops—all these were contained within the mountainous belt of the Brugues, which bounded the horizon. A small territory, but a good cure. Such as it was, M. Tourtarel would not willingly have exchanged it for another, and he was right. Our good Lord Himself, were he to become curé, would not find himself too far from home at Saint Pastour. It would merely be the exchange of one paradise for another. A paradise of flowers and fruit—a home of plenty, so to speak—full to the brim and running over all the year round. One need only stoop to gather up its bounties. M. Tourtarel gathered them without even stooping. The first fruits and the finest—all that appeared to be a little extraordinary in the parish—an early peach, a large pear, the first variety of grapes—all these found their way to the vicarage. M. Tourtarel dined richly royally. One might almost say that the tit-bits sought him out, and took of their own accord the road to his study. Welcome everywhere—did a savory odor ascend from any kitchen in the parish, he was sure to appear, nimbly and at a hurried pace, ready to partake of the good cheer.

One day at the castle, the morrow on the borders—he took with him all fraternity, to the one house or the other, the same appetite, the same good humor. If his palate were more flattered in the one instance, his heart was more contented in the other; for the good man had a fondness for the most humble of his parishioners. And truly, taken all in all, he was thoroughly appreciated.

In the first place, he was not proud; shaking hands with all men, pinching the cheeks of the little ones, always ready to open to any one his snuff-box and his heart—a snuff-box of horn and a heart of gold—the curé of Saint Pastour was truly a priest after the heart of his people.

Peasant himself, the son and grandson of vine-dressers and tillers of the soil—a man with rough hands, a loud voice, and breadth of chest worthy of an athlete—he exercised his function as curé after the same substantial, elevated style in which his ancestors had done their duty as tillers of the soil.

He pruned, hoed, grafted, and plowed the vineyard of our Lord as the Tourtarel, before and after the Revolution, had pruned, hoed, grafted, and plowed their good vineyards of Réalmont in Laugerois. His work finished in season—this was M. Tourtarel's only care. It was God's business, not his, to ripen the bunches, to head the grain, and to gather in the vintage from on high. The good man baptized, married, and buried as the occasion demanded, and afterward soundly slept the sleep of the just.

Above all, he had a way peculiarly his own of dispatching beings into the other world. There was an animation, a gay humor about him, upon such occasions, that would give rise to the supposition that he was about to accompany the departed to the diligence, or whatever might be the conveyance destined to convey them across the boundaries of this mundane sphere. Such was his manner, nor was he ever known to depart from it under the most solemn circumstances; and yet, during a year of mourning, when the typhus fever decimated his parish, he stood firm at his post, calm as the Baptist, nursing the sick, and with his own hands burying the dead.

Moreover, how he was loved—this same priest!—he was a man who lives in clover. At peace with his mayor, in friendship with his patron, spoiled by Miion, his old house-keeper, from whence could care come to him?

It is true, his church was not a handsome one. But in those good old days, our country pastors did not trouble their heads with archaeology. Provided that the Lord's house stood straight and firm upon its basis, was cool and fresh, and furnished with absolute necessities, he did not torment himself as to the rest, leaving in peace architects and masons.

The curé of Saint Pastour was of this school. Gothic or not, his church pleased him, and if it boasted but the suspicion of a belfry, what did it matter, since it answered its purpose? as did also the little bell contained therein, which was clear and sweet, and did its duty alone quite as well as though it had been supported by a whole chime of bells.

Meanwhile, the archaeological fever gained ground; it came nearer and nearer, overturning, demolishing everything upon its route, covering the diocese with old rubbish, replacing it with flaming new monuments of Gothic architecture.

The curé of Saint Pastour was among the last to be infected by the contagion. He continued to resist, even after the churches in the neighborhood of Saint Pastour had assumed, as it were, new skins. Sainte Foi-Pairolère had completed, with a nave of the same style, its beautiful choir-loft and Roman sanctuary: the steeple of Cougournac had lately acquired a spire; the ventilated vestibule of Esparroc had repopulated its niches, which had been for nearly a century void of saints. And finally, thanks to the munificence of his parishioners, the fortunate rector of Gyrtill-le-Roche was able to restore cap-à-pie and inaugurate his church, a true gem of the sixteenth century.

This last ceremony, the account of which filled at least six columns of the Courrier du Bas-Quercy, gave the finishing stroke to the prejudices of the Curé Tourtarel. He returned from this ceremony, his head full of the splendors which he had witnessed, literally stunned with the noise of the fête when, touching the highest point of the Brugues, from whence could be seen, ranged as in a vast semi-circle, the declivity of the hill, the church and land of Saint Pastour, his eyes were opened, and he suddenly became aware of the extent of his error.

What! is not this the same dear little church, a glimpse of whose white walls, as seen through the foliage, has always imbued him with renewed courage and given fresh vigor to his weary footsteps on returning from his parochial visits? Alas, yes! the same, but a rectangular barn, under the most miserable style of organization.

But the vicarage—so bright, so commodious, with its raised terrace and muscat arbor, its neat walks bordered by boxwood?—an ugly building, overrun with lizards, obscured by trees, and surrounded by a horrible little garden. Alas, alas! Well, the surrounding country at all events—the leafy poplars, the fruit-laden orchards, the cool, fresh river meandering through the trees?—a miniature parish, whose perquisites did not amount to one hundred and twenty francs, just sufficient to keep one from dying of starvation. Thus, one way and another, was the enchantment dispelled under which the unfortunate M. Tourtarel had been enthralled.

The church of Gyrtill could not be got out of his head. He saw its spire towering proudly in the air from the walk, where he was in the habit of reciting his breviary; the smoke from his meal ascended in the form of the church; the very embers on the hearth assumed the same outlines. He could not dispel the inopportune vision. Everywhere it followed him: to the conference, to the confessional, to the very altar, where more than once he caught himself dreaming in the middle of an Oremus.

In some way or other he must rid himself of this fantasy. All things considered, M. Tourtarel resolved to build—not an entire edifice; that would cost too much—but a steeple; and it was to be the most simple, the most inexpensive of steeples. If it only overtopped the mountain's crest by so much as a finger, he would be satisfied. As to the ornamentation, a cornice—anything with a weather-vane upon it would answer. Ah! it was absolutely necessary to have the weather-vane.

The plan matured. Nothing now remained but to get the requisite funds. Without further dallying, the Curé Tourtarel donned his Sunday suit and began his rounds.

To the nobles the first honor: he knocked first at the door of the castle. But, at the introductory word, the lords exclaimed aloud at such extravagance.

"Now to the mayor," said M. Tourtarel, repulsed in this quarter.

The mayor, possessor of at least sixteen thousand crowns, received the curé of Saint Pastour standing, training his vines. This mayor was a superb boor—well fed, well clothed, bursting with vanity, while affecting bourgeois simplicity and humility. On terms of familiarity with the landed proprietors, insinuating himself into the confidences of the lower classes, the man had succeeded in obtaining a foothold with both parties; here, chief of the "Sacro-Sainte Ligue des Blouses Bleues," for the expulsion of the "Redingotes Noires"—there, associated with the country people in their war against increased wages; "a wolf in sheep's clothing."

The curé, who felt himself perfectly at ease with him, having known him from a child, stated his business in a few words, and requested his concurrence. The mayor asked time for reflection. A steeple was not a small enterprise, and the community was poor, very poor. That bridge which they had been obliged to build across the Frégire had cost a fortune. The treasury was as dry as the river Gyrtill in September. They would see—they would consider the subject later. M. Tourtarel turned the subject over and discussed it in all its bearings; he could extract from the mayor neither yes nor no. Nor was he more fortunate with Rumat, who happened to be a bitter enemy of the mayor, and his unfortunate opponent in the electoral canvass. He could not pardon the curé his friendly relations with the mayor, and now, the opportunity presenting itself, he made him feel it. Perduquet and Franciman, his nearest neighbors in the parish, received the solicitor with open arms, but opened nothing but their arms. In short, everywhere M. Tourtarel met with the same resistance, the same want of sympathy, whether it were open or disguised. The poor man realized that time and trouble were thrown away in this quest. He lost yet more; for these unfortunate attempts had given rise to discord between the pastor and his flock. Everywhere was he met with constrained looks; words were hesitatingly exchanged. No more chatting upon doorsteps after friendly walks home.

Seeing the curé at a distance was a sign among his people to disappear in the woods, or to apply themselves diligently to their several tasks, thereby appearing not to see him as he passed. The subscription list, that great white paper to which they were expected to affix their names, was the signal for instant flight. Our builder, for want of adequate means, saw his plans about to dissolve in smoke.

The wisest course would undoubtedly have been to have renounced his dream—but tell those who have once mounted a hobby to accommodate themselves to the slow pace of a country nag! M. Tourtarel gloried in his dream. When all else failed him, he would not fail himself. What he had resolved, that would he accomplish; he would build the steeple with his own money, failing other supplies. A rash enterprise! How was this to be brought about with the curé's extremely limited resources?—a parish in which a funeral did not occur once a year! Meantime, he dreamed of it; he racked his brains on the subject; he searched ways and means; retrenchment here, suppressing there, sacrificing his comforts, habits, and tastes. The result of which calculations recalled first to his mind his Thursday dinners, where, from force of long habit, all the brother priests in the environs were wont to meet at Saint Pastour.

These gentlemen were prompt at the rendezvous. Invariably could be seen there the curé of Esparroc, who was as thin as a vine of Quercy, and his colleague of Cougournac, as fat as the fallow land on the river's bank; Saint Papouille-Court and Castel-Viel-le-Long, Sainte Foi, Belpech, Pique-mousse, and all the fraternity.

Ah! the charming afternoons spent there in the dining-room of the vicarage, sitting, in the winter, with their backs to the stove, which emitted a glow of warmth. In the summer they sat with half-closed blinds, and watched, in luxurious idleness, the trembling rays of sunlight as it flickered upon the white cloth. The roast on the table, and a pot of well-brewed ale; or mayhap a pullet stuffed with olives, the clicking of glasses filled to the brim with white wine. "To thy health, Saint Pastour!" "To thine, Cougournac!" It was a habit with these gentlemen to designate one another familiarly by the names of their several parishes. "Here is to the construction of the new steeple, gentlemen!" And thus they laughed and drank, the one not more than the other. They did not yield to melancholy, that is certain. The curé of Cougournac had not his equal for imitating the buzzing of a wasp or the whistling of a carpenter's plane. The curé Castel-Viel sang a song; Ginestru, who was something of a wag, recited his latest distich against the mayor of the Farquettes; and Belpech related, for the hundredth time, "The Journey of Moussu Pitchoulie to the Great Paris Exposition"—a satire aimed at his Holiness.

Poor Saint Papouille nodded his head approvingly and laughed at all that was said, although he was as deaf as a post. Profound calculator—he was speculating as to the repast, which was a main feature of all this conviviality. The above is a sample of Thursday at the vicarage, before the dinners—the real motive of these reunions—were struck by the blow of economy, which was rendered necessary by the new plans of the curé Saint Pastour.

And it was this indulgence at which the first reform was aimed. It was conducted by a series of successive retrenchments, which could not fail eventually to change completely the nature of the repast. First disappeared the delicate entrées. Good-bye to choice game, good-bye to the savory sauces which had been used to simmer slowly on the stove, at the same time exhaling odors to the perdition of souls; no more tempting side-dishes; no more cakes, with ornamentations cunningly devised in the form of lyre or tiara; the superfluities had all disappeared, the novelties, the surprises, all that which had constituted the charm, the cream, as it were, of the feast. Thus despoiled of its charms, simplified and reduced day by day, Thursday's menu began to assume a Lenten aspect. The invited guests were not slow to note this change, nor were they backward in expressing their opinion of the matter, which was delicately done by turning their backs upon the vicarage. Evidently, the curé of Saint Pastour, having turned his attention to economy, had fallen into meanness. While he stormed and lamented, Miion, the curé's old servant, triumphed and rejoiced in her secret soul. Faithful dispenser of her master's goods, she had long seen with a jealous eye the ravages made in the store-room by the unquenchable appetites of Thursday's guests. Thus she entered heartily into the new views of her master, without in the least comprehending their import. With ironic grace and hypocritical solemnity, she pompously brought and uncovered, in the presence of the disappointed guests, the most commonplace dishes. That the diminishing menu did not altogether fail was somewhat surprising. It had now reached the Pythagorean nourishment of our peasantry—garlic sauces, and slices of salt pork dipped in thin wine.

One after another the guests deserted, made their excuses, and left to return no more. Some few, however, made a noble resistance—the poorest of them, and those best supplied with teeth. God knows the number of affronts and unpalatable dishes they swallowed before beating a retreat! Which revolted first, their stomachs or pride, and how—by what whimsical bills of fare—Miion succeeded in vanquishing the enemy, history does not say, nor is it important that we should know.

"Luck be with you," said the servant, when for the first time they had turned on their heel.

Now Miion was happy; freed henceforth from interruptions, she would resume the old lôte-à-lôte with her master in the peaceful, quiet vicarage. She would again resume the routine of regular and established habits, would take up again the thread of broken days, and last, but not least, she would now practice economy. Upon this chapter they readily understood one another—he and she; but the house-keeper soon discovered that her master would distance her in the race. But M. Tourtarel had made his calculations; so much a year, so much a day—to a centime had his expenses been regulated. If properly invested it would not be long before his savings would defray the expense of the steeple.

Economy is a fine virtue. Thanks to some supplementary retrenchments, M. Tourtarel held in his hand the amount requisite for the specified purpose, a year in advance of the period fixed upon by himself. There was nothing to do now but to build. But when the time came for counting out his money, the curé changed his mind. It was too great a sacrifice to dispossess himself immediately of these small coins and blue-veined papers which had been so laboriously amassed. After mature deliberation he concluded to add ten metres to his spire, and to change into a gallery the intended platform. Thus could his established régime be indefinitely prolonged; but why? Habit had become innate. Inflexible toward himself, the heroic M. Tourtarel had sacrificed, one after another, all the superfluities of his life.

Two deprivations, selected from among a thousand others, will give an idea of the reform introduced into the life of the curé of Saint Pastour.

M. Tourtarel denied himself coffee. It is true the poor man had not been able to separate himself from his snuff-box; but it was truly pitiable to see him put his hand mechanically into the empty shell, and take from it a pinch of—nothing. When overtaxed nature was about to give way, or when the demands of habit were too strong for him, the curé comforted himself by contemplating the plan of the steeple, designed and colored by himself according to his small degree of scientific knowledge. With the help of God and this talisman he would continue to walk in the road which he had chosen, although each day it became narrower and rougher.

From the house his zeal extended to the garden, which under his hand now became a source of revenue. The garden border was uprooted, and in place of roses and lilies were planted rows of cabbages and peas. Miion rejoiced in any change by which the kitchen was benefited, only she would have preferred that her master had taken things a little more quietly—not to have pulled quite so hard upon the bit, so to speak.

"Come, come, M. le curé, softly! they say you work by the day. Rest yourself! what you do not accomplish to-day you can finish to-morrow, you or some one else; for there are not wanting good people who will help you if need be, if pushed to extremity."

"And to devour our provisions! No, my girl, as long as I can handle a spade, not one of those idlers shall enter the vicarage."

"You will be obliged to have them here soon to hoe the vines."

"I will myself spade and hoe what I deem necessary, notwithstanding the advice of those who would do better to put their tongues in their pockets."

And in truth, when the season came, those within the neighborhood saw, to their utter amazement, M. Tourtarel, with cassock off, in short breeches, blue stockings, in trim like the most humble of his parishioners, digging his vines.

This fact, so entirely beyond precedent, was kindly commented upon on the first day, and the refrain was echoed by the good tongues throughout the country, and also by the bad—which last were not a few—and it resounded through many succeeding days.

"See," said the former, "how valiant is the priest! how he loves the earth!"

"What a miser! he grudges a day's wages!"

This was the beginning of many such speeches, originally of little import, but which, after undergoing the process of weaving and entangling by the most inveterate gossips of the country, ended by assuming a certain degree of consistency.

Very innocently, it is true, and without a grain of malice, Miion furnished food for all this gossip. She went from door to door, groaning over her trials and tribulations.

"The worst of it is," said she to her neighbor, "he grudges the very food we eat. How can one exist under such an order of things? Why, there are days when I am absolutely weak. In fact, it is almost six months since the spit has been turned in the house."

"Mon Dieu! what herb has your master discovered? He, who had so excellent an appetite in days gone by, and who did not turn away—between you and me—from the good things of earth! Is it true, what was the other day reported, that to save the plums in his garden he picked up the decayed fruit which had fallen on the roadside? He was seen doing it. And Cautaire, the chorister, affirms that he economizes in the communion wine! There has not been a cruet used in fifteen days. Alas! how avarice changes the heart of man!"

"As God wills it, Toinette. However friendly we may be with people, we can not force them to eat. Nevertheless, it is sad to witness what one is powerless to prevent." Thus lamented the old dame.

Economical she certainly was, but not more so than one should be. The injunction, as she understood it, accommodated itself very well to the necessary expenses attendant upon life in a well-conducted vicarage.

Many days and months thus passed before the matter came to open revolt. At first it was but a tacit disapprobation—ungracious, sullen faces, a sort of universal reprobation, which M. Tourtarel met with on all sides. As her master took no heed of all this, Miion was emboldened to a show of resistance. She indulged in sour looks, and finally resorted to deaf rebellion. But this feeble opposition did not serve to change the inflexible resolution of her more powerful adversary. It only served to irritate, and lead him to extreme measures. Thwarted in the execution of his most vigorous plans for reform, exasperated by the wry face and indignant glances of the too faithful servant, he began to look upon her in the light of an enemy, or, what was even worse, as a useless drone. Prepared, as he was, to sacrifice everything to his passion, he still felt ashamed to include in this sacrifice a human being. As the governor of a fortress, before exposing it to the rigors of a famine, sends forth the women and children, so did M. Tourtarel seek a pretext for disembarassing himself of Miion. It was not difficult to light upon one. Too confident in the gratitude of her master, too thoroughly persuaded that he could not live without her, Miion imprudently brought about her own dismissal. It came about in this wise: M. le curé ordered her to sell a pair of chickens.

"Sell chickens!" said she; "and what do you want the world to think of you, M. le curé? A curé turned poultry-vender! You wish, then, to be made the laughing-stock of the country? For my part, I would rather leave than be known as the servant of a miser!"

"Miser! Very well, my girl, pack up your things and leave. I require your services no longer."

Dismissed! Miion could not believe her senses. Waiting for a word, a look, which would wipe out the disgrace, the poor woman loitered over her daily tasks. In vain. M. le curé remained shut up in his chamber; the hours passed and he gave no sign. Evidently all was at an end between them. The compact was ruptured—a compact sealed by twenty years of faithful service and maternal solicitude. She must go. It was time to don her light wrappings, to renew the water and seed in the goldfinch's cage—an old companion in servitude—to breathe a final prayer in the church—a prayer for the ingrate. Now she crosses the threshold—the threshold worn by her footsteps. Heart-broken, almost fainting, she is about to close the door behind her.

M. le curé, meanwhile, was not in a beatific state of mind. At first, blinded by passion, he had rebelled against the accusation hurled at him by his servant.

"Miser!" he muttered, "a miser! I, a priest! If such were the case I would be living in a state of mortal sin."

Trembling with horror, the Abbé Tourtarel scarcely dared to look within himself, to unveil his conscience. Much agitated, he paced his chamber; now with vacillating step, now stamping his foot with an energy sufficient to make the hearth bricks rattle. In this regular pacing to and fro he encountered at each turn an image of Christ, pending from the wall. He raised his eyes to the Divine Judge, as though calling Him to bear witness to his innocence. But the Witness became the Judge. Under the severe looks of his God the Abbé Tourtarel bowed his head. And all at once—under falsehoods suddenly unveiled, under sophisms brought to light—his fault became obvious to him. His false heroism, the mistaken virtues of an anchorite, let fall their mask, and he shuddered at sight of the idol to which he had sacrificed everything. The glory of God, the desire to ornament his temple, were but so many pretexts; self-love, humiliated by the monumental building of the neighboring curés, had alone led him into parsimony; pride had made him fall into avarice, and had thrown him at the feet of the golden calf.

Judged and condemned, the guilty one clasped his hands and fell upon his knees. His resolutions at least were soon formed. Pride had incited him to evil; with the same blow he would strike at pride and avarice. Since his self-love would thereby be so highly gratified, he would not build the steeple. And seeking within himself some good object upon which to expend his money, he recalled to mind La Catinelle, a poor woman, who had come to him the previous day asking alms to renovate her house, which was only kept together by a miracle, and might fall about her ears any day.

"That is the very thing," said he, and quickly turning his eyes, as though fearful that a sight of the money would shake his resolutions, he drew the treasure from the secretary, and called Miion.

The latter, whom we left standing with one foot outside, tremblingly approached, not knowing exactly whether it were better to laugh or to cry.

"Well, my girl, where are you bound, thus dressed in your Sunday clothes, your new bonnet on your head? Have you lost your senses?"

"Since M. le curé dismissed me—"

"Dismissed you! And you believed it, you silly woman. Here, quick, take off your best clothes, then take this bag to La Catinelle; tell her that some one came to me, and charged me to give her this money to rebuild her house. Go, and come right back; it is time for you to prepare supper."

The house of La Catinelle has been rebuilt from garret to cellar. Standing out clearly against the horizon, just beyond the village, with its white pigeon-house rising against the sky, it looks not unlike the church. In the distance can be seen the steeple of Saint Pastour. SALLIE HEATH.

With more than the usual demonstrations displayed on such occasions, she threw both arms about his neck and imprinted several sounding kisses upon his face. The startled old gentleman pushed her gently, and said in a smothered tone, "Some mistake, some mistake." She sprang back like a frightened fawn. "Oh, I thought you were father. You'll excuse me, won't you?" "Certainly," said the old boy, smiling, "but you—you nearly smothered me." She afterward found her papa, but the previous effort had exhausted her, and she merely gave him a cold sort of a meeting-house kiss.

Never wound an ugly woman; and, above all, if an ugly woman comes and says to you, with a side glance, "I know that I am not pretty," do not fall into the trap and reply, "True, madam; but you have moral qualities and domestic virtues which I place above the perishable advantages of beauty." I was eighteen years of age when I made this answer, worthy of Telemachus, to the wife of a banker whose protection I was seeking. The next day the lady said to her husband: "I hope that the young scamp whom you presented to me yesterday is not going to be a frequent visitor here."

Mark Twain has received as a present a cane inscribed, "To S. L. C., from Bob, 1879. Auld Lang Syne." Bob Howland, Mr. Clemens's old "pardner," had the cane made out of the old flag-staff of the cabin in which he and Mark kept house in Nevada.

One of the happiest efforts of a man who seems to have a wealth of such is Garfield's little speech to the Ohio Legislature, wherein he eulogizes his predecessor, Allen G. Thurman. "The sweetest fruits," said Garfield, "are those which hang over the party wall."

The Washington Capital society Saunders writes: "The President's first levee drew a great crowd to the White House. The habit of attending these evening receptions in visiting costume seems each season to grow in favor, and on Tuesday 'full dress' was the exception, not the rule."

"If you was a decent person," remarked a shrill female voice on the railway, "you would shut down that window and not expose me to the draft." "Madam," was the reply, as the window was softly lowered, "I thought from your face that you were forty-five, and therefore out of the draft." And, notwithstanding the fact that this wretch was on the train, the cars did not run off the track or the locomotive burst its boiler.

Two elegantly dressed gentlemen met in Galveston. One of them asks how the other fared this Christmas. "Oh, very well," he replied; "my wife presented me with a beautiful silk dressing-gown." "Of course you reciprocated?" responded the other. "Of course; I always do that. I bought her a new wood-saw. The one she has been using for the last five years was about worn out, and it took so long to get wood for breakfast in the morning that I used to get hungry lying in bed. But that new saw will help matters along, I reckon."

"Have a piece of cold lamb?" asked the hostess, and he took a piece. "Good glory! Lamb! Why this is ten years old, and strong enough to buck a man right out of his chair." Then the wag on the other side of the table calmly remarked: "They call it lamb because it's in its second childhood."

He saw a carpet hanging out
Upon the clothes-line in the rear
Of that fine mansion, and he thought:

He did, and, making no delay,
Adown the alley, in the dusk,
The carpet-bagger tramped away.

HEBE'S PARTING SCREED.

PALACE HOTEL, Wednesday, Feb. 11.

As the reader is aware, I have followed up Miss Lily White faithfully from the commencement to the close of the season. Bless her, dear girl of the period! Her pallid languor is ravishing, to be sure; and after the champagne corks have popped, her glow and sparkle are distracting. Youth and inherited vitality have swung Miss Lily through, and Ash Wednesday brings her rest—wholesome, if irksome; and let us hope that after the penitential Lenten season is over, mountain breezes at Tahoe and the Yosemite, and saline breakers at Santa Cruz and Monterey, in the summer to come, will bring her out another winter as lovely as ever.

Anxious mammas, maiden aunts, and the good protective friends and chaperones generally, are glad that Ash Wednesday is at hand, for Miss Lily White's roses are fading apace, though she does show a becoming flush—a trifle too fixed, perhaps—under the chandeliers, each night. But some "lookers-on in Vienna" shall follow and occasionally exploit Miss Lily White in the Argonaut through her summer campaign; shall recount her triumphs worthily won; shall watch over, defend, and champion her—for is she not the forerunner of the American woman of the future, the mother of those children of manifest destiny, the Californians of 1900? It is possible—as somebody has said of the strawberry—that doubtless God could have made something better; but doubtless God never did. Therefore, Miss Lily, some one shall lightly touch and describe your comings and goings, and when this whirl and dazzle is over, many of us shall rub our misty old eyes, and strive to expound the true significance of your type.

The past season has been prolific of balls, dansantes, masques, teas, receptions, weddings, and kettledrums. Ah, well, the night work is done; the penitential robes must be put on, and the matchless productions of Davidson and Samuel and Worth, so curiously and wonderfully made, covered with folds and ruffles and bows and flowers and laces, and streaked with salads and wines and ices, and other droppings from the midnight board, must be laid aside. Poor dresses! the German has played its part in despoiling you of your airy grace, stripped off your long trains, and left you but a remnant of your former splendor. But you did your part well, and made your wearers look charming; and now you only look like them—worn out; and really you need rest—both.

There has never been a season so gay as the one just passed. Crowds everywhere. How we have been crushed at the Spalding, at the McMullin mansion, down at Belmont, and up on Nob Hill! I guess we have been crushed, all but our spirits, and they nearly deserted us out at the reception given to General Grant by General McDowell. I wonder if those who stay at home really realize how much they are spared? By the way, will the time ever come when parlors will be in proportion to the number of one's friends, or when it will be fashionable to give entertainments in some hall suited to the purpose, and where you can see and be seen, and have the unspeakable comfort of having air to breathe and being able to move without crowding and being crowded and stepped on? Ladies in well-got-up toilets are partial to the promenade—and why shouldn't they be? Isn't it quite natural for people to desire an appreciation of what they devote most of their time and energies to? And when women exhaust their fancies on costumes, and devote their time to perfecting their toilets, one must have no tenderness at all to pass the silk worm by and not make actual demonstration of appreciation.

I repeat, the season just passed has been one of unusual brilliancy in the circles of society, and, as a general thing, all of the receptions and teas and kettledrums have been largely and fashionably attended, and all have been marked by richness and elegance in the toilets of the ladies. Society here, and in all the cities west of the Alleghanies, is too new, too unsettled, and of too transient a character, to be purely aristocratic. But a season like the one just passed will give a stranger, in the shortest possible time and in the best and truest form, the most correct type of California society. Democratic enough for freedom, it is invariably well-tempered and modulated by the æsthetic elements in its leaders. Adieu.

Mardi-Gras at the California.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—When "G" Company presented its compliments to me for Mardi-Gras evening at the California Theatre I accepted, with all a woman's curiosity to witness and participate in a full-dress parade and review of the aristocracy. Moreover, I went early, to sit in one of the front rows and watch the later arrivals—some of them with a little sniff of regret that favor could not crowd them further to the front. And when they all were seated, what a pretty sight it was! A parterre of flowers; a semi-circular bouquet; a shimmer of opera shades, with only two ghastly little white spots 'neath one of the boxes on the left—first cousins to the statuary evidently; and, as a background, the human fringe of males in their sable suits, huddled like so many crows back of the lobby, contemplating, evidently, a flight through the fair forest in the middle distance, but held back by the explicit rules and regulations of "Company G." Here and there in the dress-circle there was a hat or a bonnet to be seen—exceedingly bad taste after the invitation request of "full evening toilets." The tableaux I thought very fair—the conventional thing in the South—but the costumes were not as elegant as some I have seen on similar occasions. In the "unreconstructed" States, where masquerading and this whole Mardi-Gras business are better accomplished than ever they can be here, the participants preserve themselves incogniti from year to year, giving the spice of mystery to the affair. But here all was known, from the identity of the scarlet and scalloped-winged spirit of Mardi-Gras to the unsteady Mercury with the diminutive feet.

And those wire masks were really distressing; so was the minut, as it always is when performed in the corse of the present day, and without the necessary rehearsals. But the march and the coronation of the Queen, Miss Maynard, and the subsequent festivities, left very little to be desired in the way of a delightful entertainment. It was probably the most select and comfortable large reception ever given in the city. Only fifteen hundred invitations were given out, and nearly all were accepted. The theatre afforded ample room and satisfactory seating accommodations for the preliminary programme, while the floored-over parquette and stage made a most commodious ball-room. There were good opportunities to see and be seen, a chance to sit down and chat with one's acquaintances, and a general feeling of freedom and absence of etiquette not experienced in a private residence. Taken altogether, I consider the affair a great success, and, for one, I conscientiously and heartily thank the young military gentlemen for the pleasure their endeavors afforded. It was a graceful and a commendable thing for them to do, a grateful novelty to a Sir George Bridged and kettledrummed community, and a very pretty bit of dissipation for Ash Wednesday's contemplation. I will not attempt to tell you who were there. You have "Lels" and "Mels" and "Ada Ven" and "Ganymede," and they can not all be good Episcopalians. If they are, it is your misfortune, and not the fault of

The Chinese in the Courts.

Every Senator and member of Assembly is pledged, and upon his honor bound, to so legislate upon the Chinese problem that the Chinese shall be discouraged and hindered from seeking residence in large numbers upon our continent. As to the mode of such legislative hindrance they may properly differ, but in adjusting these differences of opinion there should be an absence of personal or party feeling. There should be no demagogism, or acrimony, or blackguardism in debate. All parties are pledged in this direction, and no member of either party will give himself honorable prominence except by an honest and dignified effort to secure the desired result within the law. Hence, when Mr. Conger says he would take any means to drive out the Chinese, he says an imprudent thing.

Mr. Hittell's interrogatory to Mr. Kane was very timely, when he asked "if he would use illegitimate means to drive out the Chinese." The observation of Mr. Chase, that Chinese now here were entitled to the protection of the law, was just and humane. "Is this thing right?" as suggested by Mr. Neumann, is the real point at issue, and comes very properly from a gentleman of foreign birth, although in the opinion of that other person, Mr. Kane, of Dublin, who is not a gentleman, Mr. Neumann has the misfortune to be educated.

To the remark of Mr. Satterwhite, that "if the Chinese did not want to be robbed they had better stay at home," we might reply: "If Mr. Scatterwhite did not wish to make an ass of himself he ought to have kept out of the Senate." Mr. West said truly that it was a backward step in civilization to deny any people even-handed justice in the courts. Mr. Enos is willing to be regarded as a barbarian, if denying to the courts the privilege of receiving Chinese testimony may be so interpreted. Yet Mr. Enos, as a lawyer, ought to know that the chattering of a magpie or the barking of a dog may come as facts before a court; that this is the same question that prompted a San Francisco judge to test the rootlets of a black man's hair by a microscope, to ascertain if he was eligible to tell the truth. We accept Mr. Enos's invitation, and regard him as a barbarian. The remark of Mr. Johnson was not inapt when, in reference to the clause of the Constitution inhibiting the employment of Chinese, he said it was a blow at corporations rather than at the Chinese.

Mr. Davis was not wrong when he declared, as also did Mr. Sears, that as this kind of legislation was demanded by the Constitution, had not been settled by the courts, and was an open question for legal interpretation, and had been affirmed by the wishes of 154,000 electors, expressed at the ballot-box, that they should give it their support. We commend to all these our Senators that they keep their tempers, eschew vain personal allusions, and bear always in mind that nobody—but the utterer of such nonsense—cares whether he be an uneducated descendant of Montgomery, from the slums of Dublin, or whether he be or be not willing to ride out to death on the top of a white horse.

During a quarrel the other day, out at the Mission, a man and his wife were knocked down with a "picket" from a fence. We do not approve of knocking people down if it can be decently avoided, and commonly it can, if the person for whom that delicate attention is intended will have the forbearance to run away. But, in any case, it is wrong to knock down a woman, and a gentleman will not do it except under strong provocation; and then he will use his fist, like a man.

The shooting of S. H. Brummett, editor of the Hollister Enterprise, by G. W. Carlton, of the Hollister Telegraph, is in further illustration of the bad taste which has crept into journalism since the abolition of the code duello. To kill an editor is seldom a crime. To kill him before he has had time to put his house in order, and without giving him a chance to exchange an eye for an eye, a limb for a limb, or a life for a life, is clearly in execrable form.

Next to truth, the earnest man loves frankness. Truth and frankness, however, do not always hunt in couples. There are certain frank folk who lie most artistically; and their work is, of course, entitled to an amount of credit proportionate to its art. Yet lying is so sure to be some time found out that even when it is perfectly frank and unblushing there is a certain uncomfortableness about listening to or reading it. These remarks owe their origin to a careful perusal of the medical advertising columns of the daily papers. Experience is a convincing teacher.

After the war the negroes in Washington were provided with work at one dollar a day. The darkeys struck, paraded the town, and placarded the public buildings with "Colored men would rather starve than work for a dollar a day." Some wag—in the night-time—added, "and would rather steal than do either."

When you see a young man in gorgeous apparel walking about the street with his arms hanging in curves from his body, like the wings of an overheated turkey on a summer's day, it isn't because he is in pain; it is because he has been "abroad."

ADA VEN'S LETTER.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 12, 1880.

MY DEAR HELEN: Saturday afternoon I made the ascent of the precipitous approach to the residence of Dr. Gwin, and was pantingly ushered in from the bright light of day to the glow of many a chrystal chandelier within. I think no family in San Francisco understands more thoroughly the art of entertaining than this one; long practice, you know, tells in everything. I observed among the guests, with scarce an exception, all of our best known belles and beaux, as well as a large number of fashionable married people. I find there is nothing like a tea or kettledrum to unearth our old social pioneers; having long since abandoned evening festivities, many now avail themselves of the pleasures afforded by the less formal gatherings of the afternoon. A glance in the splendid ball-room disclosed what, but for the bonnets worn by the ladies, and the absence of the precious dress-coat, would have seemed a brilliant ball. The ladies of the house presided with their usual ease and grace. I have frequently heard regrets expressed at Mrs. Coleman's absence from all the gayeties of the winter. Miss Porter, distinguishable and handsome, was conspicuously a centre of attraction. Miss Ada Johnson, tall and graceful, was my ideal "fair one with golden locks." Miss Mary Maynard looked joyous and bright as spring. Miss Coghill's coquettish graces seemed to be doing much execution among our susceptible youths. Miss Meares, handsome and affable, was much admired. Mr. Fisher towered like Saul among the prophets, or even more so, as his companion for the occasion seemed to have been selected from the ranks of our most petite. Lieutenant Browne, buoyant and gay, "looked like youth in the golden age of the poets, before nymph or shepherdess had vexed his heart with a sigh." Mr. Teal's tragic tones were heard, but only in conversation. The most striking costume I saw was evidently copied from an old painting: waist of black silk étoffe, front embroidered in red, the long train of black and écru lavishly draped with sashes of red and black. The near approach of seven warned me to depart, though somewhat loth to do so.

The spacious library of Mrs. J. L. Coleman was, on Monday evening, the scene of a beautiful "german," which consisted of eighteen or twenty couples, and was led by Mr. Ludlow and Miss Carmelita Nuttall. Many graceful new figures were introduced, that I have not seen before in San Francisco. Among the guests of the evening were Mrs. and Miss Baroihet, the Misses Cole, Misses Parrott, Misses Nuttall, Miss Crockett, Mrs. Hooker, Madam de Guigné.

For the Tuesday tea at Mrs. Keeney's the house was beautifully decorated with flowers, and the fair hostess, with her fascinating manners and radiant smiles, made sunshine all around. Monday, in spite of wind and weather, many ladies ventured out, knowing what attractions awaited them at Judge Lake's and Governor Low's. Should my letter contain nothing but stale news, you need not trouble yourself to inform me, for there are those here who will not hesitate to do so. Fortunately, a sense of my own inferiority, and a due appreciation of their scintillating wit and Junius-like style, entirely deprive me of all spirit for controversy.

Your friend, ADA VEN.

The following story could be woven into a three-volume novel. It was told us by our friend Captain W., of Oakland: Aunt Priscilla Coffin was a widow at the age of twenty-seven. One of those frail, pale, interesting widows. She had the seeds of consumption, coughed a little, and was just delicate enough to be interesting. She had $10,000, left by her dear departed. The interest, at six per cent., was hardly sufficient to enable her to live on it, and her consumption was not sufficiently pronounced to justify her in spending the principal; so it occurred to her to purchase an annuity. There used to be annuity societies in New England in the olden time; so Aunt Priscilla hied her to the "Hub," and, with her hectic complexion, delicate appearance, and suggestive cough, made a most excellent arrangement. She obtained a little advantage over the ordinary health tables, and having paid over her $10,000, returned to her native village to enjoy the annuity and die at leisure. Aunt Priscilla Coffin died a short time since, at the age of ninety-nine years and seven months, leaving, as the accumulation of the annuity, the sum of $65,000. The office had had four generations of officials; the boy who polished off the knocker of the great front door when she knocked for admittance, died president of the company, a white-haired old man, long before Aunt Priscilla passed in her chips to the croupier, Death.

Dr. Benjamin Ward Richardson, of London, is in a queer box. He has been a life-long abstainer from the use of all intoxicating drinks, and an earnest advocate of like abstinence in others. Sir Walter Trevelyan, being recently about to die, willed Dr. Ward a valuable cellar of old wines, with a strict injunction that they be used "for the advancement of science." Many of the wines are over one hundred years old, and worth their weight in "dollars of our daddies." Yet the involuntary legatee can not harmonize this fact with his conscientious scruples. He may not drink the wines. He may not sell them. He has a profound disbelief in their value as medicine. Yet he must employ the bequest "for the advancement of science." "What will he do with it?"

There is a pleasant surprise party in ambush near the northwest corner of Eddy and No-matter-what streets. It consists of an angry young woman and a fiery widow. It is armed to the teeth with a boot-jack and the most venerable broom in the block. It is waiting for a black cat. "Daisy" is a nice, clean, limpid name for a cat; but if the cat be black and fond of canaries, "Daisy" becomes a misleading misnomer. The widow and the young woman had rival songsters—the yellow apples of their mutual eyes. "Daisy" assimilated these vocal benedictions. Hence that ambush. Hence this song.

The German newspapers are at the pains to explain why the German army is to be increased. Quite unnecessary: any fool knows it is on account of Germany's rigid determination to preserve the peace. It is Prince Bismarck's way of holding himself in.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Some More "Growler."

SAN FRANCISCO, Saturday, February 7th, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—Some one has said that tempers, like faces, generally appear best at a distance—ergo, "Judith" looks better to the "Growler" because she, or he (for "Judith" is possibly a horrid man), is a long way off, and has not the honor of his acquaintance. Cheeky in him to say so. Yet she should not have rebelled against the dictates of reason, and attacked the "Growler" with venom, in place of soft words, which are a woman's best weapon, and if ably managed would win the world—or a man, which is the same thing, with odds in favor of the man; as a big, healthy, loving, smart, generous, clean man is all the world any woman wants, and more than "Judith" has, according to her own awkward leap-year acknowledgment. But don't despair, "Judy," dear; I am all the above-pictured man—barring the smart. I am thirty-six years old, just bald enough to be domestic, nice white teeth, and I can kiss equal to any girl in Mills Seminary, for coin. Come, now, brace up and reach for me. This is the year for you; you won't have another chance for four long, weary years. "Long time between drinks," you know. This is your last clean-up; for I am off for Arizona by the 15th, and no telling what might happen to yours sincerely in that land of quick divorces, horned toads, sand, and dusky maids that are hastily and wonderfully made. First and foremost, though, let us come down to cases—start in with the soda card, so to speak.

Now, who are you? I am the "Growler,"—an unfortunate hotel-keeper, an unlucky miner, and a very ordinary man, which you have already inferred from reading my former letter. Yet we are even on that score, for it could not possibly have been worse than yours; and now I ask you in all candor, Would you, after we were married and cozily fixed on Tehama street, write such letters to the Argonaut as your last? So that ends the boom. "Judy," dear, your letter made me weary—worse I ever saw. You say, "Oh, could I write with a sword," that you might "cut me up." Why, you awfully awful girl, you ought to be a "sojer," and train with General Barnes. You wrote with a goose's quill and with a goose's intent, which is more dangerous; for have you not heard that "The pen is," etc? You say that I got drunk, and a black eye, and missed the 4:30 train. Now how could I miss the train, when I plainly stated in my last letter that I arrived in time to take the train? But there was no 4:30 train on Sunday, January 25th. Mr. "Aftermath," that dear, caustic cuss, also stated, amongst his pleasant writings, that he knew that the "Growler" left on the 4:30 train, when in fact there was no 4:30 train on that day, for coin. I started to go (by the Argonaut time-table, which was changed in next issue to its present correctness), and finding no train I returned home, wrote the letter, and mailed it as I went to dinner, leaving for Sacramento next morning at 7:30, and lost what I should have gained had I been there as per agreement. Now that settles the drunk business, and as for the black eye, never had one but once; got that at the geese-and-tub race on San Rafael Bay in 1870. Man was beating his wife, on the steamer. I jumped in to help the wife, and she helped me to a black eye and a dog-gone good licking in about two minutes, and I have sored on this interference racket ever since. Yet I presume, should I see any brute whipping a woman, that I'd stand in again, on general principles, and get another eye in mourning, like a dashed fool. But I am nothing but an ignorant miner, and that's the way we do things on the frontier; and if you'll just whisper to me the name of the brute who struck the woman in the face, that you speak of in your letter, I'll give him a little game before I leave, just for luck and to show that I am not mean. If he tackles me with a six-shooter I am his oyster; but if he goes to law you must stand in with your evidence, as the law breaks me all up—it's too many for me. As between the lawyers and brokers, I have worn a linen duster for fifteen winters; and all I ever received in return for many a big dollar was oysters and wine on New Year's Day, given with a kind greeting and an unassuming politeness by the lady hostess and sensible lady daughter; and when with easy grace she presented me to her sire, and said "Mr. Thingabub Fitz Poodle, my father!" I nearly wilted and collapsed, at seeing the man to whom I had regularly paid my assessments and been working for since 1867.

And yet I look with a great deal of pride on the fruits of my labor; have I not helped make a "marchioness" (so the telegraph says) out of a dear little lady whom I knew at Downieville, and whose then doctor-husband yanked me all over the room to pull an aching molar? Have I not stood in nobly and put my bachelor's mite toward the two millions and a half in Government bonds? Of course I have; and I am willing to keep putting up and raise it another two millions and a half; and I'll never squeal unless some offe-horse count or weak-kneed baron drops in and gets away with the whole business. But I have great faith in the lady's good sense, and feeling that no kind of nobility will ever win her except that which God has stamped on the face of every honest man, I'll go off and take in some Con. Virginia to-morrow.

You ask if it is "graceful for two to sit on one chair"? I don't know about the grace of the thing, "Judy," dear; neither do I know if her feet were hid. I was looking, as "Crockett" says, "Squar" in her eye, and I did not care whether it was graceful or not; she appeared to like it; and as for me—well, I want to die just that way. Next to carrying a girl on a horse and have her hold the bridle, give me the one-chair game. Try it, "Judith," try it! You have no idea how much one little weak chair can hold. You say that I "throw stones at 'Gansy something' and 'Ada Ven.'" No, I don't, and won't; and will lick any man that does. But entre nous, don't they sling on the taffey? They both have true sense and exalted sense; but I much prefer common sense. Why don't they speak of some poor girl as being graceful, charming, lovely, and other bosh? They speak of some scrawny-necked, knock-kneed, false-haired, painted, silly thing as being the embodiment of grace, beauty, and intelligence, just because her father is rich and influential, struck a pay-streak and slid down hill to fortune and position. Bah! "Judith," this Society District is nearly all salted; it won't stand the prospect. Leads show well enough on top, and pan out with a few coppers, but they peter when you go down; and you strike sulphurets, so base, so selfish, so cruel that nothing can work them but the grave.

"Judith," I am sleepy. I shall mail this letter to-morrow (Sunday) on my way to church. Possibly I may change my mind and take in the Cliff House; for I hold that the true Christian is the one that enjoys, temperately, all that God has put on this earth. And "Mrs. Judith Growler" would not look bad on a card, would it, dear? Can't you tumble? You advise me to take seltzer. That looks suspicious; you must have been there yourself. But I won't take it. I know what's the matter—it's my liver; I'll take mandrake root. Good night.

GROWLER.

Very Appreciative Criticism.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I have been disappointed at not seeing in your columns any notice of Poverty and Progress, published by the Appletons, of New York, for Mr. Henry George, of this city. I consider Mr. George's work as (thus far) the book of this half century, and I do no injustice to the renown of my revered teacher and friend, the late John S. Mill, in ranking Mr. George's work as far surpassing anything and all that Mr. Mill published. I venture (though with great diffidence) to think that, with the zeal inseparable from a discoverer, Mr. George underestimates some of the heretofore overrated factors in the social problem; none the less I regard his work as the most valuable addition to the science of social economy since the publication of Ricardo's discovery of the theory of rent; nor has even Mr. Herbert Spencer done so much to advance the social sciences as Mr. George has done by this great work of his. That his discovery is true receives a strong confirmation from the fact that, approaching the subject from the point of view of legislative science, or the science of "what ought to be law," in my treatise on Property in Thought, published in 1834, I pointed out that no individual had any moral claim to those accretions to land values which arise from the progress of society, but that as the continued usufruct of land should (for reasons there given) belong to the cultivator or other improver, these accretions, or economic rent, formed the proper subject of taxation for the purposes of the community; but I failed to appreciate then—as ever since, till enlightened by Mr. George's work, I have failed to appreciate—the overshadowing importance to human happiness of so appropriating this rent to the uses of society, and of not allowing it to be monopolized by any individual so long as any proper public want remained unsatisfied—that is, so long as means were needed for anything which ought to be done by government.

It speaks but ill for the discernment and public spirit of the people of California that, with such a master in our midst, dwarfs and pigmies should have been preferred for positions which Mr. George would have adorned, and it is to be hoped that means will be speedily found to place him in a situation where he may continue his labors to instruct and improve us, and be relieved from anxiety for the daily wants of himself and family. I confidently predict that Mr. George's work is destined not merely to modify but in many respects to revolutionize thought and legislation in every civilized nation.

Respectfully, MONTAGUE R. LEVERSON.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 7, 1880.

[From the tone of Mr. George's very judicious admirers, we begin to be somewhat alarmed lest he has "built better than he knew." We can contemplate him with considerable serenity sitting on the ruins of the economic and social systems of Mill and Spencer; but what if he has also unwittingly overthrown that of the New Testament? Seriously, we have so much respect for this really clever writer that we greatly dislike to see him made ridiculous by his friends.—Ed. Argonaut.]

A Leap-Year Verity.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 11, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—The following story is essentially true: There was a lull in the outer office. The "important business" men, who "must see Mr. Cash privately," had unfolded their schemes, borrowed his money, accepted judicious snubbing, and gone their several ways. The great man was alone. He rubbed his eyes, yawned, and sank into the ample comfort of his big office-chair to think. He had made some clever turns. There was scarcely a questionable venture on his list; he had loaned a few trifling sums, not one of them more than a hundred. It was almost time to go home—to his comfortable rooms at the club, and dinner.

"A lady to see you, sir."
"Young, pretty, fresh-looking; makes up well, by gad." This he thinks. What he says is: "Well, madam, how can I serve you."
"I want—I want—I—you are a capitalist, are you not?"
"So the directory says. I am not so sure."
"You make investments, don't you, sometimes?"
"Yes, sometimes."
"Well, I want you to make another investment this year."
"You are very good, madam, I'm sure. I've no doubt it would be profitable; but my books are quite full, I think."
"But you will have room for this one little investment, surely."
"Shall I? Perhaps I may, if it's very trifling. What is the investment, please?"

"One specially provided for this year, sir. It is—I—"
The great man opens his eyes and takes the fullest possible view of his fair client. Then he sighs, and says, slowly: "You should have said 'It is me,' madam. Not even the exigencies of this exceptional weather could reconcile me to a wife at once so beautiful and so grammatical."

It is bad form for a pretty woman to mutter in an office corridor: "Hang it, just my luck!" PAUL DARD.

Enter, a Pagan.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I wish you would be so good as to extinguish the intellectual light of the orthodox controversialist who is always crying out against the iconoclast because the iconoclast "pulls down" but does not "build up." The pitiful wretch can not be made to understand that the destruction of error is in itself a good work, and is itself a preservation of the truth. "Don't tear down the edifice," he shrieks, "unless you can erect a better." The "edifice" is his favorite metaphor because it is a dishonest one; most "edifices" serve some useful purpose—by calling a religion an "edifice" he assumes its usefulness, which is the point in dispute. In the following paragraph cut from an Eastern journal this cheater in argument is seen in his characteristic attitude, "stocking" the logic and dealing from the bottom:

"Bob Ingersoll walks up to a large ancient structure, shakes his fist, pulls off his coat, and goes to work to tear it down. 'What are you doing, Bob?' asks a looker-on. 'Going to tear the old thing down,' says Bob; 'don't like the looks of it.' 'Well,' says the looker-on, 'suppose now, instead of trying to tear the 'old thing' down, you go to work and put up another to beat it; and if you beat it, why then I'll turn in and help you pull down this one.' 'Oh, go West,' says Bob; 'I'm no architect.'"

Now, it is important to observe that what this fellow calls "an ancient structure," Bob Ingersoll would call "an old heap of rubbish." I don't profess to decide which is the more accurate; I only say that the nature of the thing which one proposes to demolish and the other to spare is the very essence of the dispute. The iconoclast denies in toto that there is any necessity for a "structure" at all. He objects not only to the particular religion which he assails, but to any religion. He is not certainly right, but he is certainly as dishonestly misrepresented as if he were.

Letter from a Brute.

OAKLAND, February 9, 1880.

MR. EDITOR:—Every right-minded man, I should think, must look upon the dubious and vacillating policy of the Government with regard to the Mormon question with regret and contempt. A Government unable to enforce its laws is a spectacle of pitiful imbecility. This handful of religious fanatics ought to be dealt with by some of the old and discredited methods of despotism; our republican institutions, beautiful in theory, do not work where whole communities are banded to defy the laws. My quarrel with the Mormons is based on the fact that they have made polygamy ridiculous. It is not in itself ridiculous; it is, without doubt, the natural condition of mankind. Of all the countless thousands of millions of men and women who have lived upon the earth only an infinitesimal portion has ever so much as heard of any other system; and, for my part, I decline to believe that that comparatively recent experiment of a comparatively few nations, monogamy, has as yet demonstrated its superiority over the obviously natural and conceded heaven-appointed system which was its predecessor, and over the greater part of the earth is its contemporary.

Some one writing in your paper ever so long ago said: "Every man is at heart a polygamist." It is so, and every man who is a man knows it is so. But it is the fashion in "civilized" nations to pay outward deference to "the ladies"—whom we profess to regard as our superiors, but whom we know to be as much our inferiors, morally and intellectually, as they are in physical strength and beauty. Woman is exalted as a demi-goddess because literature is made by men. In truth, however, if all that has been done in art, science, letters, and every department of intellectual endeavor were blotted out, it would hardly be missed. Women, speaking generally, are good for nothing excepting as the mothers of men. Nevertheless, with an insincerity so transparent as to be ludicrous, we consult their preferences in legislation, and have invented for their satisfaction this thing monogamy. Well, how does she like it? Does she believe—as she professes to believe—that under it she "has her man all to herself"? She knows better, if she knows anything. She knows, or ought to know, that while her whim for having a whole man can shape a law of Congress it can not repeal a law of Nature.

I'll tell you what monogamy has done where it is the rule: It has divided married men into two classes—the "faithful" discontented, and the hypocritically "untrue." Let the reader decide for himself or herself their relative numbers. And it has done this for women—divided them into three camps: Suspicious wives, "soiled doves," and hopeless old maids, for there are not enough nuns to go round. Let our highly cultivated women, taught by men in love and men influenced by memories of love to consider themselves our superiors, and but little (if any) lower than the angels, turn up their pretty noses if they will; but men who know anything of the charming and happy domestic life of the oriental gentlemen and ladies, and who have some acquaintance with the intelligent, free, and contented inmates of the libeled "harem," will attach but little weight to their putting. It makes them interesting, that is all.

It is from such considerations as these—though truly I have not stated the hundredth part of them—that I join those of an opposite opinion in demanding the suppression of polygamy in Utah, where it is a sickly and absurd exotic, discredited by both the bad character of its devotees and the repulsive conditions under which it is practiced. Polygamy can bear the contumely of women (our women), and the smirking hypocrisy of men's assent to their invecitves; but it can not endure to be made ridiculous by the ignorant prophets, dirty deacons, and lecherous laymen of the Mormon sort. AJAX.

A Sore-Head Warble.

SACRAMENTO, February 9, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—"Betsy and I" got pathetic last week, and went all to pieces. Their concluding remark is: "And it will be just the same when we are gone." Correct. Unless you let subjects which are dear to us entirely alone, or handle them very differently, your trip across Jordan will be something of a relief, and we will listen to your "ta, ta" at parting enraptured, imagining we hear the rustle of wings. The people of Sacramento have their idols, and Mrs. Crocker and her family are placed in a niche far above all others. We feel that words are flat when we try to deal out praise to them, and when we see "Betsy and I" "rush in where angels fear to tread" we grow wrathful. In society reports we find nonentities sandwiched in between our leading ladies in a manner truly heartrending, and people of some position totally ignored. Then the French (oh, my!) thrown at us in festivities and funerals. Nothing seems to be too sacred to be peppered with French. Now if it was Dutch there would be a chance to have it translated, as we have a number of Dutch citizens; but I believe the only Frenchman who tried to live here nearly starved to death, and finally went home.

We just struggled through the Governor's reception, which, I suppose, "Betsy and I" will give you in full, but as they make every place they enter a paradise, I will just mention a few facts. We all tried to go to supper at once, but the door proved too small. There were a good many of us, and about twenty-five out of twenty-six hundred were behind me, and I think each one pushed from one to twenty-five pounds. They had a rail across the door, stomach high, upon which I leaned, as did the other twenty-five hundred. I would not have been that rail for anything. There were a great many different breaths in my neighborhood, and from some of them I learned that there must be something to drink in the building. One sweet little creature near me was eating musk lozenges. Think of musk in that crowd!

The chap that was attending to the bar that barred our progress was a prominent hotel-keeper, and, with an eye to business, let the hotel guests in at another door. Some of them won't eat another meal for a week. Finally we were in. Here I draw the curtain for about fifteen minutes, during which time I was too busy to observe. After supper I hunted up the wine-room, which was screened by the American flag—put to a vile use. I entered a room full of smoke, through which the bright red noses of most of the occupants glistened like headlights. The "regulars" were all there, swilling rum. It was disgusting. Fire and fall back seemed to be the order of the day. The barkeepers had grown confidential, and were rubbing ears, looking like a stand of arms. It was too much for me, and, although I am a very small fish and swim in a very small puddle, I thanked heaven that it was unnecessary for me to feed the basest passions of human pigs to obtain a senatorship, which was the reason generally given for the bar-room affair.

Next came the hat-room, which was very poorly managed, some ladies being forced to stand from one to two hours in the cold passage, waiting for their escorts. With the exception of what I have mentioned, I believe the affair to have been a perfect success; and the sociability and good feeling everywhere shown reflects great credit upon the Governor, of whom we are proud. PAUL AND VIRGIE.

Ex Cathedra.

ALAMEDA, February 12, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—After men of thought and reason have sought in vain in your hesitating, dubious, and non-committal editorial opinions, for light and a guide through the night-fog and ramifying paths of politics and finance, it is a relief and a joy to pick up the Morning Call, and learn from Mr. Pickering's trumpet of no uncertain sound what course to pursue. With reference to the opposite financial theories promulgated by Messrs. Bayard and Thurman, for example, this venerable philosopher—this moss-grown guide-post of politics—concludes a grave expression of editorial opinion thus:

"There is no occasion to question the sincerity of either of these distinguished statesmen, but the people can choose between the systems of finance, according as each may seem the better suited to the wants of the country."

With a man like this dictating articles of political faith to the people, they can not go wrong, except through an act of unwarrantable interference of Providence—who would hardly dare! TAFFY.

"Americus" is altogether wrong. The Duchess of Marlborough has made it very clear that there is great suffering in Ireland, and that, too, in regions where there is no political agitation. The Parnell fund is a political one; we should be sorry to see a dollar go in that direction. The Herald fund is for charity, and not politics. Mr. Mackay gave $50,000. Independently of this, the Nevada Bank gave $25,000, telegraphed on Tuesday to the New York Herald. Mr. James C. Flood was born at Fort Hamilton, in the State of New York; James L. Flood, his son, was born in San Francisco. The whole amount raised in California for Ireland is a little less than $100,000. Mr. Parnell's mother was an American lady. He is a land-owner and a member of Parliament.

To J. E.—There is a provision in the Constitution against lobbying, but Mayor Killoch and Denis Kearney are now at the Capital, and hard at work in the lobby. The Chinese must go. Yes; Kearney wants throat-cutting to begin in Ireland, but Kearney is one of those prudent cut-throats that take very good care not to hazard their own wensands. Whenever and wherever throat-cutting begins, Denis will not be about.

"Old Guard."—We do not think that in the event of General Grant's nomination we shall be placed in any more embarrassing position than will the New York Tribune, or the Springfield Republican, or, in the event of Sherman's candidacy, the New York Times. We will endeavor, however, to take care of ourselves. Much obliged.

The Mrs. Swift who is so prominent among the strong-minded women, and who is so emphatic in her desire to vote, is Mrs. Judge Swift, formerly of Santa Cruz, and not Mrs. E. Swift, a well-known business woman of Montgomery Street. The President of the Association is Mrs. Aaron A. Sargent, wife of the ex-Senator. Many of the members are trance mediums, astrologers, and free lovers.

Mr. R. L. is informed that he has been victimized by a strolling swindler. By this term we mean to designate Mr. A. W. Jenkins, who is not an agent for this paper, which has no traveling agents anywhere. This Jenkins person was, we believe, authorized by certain city papers to act in that capacity for them, but they have since repudiated him and advertised him as an impostor. If any one who holds his receipt for a subscription for the Argonaut will kindly send us the fellow's ears, we will refund the money which we had not the good fortune to get.

Roast Mutton à la Venison. Currant Jelly.
Tomato Salad. Cucumber Pudding.
Fruit-bowl of Oranges, Apples, Fried Pies, and Bananas.

To MAKE COCONUT PUDDING.—Soak three table-spoonsful of tapioca over night. Boil one quart rich milk; add tapioca and table-spoonful of butter; boil five minutes; then add yolks of four eggs, three table-spoonsful of sugar, and coconut, sugar to taste, and boil ten minutes; turn into a mold. Boil the whites of the eggs and two table-spoonsful sugar to a froth. Put the custard, and scatter over with coconut. Set it in ice.

THE DISPOSAL OF THE DEAD.

"Let's speak of worms, and tombs, and epitaphs."
—Shakespeare, Richard III.

There are few subjects which possess, for the ordinary human being, so strange and peculiar a fascination as death. That mysterious and inexplicable change which comes over an organization which was once the theatre of thought and action, of will and passion, affords a bewildering topic of speculation, as well to the physiologist and psychologist of an intellectual and advanced civilization, as to the rude, unlettered barbarian, whose wants and aspirations are limited to providing, from day to day, for the physical necessities of life. Death is the one plane on which there is equality for man and animal and vegetable. The various religions of all nations, in all ages and all countries, have ever fortified themselves with the peculiar patronage of death, and appropriated to themselves, as their natural right, the supervision of those functions and offices which belong to the ultimate disposal of the dead. Any form of religion which failed to apply to the supernatural and metaphysical side of man's nature, which failed to deal with what is mystical and transcendental in his condition, would be a religion unworthy of the name, and one which would have little hold upon its votaries whether educated or ignorant. At the same time, were there nothing mysterious in man's nature, could he unveil the secrets of the future as they affected his life and pierce beyond the grave, he would be afflicted with the most terrible curse it would be possible to inflict upon him—that of having nothing to fear and nothing to hope. As this is happily not the case, and as the mystery which enshrouds the meaning and nature of Death's secret never has been nor ever will be torn away from the awful subject, custom has invested it with such mystical and symbolical expressions as shall be typical of the ideas uppermost in the race which expresses them.

All the different species of the human race have invented for themselves—among the other customs which hereditary auspices, climatic conditions, and the general circumstances of nature have imposed upon them without seeming to do it—certain ceremonial methods and usages in the ultimate disposal of their dead. As might be inferred from analogy, the refinement and symbolical meaning of these usages is commensurate with the intellectual and spiritual advancement of the race. If a race is civilized and spiritual, it will provide for its dead in accordance with the particular bent of its spiritualistic theories; if it is barbarian and material, or civilized and material, or civilized and scientific, it will act up to the hypothetical requisitions of its life in its valuation and estimate of death. The two methods most widely practiced amongst ancient nations were burial and cremation. In the case, however, of that most peculiar of ancient peoples, the Egyptians, whose early records stretch back into the night of time, the form of burial was so modified as almost to entitle it to another distinction. The bodies of the dead were, indeed, so far buried that they were laid beneath the earth in catacombs, but there they reposed in their individuality, and did not mingle with the elements of nature. The object of thus preserving the individual person remains a sealed mystery, along with the construction of the Pyramids and the pillars of the Temple of Carnac; the most plausible theory being that it was meant to be typical of the immortality of the soul, which was expected at some future time to return and reanimate the frame in which it had once dwelt. There were several processes of embalming, some expensive and others less so, but the commonest and least expensive methods seem to have answered the purpose of preservation as well as those which were more costly. As a rule the viscera were removed, the flesh subjected to the influence of antiseptic drugs, with an injection of some arsenical solution into the blood vessels, while the body itself was swathed in bandages soaked in nitre.

Other oriental races, notably the Jews, were addicted to burying their dead in natural caves, or in tombs tunneled and hewn out of the rock. Thus, Jacob was carried from Egypt by the filial regard of Joseph to sleep with the patriarchs who reposed in the caves of Macpelah and Mamre. The eminence on which Jerusalem was built, as well as the hills which surrounded the city, was honeycombed with the tombs of its inhabitants:

"The vaulted cells where martyred seers of old Far in the rocky walls of Zion sleep."

The Greeks both buried and burned their dead, the funeral ceremonies being accompanied with invocations of the gods, panegyrics, and lustral rites. In burning the body a funeral pyre was used, composed of wood and covered with oil, incense, and spices; and, after the remains had been burned, the embers were quenched with wine. Rome, under the kings and during the republic, buried her dead, cremation coming in with the empire. The Romans erected magnificent monuments to the deceased, and the finest of their public drives—the Appian Way—where the wealth, fashion, and intellect of ancient Rome used to air themselves behind swift horses, was lined for miles with the splendid memorials of death. With the spread of luxury, effeminacy, and public and private debauchery in imperial times, cremation superseded burial; and we learn from one of the satires of Juvenal that the possession of numerous urns containing the ashes of ancestors was a mark of high distinction, and that he whose atrium was not adorned with such embellishments was held ignoble. With the ascendancy of Christianity the fashion of cremation passed away, the form of burial being considered more consonant with the interpretation then put upon the Scriptures. The curse of Jehovah, as given in the early part of the book of Genesis, "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return," seemed to the pure and simple apprehension of the primitive Christians to point out a clear and plain behest regarding disposal of the dead which it would be impiety to disobey. For fifteen centuries, therefore, the burning of the dead has been unknown in Europe until within the last few years.

With the progress of scientific information, and the consequent widening of thought and liberality of ideas, the subject of cremation has been again mooted, and strongly supported in such cities as London, New York, Berlin, Dresden, and Vienna. Two societies have been formed in New York for the purpose of enabling persons desiring to use this method in disposing of their dead to do so. Apart from these religious and superstitious prejudices which must inevitably combat such an important innovation on existing, long established, and presumably sacred forms, the most powerful argument against cremation assumes a medico-legal aspect. Its opponents argue that in cases of suspected foul play the so speedy annihilation of what might be produced as evidence would be prejudicial to the ends of justice. Its supporters say, in rejoinder, that it will only tend to make primary examinations of dead bodies more careful and more strict. Theological opposition is met by the argument that cremation merely effects that change in the constituents of the body by a quick process which nature carries out by a slow one. In the earth the body is resolved into its original elements by a chemical process, which is combustion, as complete and real as if it were effected by the furnace. In looking at the matter from a sanitary point of view, the advocates of cremation have clearly the best of the controversy.

There can not be two opinions on the point that places consecrated to the burial of the dead in the vicinity of the homes of the living are a wanton outrage against the laws of health. The location of cemeteries in the midst of populous cities is nothing else but throwing down the gauntlet to pestilence and death. Water-pipes laid through such places become impregnated with the poisonous elements which are there engendered. Miasma rises and contaminates the air with poisonous gases. Yet such cemeteries exist and are used in the heart of London and other crowded cities. When ground becomes valuable for building purposes the rights of the dead are not respected, and their revenge is taken in an insidious and dangerous fashion. It has now, however, become the practice—in which such cities as New York, Boston, Washington, Cincinnati, etc., are taking the lead—to locate cemeteries at such distances from the centres of population as to insure their immunity from greed and vandalism, and also to make them subservient to pleasure by beautifying their solemnity with tasteful monuments, flowers, shrubs, and trees.

In the light of modern science the process of burning bodies assumes a much more artistic and less revolting form than the ancient practice of consuming them on the funeral pyre, or rogis. In the latter case the embers of the fuel hold so disproportionate a ratio to the incinerated remains of the body that the two become indistinguishable, and the relatives of the deceased could with difficulty imagine that they possessed any memorials of his existence. Under the modern method the body is deposited upon a light wooden frame in the chamber of a reverberatory furnace, constructed on such principles as to combine economy of fuel with speed of action. In the first stage of the process an inflammable gas is introduced, which unites with the heated air from the furnace at the entrance of the cremating chamber, through which it is carried by a powerful draught, producing intense combustion on its passage. As the process progresses, advantage is taken of the gases which are evolved from the body by the heat, and which supply the place of the artificial gas at first introduced. Thus it is impossible for any foul vapor to escape through the tall chimney which carries off the smoke, as every particle of matter is oxidized. In half an hour the work of cremation is completed, and nothing remains in the chamber but a small quantity of white ash.

Our own city of San Francisco affords some peculiar instances and reminiscences of Chinese practices in the disposal of their dead. Many centuries ago the then parvenu dynasty of Mongols, to put a check upon the emigration of subjects, encouraged in every possible way that article of faith introduced by Confucius, that no Chinaman could enter heaven who died outside his own country. Like many customs, social and religious, of this and other races, the spirit of this doctrine became merged in the letter, and its object was supposed to be fulfilled by the interment in China of the bones of those who died abroad. This practice is still religiously carried out by the Asiatic aliens in our midst. There are, too, thousands in this city who will remember, even less than a score of years ago, the existence of the public Yerba Buena Cemetery upon the sand-lot now occupied by the new City Hall. Any inquisitive person who cared to peer beyond the high fence which inclosed the graveyard could see the Chinese in the act of disinterring half-decayed corpses, cutting the flesh from the bones and scraping them clean for transit to China. Even at this very day Mongolians may be perceived on the homeward journeys of such cars as run to the vicinity of Lone Mountain, conveying with them loaded sacks upon the rear platform of the car, the contents of which, if known to the occupants, would not be calculated to produce the pleasantest mental emotion.

ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1880.

If Richard Grant White were editor of the Argonaut he would not write two columns to the New York Times with the following inane conclusion: "Thus it is that letter-writing has become a mere business proceeding. Usually, letters are now merely dunning in some form or other. If they do not ask for money, either as a due or a gratuity, they ask for something else—a favor or information. Rarely they give information; not news, but instruction; and more rarely—most rarely—they offer help. But all letters like these, even those of the last sort, must be classed as business letters; for they are written merely to make the necessary communication about some fact or some transaction. They are not the flowering of friendship into words, as letters were, or were presumed to be, in the days when Swift and Pope and Bolingbroke and Atterbury and Gay and Gray and, finally, Cowper, most charming correspondent of them all, wrote as much for their own pleasure in writing as for that of their friends in reading. For the writing of such letters, indeed, those who nowadays could write them have not time. Their work would go undone, or, what is worse, half done; the world would fly swiftly past them if they were to undertake such correspondence. And with the lost art of letter-writing has passed away a grace of social life which it is beyond the skill of social science to restore, and for which modern life gives us rich exchange indeed, but not exactly compensation."

Will L. Marple, a St. Louis artist—late of this city—has applied for a divorce from his wife. One of his grievances is that she sent a broken frying-pan to an art show, where some of his pictures were on exhibition, with a request that the hanging committee would give it a position as "an example of the way in which the talented Mr. Marple provided for his family's necessities."

NOTES HERE AND THERE.

Mr. Forney says, with more or less justice, as it may seem more or less good to his readers: "No longer by degrees, but rapidly—as rapidly, in fact, as the light clears away the clouds from a great mind—do fair men accept the choice of Presidential electors by districts, as members of Congress are chosen, as a perfectly legal and easy and honest solution of our Presidential complications. It is a plan that stands on all fours, and holds water as safely as an artesian well, and stands equally bold against all comers or arguments. Why anybody should rave against a remedy so peaceful and so just, and so perfectly sure to remove all cause for complaint, passes my comprehension." It depends somewhat as to the majorities of the districts concerned whether the scheme be a wise one or no. Surely, one could scarcely have a less trustworthy mentor in the premises than John W. Forney.

The Arlington, in Washington, has been crowded since the opening of the season, and the assemblage of guests is brilliant. Senator Sharon and family, Senator Farley and family, and others well known, are making their headquarters there, and the coterie of society people attracts a crowd of fashionable visitors. A correspondent of the Burlington Hawkeye writes: "Senator Sharon is accompanied by his daughter Flora, a girl whose brilliant brunette beauty argues a beautiful mother in the premises, for the bonanza king, as one looks down on him from the gallery, is by no means a handsome man. He seems to have been overtaken by that all-pervading grayish tint that comes to men of a certain complexion when they begin to grow gray."

It is paragraphed by the New York Star that: "New appliances for keeping beef sweet for export purposes continue to be offered; indeed, the ingenuity of the country at this moment is mainly directed to the question how to get beef to England cheaply and wholesomely. If somebody would invent a means of getting it into New York cheaply, he would be a benefactor of this city. At present we pay more for our meat than any city on the globe, and we defy any one to give us one good reason why we should." We can give many reasons. In the first place, New Yorkers do not eat beef, living habitually on fish to give them the brain requisite to grapple with the English of New York editors. And then—but you have your "one reason."

"Live nothing down, my son, that you can possibly avoid. It is an expensive habit. It generally includes the direct purchase of all the daily newspapers in town, and an annual gratuity to their brothers in truth who preach from the pulpits. Better to be open and above board in your disrepute than try to live down the honest convictions of a virtuous world. For there is always some queer old chap left whom you can't buy, and when he has given you away the other fellows consider themselves absolved and bark afresh." The foregoing advice was a part of the last words of the late U. S. G. Rant. What he also said was: "A trifle less water in it, thank you."

A pretty American girl in Rome went frequently into the streets unattended, contrary to the custom there. The young Romans followed and annoyed her, until she invented a novel method of rebuffing them. She provided herself with a pocketful of centesimi, each the value of a fifth of a cent, and whenever a man spoke to her, pretending to utterly mistake his words, she gracefully extended her hand and dropped this fifth of a cent in his hand, saying in her broken Italian: "Hungry, are you, poor man? Well, take this and buy some bread." Very ingenious, but why do anything "contrary to the custom there"?

A dispute having arisen in Wales over reforms in the management of Bala College, a Welsh paper is moved to say: "It is well known that three demons have dwelt in Independia for some time, namely: the inquiry demon, who induces members of choirs to quarrel; the pew demon, who causes members of the congregations to fall out with each other, and the particular demon who infuses an evil spirit into meetings held for the purpose of electing deacons. These three, having prepared room, have now introduced a few others, who are named 'Bala College demons.'"

The village of Gabbegood, in the State of Arkansas, is the happy possessor of a very well husbanded old lady, who is now living with her fourteenth helpmate. Mr. Forney—who has a weather eye for this sort of item—says that this pious old lady cherishes the memory of her earlier husbands in a peculiar fashion. In her entrance hall she has placed a row of pegs, on which are hung the thirteen Sunday tiles of the lamented gone before. It must be a touching spectacle to the old gentleman—if he drinks.

San Francisco is not quite the benighted city, intellectually, which a careful reading of our daily papers would justify Eastern people in thinking. We are led to hazard this statement in face of the awful menace that "Caliban" has escaped from his dungeon cell and is about to write a poetical life of Mr. Denis Kearney. We predict that the latent literary sense of the community will refuse to submit to this outrage.

George Eliot says, with her usual profound lack of clearness: "The strength of the donkey mind lies in adopting a course inversely as the arguments used, which, well considered, requires as great a mental force as the direct sequence." This truth applies with great force and distinctness to both the friends of the attempted Lake Merced steal and the boomers for a third term.

Rev. Brother Lane, of Westchester County, New York, has been tried before a clerical conference, charged with kissing the pretty women of his congregation. The judgment says, in substance: "Guilty of indiscretion, but not with evil intent." We think the verdict should have gone further—should have condemned the pastoral partiality no end. Wherefore pretty women?

LITERATURE.

Ten unpublished letters by Voltaire have been sold in Paris for four hundred francs. Good text for the religious weeklies, which know Voltaire only as an enemy to the Christian religion—know nobody, indeed, except through some connection with, or hostility to, their dogma.

Guizot's daughter has completed Guizot's history. Tremble, historians, who have daughters.

Mr. Henry James, Jr., having sat in judgment upon Hawthorne, the Hour has sat upon Mr. James's judgment. Really, the spectacle of Mr. James in the attitude of a censor of Hawthorne is not without its ludicrous aspect. He is better competent to criticise the young Americanesses of his imagination in a European pension. In short, Mr. James is a literary "prig."

Anton Langer, the Viennese humorist, just dead, was jocular to the last. While on his death-bed he was fond of repeating, with great relish, a joke made upon his obesity by a certain theatre director, who said that a physician of his acquaintance, being asked for advice by a gentleman whose ailments proceeded from want of exercise, ordered him to take a walk three times a day around Anton Langer.

Lady Verney says in the Contemporary Review: "The United States, though in the springtime of its national existence, a season which among other nations is that of their greatest artistic vigor, has never produced a poet, painter, sculptor, or architect above mediocrity." We answer this in four words: Corlett, Tojetti, Mezzara, Laver!

Liverpool opera-goers recently had the pleasure of hearing an orchestra conducted by a nobleman—whose opera they were listening to. Title of the nobleman, Earl of Dunmore; title of the opera—doesn't matter.

Walt. Whitman has unfortunately recovered.

Kinglelake, the historian, is a lawyer, as well as the heir to a large property. He has all his life long studied plans of battles in war, and he rode beside Raglan in the Crimea. He is very slow, conscientious, and patient in his work, requiring twenty years to finish two volumes of his Crimæan War, which, after all, is not history, it being neither true nor even probable. Mr. Kinglelake habitually disparages England's allies, slanders her enemies, and relates stories of British prowess that refute themselves by their own extravagance.

A work on The Philosophy of Handwriting, by Don Felix di Salamanca, which recently appeared in London, finds in Lord Beaconsfield's writing signs of "flashiness," in Carlyle's "originality and causticity," and in Mr. Bright's a "straightforward and decided temperament." Just what qualities the author would have discovered in these various chirographies if his researches had been confined to an inspection of the writers' wasbing lists is a matter of conjecture.

Mr. James Redpath gives, in last Sunday's Chronicle, several columns of the private history of Joaquin Miller. Mr. Miller is not an interesting object in any case, but Mr. Redpath's information is simply untrue. For example, Mr. Miller was not with the filibustering expedition of Walker in Nicaragua, nor was he a chief of any tribe of Indians. He was a "squaw man," however, and our only reason for doubting that he was a horse-thief is that he says so himself.

A few years since, a Doctor Wolf, of Cincinnati, published a volume purporting to give certain spiritual communications and manifestations at his house. Among the rest were some fearful revelations, so-called, from dead members of the Bonaparte family. They were so vile that the poor doctor's book came under the head of obscene literature. Now the strange fact appears that precisely the same statements made to the doctor by the so-called spirits appear in Madame Rémusat's memoirs.

Mr. Charles G. Leland has in the press a book called Minor Arts, the aim of which is to urge the superiority of hand work over machine work in art. He hopes that it will result in providing employment for a great many young persons who now have nothing to do. The book will contain one hundred illustrations, all his own.

By the way, Mr. Leland is coming to California, "the blains across," next spring.

Mr. Tennyson is a great poet, but he does not know anything about falconry. In his poem-play, The Falcon, which has been a failure, he makes "Federigo," a practiced and enthusiastic falconer, address his precious bird as a "king o' the air," and indeed throughout treats the creature as a male, as for that matter does Mr. Longfellow in his version of the same story from Boccaccio—

Beside him, motionless, the drowsy bird
Dreame of the chase, and in his slumber heard
The sudden scythe-like sweep of wings that dare
The headlong plunge through eddying gulfs of air.
Then, starting broad awake upon his perch,
Tinkled his bells, etc.

In spite of these two great poets, a falcon is always feminine to a falconer in language as in fact. The female bird is a third larger than the male, and altogether his superior in beauty, fierceness, and strength. Indeed, as a pleasant writer in the London News points out, she alone is a "falcon," the male bird being a tercel. Coventry Patmore preceded both Mr. Tennyson and Mr. Longfellow in choosing Boccaccio's story for treatment in English verse, and was himself preceded by Barry Cornwall, who founded a dramatic scene on the story in 1820.

It is said that Mr. Eugene Schuyler receives from Scribners' eight thousand dollars for his "Life of Peter the Great," with all rights of publication in book form reserved; but it is such an inveterate habit of publishers to overstate the sums they pay to authors, and so rare a thing for authors to correct the statements, that one can seldom get at the truth of such matters. The advertising methods of publishers, theatre managers, and cheap clothing venders show a marked similarity.

The Spectator would like to see Grimm's "glorious collection of nursery legends," with designs by Miss Greenaway's hand. Why, it asks, should there not be an édition de luxe of Grimm, "a grown-up people's Grimm, with a full and accurate translation, which we have never had yet, and a store of first-rate pictures?"

Reminiscences of Dickens, Thackeray, and Others.

Among the London celebrities I was not fortunate enough to see was Charles Dickens—though I confess to loitering around Tavistock Square, upon one of those foggy evenings that he could describe so well, in the hope of a glimpse of the lion. I did see and hear him afterward, in one of his readings. Dickens was reputed the finest amateur actor in England, and one could believe it who heard him read. Of course the text of his own stories was so familiar to him that he could almost discard the book; and he walked about the stage, gesturing, and making effective use of those large and flashing black eyes, and personalized rather than read. His elocution was noble—occasionally marked with some English peculiarities, an inexplicable lilt at the end of a declarative sentence, for instance, giving his climax an interrogative force. What a treat it was to hear him in his own Christmas stories; and how much Christmas is shorn of its pleasures now that his hand will never write again! How sad to think that the writer could never have been the man we would all like to have him.

In this respect there is no disappointment in reviewing the life of Thackeray—or what we know of it. In dress, manner, and conduct a gentleman, he was the farthest possible remove from the snobs he so honestly exposed. It seems to me that those who find a cynicism in his writings may be sure that it is because they wince beneath such truthful revelations of human frailties. Surely, he was no more a cynic than the Mr. Addison whom he loved to praise. In that charming lecture upon "Charity and Humor," who could forget his description of a gentleman, and his manner throughout. In that lecture—how harsh a name for such a sweet discourse—he repeated Hood's "Bridge of Sighs" with most exquisite taste, because in a severely simple style and yet with the utmost feeling. At the close of his lecture he paid a beautiful tribute to the writings of Charles Dickens.

The late Mr. Reed, formerly our Minister to China—an intimate friend of Thackeray—told me that the novelist at one period seriously designed taking up his residence in America. It is hard to fancy Thackeray at home out of England; but genius belongs to no country. Would that he could have lashed American social life as he did that of England.

These reminiscences bring to mind the tragedienne Rachel. What was her peculiar charm? Possibly it lay in her wonderful power of posing. To watch her attitudes was to gaze at a gallery of Grecian statues. Her management of drapery was an art. Her tragic power was never more thrillingly shown than when she declaimed the Marseillaise; she seemed, then, the very spirit of the French Revolution, and often made every Frenchman in the house spring to his feet. From the descriptions we have of Sarah Bernhardt there may be a physical resemblance between her and Rachel. The latter was slim and lithe, but there was something about her movements and individuality strangely suggesting the panther, which, it is to be hoped, the fascinating Sarah does not betray.

Allusion has been made to Macready. Boy as I was at the time of the Astor Place riots, my honest indignation was stirred by the treatment he had received at the hands of the adherents of Forrest. We all know how the riot ended—how Macready fled in disguise from the theatre to the house of Mr. Emmet, and, at an early hour of the morning, took the cars for Boston, and thence to England. Mark how Time brings about his revenges. The quarrel between the actors arose from Edwin Forrest's marked disapproval of Macready's acting in Hamlet. It was asserted that the great American tragedian hissed at the Englishman for his rendering of the scene where the king is betrayed by the mock play. The school of artistic Macready is the school of the day, of which Fechter and Davenport were exemplars, and the acting of our Edwin Booth the best existing exponent. The school of Forrest is obsolete. "Even the masses look with derision at the unearthly stride, and jeer at the stagey elocution, of the few who still copy the great American actor." I am informed by one who heard Irving, some two years since in London, that he is of the mouthing sort, and that the Londoners half confess it; also, that Mr. Irving fears an American verdict on this very account. Can it be that this saucy republic is becoming the umpire in dramatic strife?

TENNYSONIAN OLD FAVORITES.

Songs from "The Princess."

As thro' the land at eve we went
And pluck'd the ripen'd cars,
We fell out, my wife and I,
O we fell out, I know not why,
And kiss'd again with tears.

For when we came where lies the child
We lost in other years,
There above the little grave,
O there above the little grave,
We kiss'd again with tears.

Sweet and low, sweet and low,
Wind of the western sea,
Low, low, breathe and blow,
Wind of the western sea!
Over the rolling waters go,
Come from the dying moon, and blow,
Blow him again to me;
While my little one, while my pretty one, sleeps.

Sleep and rest, sleep and rest,
Father will come to thee soon;
Rest, rest, on mother's breast,
Father will come to thee soon;

Father will come to his babe in the nest,
Silver sails all out of the west,
Under the silver moon:
Sleep, my little one, sleep, my pretty one, sleep.

The splendor falls on castle walls,
And snowy summits old in story:
The long light shakes across the lakes
And the wild cataract leaps in glory.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O hark, O hear! how thin and clear,
And thinner, clearer, farther going!
O sweet and far from cliff and scar
The horns of Elfland faintly blowing!
Blow, let us hear the purple gings replying;
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O love, they die in yon rich sky,
They faint on hill or field or river:
Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow forever and forever.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying.

"Tears, idle tears, I know not what they mean,
Tears from the depth of some divine despair
Rise in the heart, and gather to the eyes,
In looking on the happy Autumn-fields,
And thinking of the days that are no more.

"Fresh as the first beam glittering on a sail,
That brings our friends up from the under-world,
Sad as the last which reddens over one
That sinks with all we love below the verge;
So sad, so fresh, the days that are no more.

"Ah, sad and strange as in dark summer dawns
The earliest pipe of half-awaken'd birds
To dying ears, when unto dying eyes
The casement slowly grows a glimmering square;
So sad, so strange, the days that are no more.

"O Swallow, Swallow, flying South,
Fly to her, and fall upon her gilded eaves,
And tell her, tell her what I tell to thee.

"O tell her, Swallow, thou that knowest each,
That bright and fierce and fickle is the South,
And dark and true and tender is the North.

"O Swallow, Swallow, if I could follow and light
Upon her lattice, I would pipe and trill,
And cheep and twitter twenty million loves.

"O were I thou that she might take me in,
And lay me on her bosom, and her heart
Would rock the snowy cradle till I died.

"Why lingerest she to clothe her heart with love,
Delaying as the tender ash delays
To clothe herself, when all the woods are green?

"O tell her, Swallow, that thy brood is flown:
Say to her, I do but wanton in the South
But in the North long since my nest is made.

"O tell her, brief is life, but love is long,
And brief the sun of summer in the North,
And brief the moon of beauty in the South.

"O Swallow, flying from the golden woods,
Fly to her, and pipe and woo her, and make her mine,
And tell her, tell her, that I follow thee."

Thy voice is heard thro' rolling drums,
That beat to battle where he stands;
Thy face across his fancy comes,
And gives the battle to his hands:
A moment, while the trumpets blow,
He sees his brood about thy knee;
The next, like fire he meets the foe,
And strikes him dead for thine and thee.

Home they brought her warrior dead:
She nor swoon'd, nor utter'd cry:
All her maidens, watching, said,
"She must weep or she will die."

Then they praised him, soft and low,
Call'd him worthy to be loved,
Truest friend and noblest foe;
Yet she neither spoke nor moved.

Stole a maiden from her place,
Lightly to the warrior stept,
Took the face-cloth from the face;
Yet she neither moved nor wept.

Rose a nurse of ninety years,
Set his child upon her knee—
Like summer tempest came her tears—
"Sweet my child, I live for thee."

Ask me no more: the moon may draw the sea;
The cloud may stoop from heaven and take the shape,
With fold to fold, of mountain or of cape;
But O too fond, when have I answer'd thee?
Ask me no more.

Ask me no more: what answer should I give?
I love not hollow cheek or faded eye:
Yet, O my friend, I will not have thee die!
Ask me no more, lest I should bid thee live;
Ask me no more.

Ask me no more; thy fate and mine are seal'd:
I strove against the stream and all in vain;
Let the great river take me to the main:
No more, dear love, for at a touch I yield;
Ask me no more.

"Now sleeps the crimson petal, now the white;
Nor waves the cypress in the palace walk;
Nor winks the gold fin in the porphyry font:
The firefly wakens: waken thou with me.

"Now droops the milkwhite peacock like a ghost,
And like a ghost she glimmers on to me.

"Now lies the Earth all Danae to the stars,
And all thy heart lies open unto me."

"Now slides the silent meteor on, and leaves
A shining furrow, as thy thoughts in me.

"Now folds the lily all her sweetness up,
And slips into the bosom of the lake:
So fold thyself, my dearest, thou, and slip
Into my bosom and be lost in me."

The Grant mechanics give the machine another turn. We have been informed that General Grant would not consent to become the Presidential candidate unless chosen with almost unanimity by the Republican Convention. We heard of the possibilities of "nomination by acclamation," of a "spontaneous uprising of the people," of being the "choice of the nation," and those who did not know the infernal tricks and subtleties of the scheming political villains who are and for eight years have been engineering the Grant machine were so far misled as to believe that Grant was neither himself plotting for a nomination nor allowing his confederates to scheme for him. The Pennsylvania Convention took the lid from off this seething pot, and allowed the outside innocents to catch a glimpse of the political hell-broth that was bubbling in it. Pennsylvania was stolen by the party banditti, of which Cameron is the chief. There was no acclamation, but a closely contested fight, out of which General Grant came rent and torn. In New York and Illinois the same rôle is to be enacted. In New York the illustrious candidate will sit upon the knee of his bottle-holder, Conkling, and snuff vinegar from his sponge as ballot after ballot sends him groggy and bleeding to his corner. He will win, and then he will pass on to Illinois to endure the same punishment, and perhaps with the same splendid triumph over the people. The New York Times says—and it knows—that an intimate personal and political friend, speaking by authorization of General Grant's candidacy, says: "Should the Republican National Convention nominate him in the same manner as any other candidate 'would be nominated, he would deem it his duty to the 'country and the party to accept.' Of course he would, and anybody except the blindest of political bats and the most innocent of party idiots knew it all the time. It was determined by General Grant and his confederates that he should succeed President Hayes if money, brains, and skillful party manipulation could produce that result. Every breath he has drawn, every speech he has made, every movement he has taken, the things he has not done, the remarks he has not uttered, his departure from the United States, his absence, his return, are all movements of the machine under the direction of skilled engineers. When it was ascertained that the Cincinnati business would not work, and that the people would leave him toiling at the plow, the programme was changed, and General Grant is beginning to take the more open, and we must say the more manly, position of avowed candidacy. He and his friends are drawn from the ambushade to fight in the open. We thank God that General Grant is not to be raped for the third time, and that we may be hereafter permitted to discuss him and his claims and his qualifications and his availability without fear of hurting the feelings of those who have affected to think that he was being violated by Cameron, Conkling, and the other lesser Jakies who run with the machine. If the Presidency could be regarded as, under any conditions, a reward for military and patriotic service, General Grant for his distinguished achievements would be entitled to consideration; but we refuse to so regard it. General Grant demonstrated in eight years of executive service that he did not possess either the virtues or the qualities necessary to a successful civil administration of our national affairs. He is not the choice of a majority of the Republican party, if an honest expression of opinion can be obtained. He is not our choice, and we feel at liberty to discuss the merits of General Grant, his qualifications and character, as fully as those of any man in the commonwealth. General Grant is not the choice of Californian Republicans, and if by any manipulation a single delegate shall go to Chicago in the interest of the Grant machine it will be by procurement, fraud, and secret management.

The hounds are at it again. The sand-lot is in convulsions. Mayor Kallloch is playing the demagogue worse than ever. The Chronicle, having recovered from its scare, is endeavoring to incite a riot. It prints its daily eulogy of the "stalwart German," Hans Steinman, and of Mrs. Smith, the "neatly-dressed matron." The Call is growing timid as the Chronicle grows audacious, while the Bulletin is endeavoring to carry Kallloch. The truth of our situation is this: There are, in a population of three hundred thousand—most of whom are employed, and all of whom might be—about one thousand idle and discontented persons, male and female. Of this number, some are misguided dupes of artful demagogues, and some are vagrants and vicious idlers, not looking for work, and not willing to work. This crowd meet and threaten violence, make speeches, pass resolutions, and form processions. They demand impossible concessions. Kallloch flatters them and lies to them. The Chronicle publishes their proceedings, and the Call and Bulletin follow timidly in the wake of the Chronicle. Out of this there may come a riot, and it is perhaps just as well that it come now as later. If it does come, the journals we have named will be responsible for it. The condition is anomalous, and if our authorities would display a bold front it would be ridiculous. Within the last thirty days the Irish citizens of San Francisco have sent over £15,000 to Ireland for relief, and a thousand Irish (mostly) parade our streets demanding bread. Potatoes costing ten cents a bushel are being manufactured into whisky, and not a gin-mill or dead-fall has closed its doors on account of bard times. A Jesuit church has just been completed at a cost of nearly $2,000,000, and consecrated with music and banners in the presence of thirty thousand well-clad, well-fed, and well-behaved Irish men and women, who had cause to be grateful to Almighty God that they had been permitted to immigrate to this land of plenty. There are more men born in Ireland to-day holding office in California than can be induced to form in procession to march to the City Hall. There is no class in California so rich as the Irish. There are more Irish millionaires in San Francisco than of all other nationalities. The richest bank in California, with nearly $15,000,000 of deposits and property, is the Hibernia, and its depositors are mostly Irish, of the working class. A majority of the city officials, including the police, are of Irish birth. There are free lands in Marin, Sonoma, Napa, and Mendocino Counties, and Peter Donahue, a wealthy Irishman, owns an unincumbered railroad to them. He would refuse no honest man a passage to the country. There is near San Francisco a great unoccupied ranch, of fertile lands, owned by David Mahoney, and knowing his charitable desire to give employment to the poor, we are sure he would allow them to till his ranch at a nominal rent. Messrs. Lux & Miller, men of German birth, have four hundred thousand acres of fertile valley lands. They will aid any industrious family to acquire a home. To the willing and hard-working honest man they will advance seed and farm implements, and build a cabin, till money to pay for the land may be earned from it. Within a day's walking distance from San Francisco there is abundant labor on farms. Wages can be earned all along the northern coast by wood-chopping. In the foot-hills of the Sierras, free, fertile lands, in the best climate, and well adapted to fruit-growing, invite occupation. There is no suffering in California from cold or heat; there is no part of the State unhealthy. Life can be maintained for ten cents a day. Twenty-five cents will provide all the necessities of existence, except gin. Life is too easy in California, and that is what's the matter. There will be no riot in this city, or if there is it will be quickly crushed by the police, and that without anybody's interference.

"The best way is to afford relief until the present distress 'is abated, and then to do precisely what the Irish in this 'country are doing, namely, to forward money to aid the 'people in removing to this country, where they can earn a 'living.'—Morning Call. We are sorry to differ with the Call upon the question of Irish immigration, but if the servant girls will not put their advertisements in our journal they must take the consequences. We are not convinced that there is any such condition of destitution in Ireland as justifies the raking of America with a fine-tooth comb for alms. We are quite willing that the Call, Chronicle, and New York Herald should advertise their warm sympathies for small advertisements. We are willing that Irish people, out of their abundant wealth, should aid their less fortunate fellow-countrymen. We would commend to the Celtic family in America an entire abstention from gin and other alcoholic drinks, and suggest that the money be remitted to the Green Island for potatoes and bread. We would recommend that the money now being raised for Parnell and for

Denis Kearney—the money spent in political agitation—be directed into this charitable channel of relief to the Irish poor. We would have preferred that the money expended for the immense cathedral building on Fifth Avenue, and the immense church built on Van Ness Avenue, had been given to the starving worshippers on Irish soil. But Ireland is rich, and England is rich; and the rule that ought to prevail is to allow charity to be exhausted at home before it is exercised abroad. The class of Irish that is pinched at home by the misfortune of a bad season is the same that has, by its malicious and devilish agitation, reduced real estate values in San Francisco, and thereby brought poverty and distress to our own city; and we are selfish enough to think that not one dollar should be sent abroad till there are no suffering and destitute poor within our own town who deserve relief; and while the Chronicle, Call, and New York Herald are advertising to receive remittances for the Irish poor, with offers to print in Roman capitals the names of the generous donors, the Argonaut will do the same thing to those charitably inclined who will send aid to the deserving and unfortunate poor in the city of San Francisco.

European immigration of the class likely to be sent to America by political revolutions, financial disturbances, failure of crops, famine, and distress, does not commend itself to us as desirable. In truth, we think it unwise and altogether impolitic to endeavor to stimulate immigration from Europe to America; and especially do we think it unwise to aid that kind of people to come to our country who are unable to be self-supporting in the places of their birth. We hope we are not entirely unmindful of our duty to our fellow-men, and that we are not destitute of sympathy for the sufferings of any part of our race, but to send our money to bring from Italy its lazzaroni, or from any European State its worthless, bigoted, ignorant, pauper class, is, in our judgment, a crime against America, and a crime against those succeeding us, who have a right to take their inheritance from us unincumbered with this weight of bigotry, ignorance, and crime. There is a class of European immigrants that would be of service to us, and advance our progress—men of intelligence, skilled mechanical qualifications, industry, and good morals; men who bring money to make money, and who are content to allow Americans to control and direct the politics of America; capitalists, to establish banks, insurance companies, commercial houses, to engage in trade and manufacturing, to purchase and cultivate land. Of this class, and of that large, industrious, working, middle class, we can not have too many; but of that great other class we can not have too few.

The controversy between Messrs. Mahoney and Kallloch is a personal matter over Mr. Mahoney's personal business. Mr. Mahoney is endeavoring to sell Lake Merced to the city, as is very natural. The Mayor thinks it an undesirable purchase, and opposes it—opposes it by saying some unpleasant and uncomfortable things about the lake and its owner. Mr. Mahoney retorts, through the Chronicle, with some very unpleasant and uncomfortable things concerning the Mayor. We delight in the existence of this quarrel; we are rejoiced to see our sand-lot husband in the grip of the Irish bear. We say, "Go it, hubby! go it, bruin!" We don't care a tinker's imprecation, so long as we are not compelled to take our water from Mahoney and our politics and religion, mixed, from the Mayor. Mr. Mahoney is right when he calls Kallloch a demagogue, and is a demagogue himself when he blarneys over the "little Irish drayman." Mr. Kallloch is right to feel and express sympathy for honest, sober, family men out of employment, if they are willing to work; Mr. Kallloch becomes the demagogue and plays with fire when he recommends mass-meetings, processions, and agitations. Mayor Kallloch is right when he reads a practical temperance lecture to our foreign idlers and tramps, and counsels them to drink less beer and gin, and advises the unmarried to go to the country and to the mines for labor. Mayor Kallloch has a right to go to Sacramento to lobby the passage of a law to compel corporations to discharge their Chinese employees. Such a law ought to pass, if the Constitution demands. It ought then to be interpreted by the courts, and if it is good law the Chinese ought not to be employed. Mr. Kallloch is right to seek labor for working men, but he will be wise if he has the capacity to understand that the best way to make work, make good times, and make money plenty, is not to threaten the peace of the community, not to drive rich men and corporations out of business by prescribing whom they may hire, how many hours they may work their employees, and how much they may pay them.

Political England is again convulsed by some miscreant's malevolent revival of the question, "Did Mr. Freeman ever say: 'Perish India!'" It is a question of magnitude, certainly, but hardly so important, all things considered, as the question, "Has India been and gone and done it?" This greater conundrum should have precedence of consideration, and in the light of the answer the bearings of the lesser one on the interests of the British Empire—upon which, we hasten to add, the sun never sets—can be more accurately determined.

AFTERMATH.

Some two or three years ago Mr. Edison burst upon the world like a dazzling meteor, and every now and then since his first appearance he turns up with a new surprise. Mr. Edison has accomplished too much, and invented too many new things, and improved on too many old ones, to be rated as a visionary or set down as altogether a failure; but, after all his duplex telegraph business, his telephone invention, his stock indicator, his discovery that was to make deaf people hear through their open mouths, his headache panacea, his cure for neuralgia, his reproduction of the human voice from paper slips, and, lastly, his repeated failure in giving us an electric light, there is just the least suspicion that Mr. Edison is not quite as successful or scientific as his admirers would have us believe. His admirers, by the way, were shareholders in a stock company that is to grow rich just in proportion as stockholders in gas companies grow poor. Mr. Edison has now for the third time proclaimed his discovery of a cheap electric light. Three times he has raided upon gas stock, and three times he has been exposed to the humiliation of failure.

In the civilized world there are some two billion dollars of value in gas property, of which some four hundred million are in the United States. If a cheaper and better light can be discovered this property will decline in value; and had Mr. Edison a proper regard for his own reputation, or for the interests of his fellow-citizens, he would have been very careful before he allowed himself to be used as a hear to the gas stock market. So far, it is not demonstrated that he is an electrician; he has displayed an ignorance of the science that has subjected him to the criticism we print in another column from the London Saturday Review. The reader will, after perusing this article, come to the conclusion, as we have done, that he is not likely to invent a substitute for gas, or make progress in the discovery of a cheap electric light. The holder of gas stock that reads this article will not be likely to sacrifice his stock till some more trustworthy scientist than the electrician of Menlo Park proclaims the discovery of "the domestic sun."

In two columns of Sunday's Chronicle, side by side, occur the following: One is headed in startling capitals "Work or Bread," and then follows the account of a mob of men and women, numbering some hundreds, lead by a stalwart German named Hans Steinman, forming a procession to the Mayor's office to demand "bread or work." The other, also in bold lines, is headed "The Starving Irish," and then follow the names and amounts of money subscribed by persons in San Francisco to send to Ireland, with the announcement of $7,651.35 as the sum total. Our comment is this: If there are hundreds of working men and women in San Francisco starving for bread, it is criminal to send money to starving Ireland.

While up in heaven the greater lights
Rule, one the days and one the nights,
The small-fry stars rise, one behind
Another of the self-same kind—
Following each lesser light a lesser—
So John McComb's his own successor.

Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow. Yet their growing is "less than a circumstance"—whatever that may mean—compared with the growing of Miss Lutie Lagrange, who lives in Leadville, Colorado. Miss Lutie is not yet eleven, and weighed, at the last writing, three hundred and ten pounds. To those who appreciate the existing differences it may be comforting to know that Miss Lutie Lagrange is a prize Suffolk pig.

There is a warm controversy going on between General Sherman of the Army and General Boynton of the Press. So far, the quarrel illustrates the superiority of the pen over the sword in the hands of men who are entirely great; and, while General Sherman of the Army has lost his temper, General Boynton of the Press has preserved his dignity. General Boynton charges General Sherman with being vain, and, in his narration of the "march to the sea," of elevating himself to the prejudice of his comrades in arms; and General Sherman charges General Boynton with being a libeler, and one who for a thousand dollars would slander his own mother. We may be excused from passing judgment on the merits of this regrettable controversy between two brave soldiers and able men. General Sherman's Memoirs—out of the publication of which the controversy arose—were full of inaccuracies, as was to have been expected of a man who does all his thinking while talking, writing, and acting, as he needs must if he do it at all; but of intentional misrepresentation or injustice, either he must be acquitted or we must ascribe to his victims—Grant being the chief of them—a meekness and good nature which their champion might advantageously emulate.

If Grant, for example, has been as badly treated by General Sherman as General Boynton says, one would expect from him some sign of resentment, whereas he and Sherman have remained the warmest personal friends. All the same, General Boynton's criticisms on Sherman's Memoirs were made in permissible temper, with an apparently honest purpose, and were in many cases eminently sound. We think him entirely justified in demanding Sherman's trial by court-martial for assailing his character as an honest man and truthful journalist. His charges and specifications, we observe, are so drawn as necessarily to entail an examination of the whole matter of the truth or falsity of most of Sherman's book. If the trial is granted history will therefore be the gainer, no matter whose reputation loses.

The Mayor of Montreal has decided not to take any official part in the reception of Mr. Parnell. This is in respectable contrast to the action of the United States Congress in giving him the use of the Representatives' hall for no other reason than that he is a traitor to the British Crown, to which he has sworn allegiance. This country, an asylum for the suppressed of all nations, always hastens to mark in some public way its sense of the merit of every notorious enemy to other nations who can get together enough money to come here for more. If any European nation dared publicly and officially to honor the declared enemy of another and friendly people, an army of a million men would be set in motion to avenge the insult. Our remoteness and insignificance have hitherto given us impunity, but what we need is a good, sound, wholesome licking, to teach us manners.

A damboy sat on a coping,
And his bad, naughty brain was hoping
That the washman, Lop Hay,
Would happen that way,
For laggard was he, and moping.

Lop Hay was a shier of stones,
And supple the brawn on his bones;
And a limp damboy lay
At the feet of Lop Hay,
Who chuckled in tune with his moans.

Núñez, convicted murderer, tore up his shirt, soaped the shreds, twisted them into a rope, and by the aid of a broom-handle and a hole in the wall succeeded in producing such a stricture of the thrapple of him that he went to glory without any expense to the county, or any unpleasant exhibition of that efficacy of death-drop repentance which so discourages those who think, with us, that in the case of murderers the Lamb should be deprived of the pardoning power. We are entirely serious in the opinion that convicted murderers ought by law to be supplied with handier and surer appliances for suicide than broom-sticks, shirts, and soap.

John Paul Jones Saltpickle was not a had man in his way, but he had a consuming thirst for notoriety which nothing but his absence from the centre of population continued in full force. He lived in the wilds of Saucelito, and owned a duck ranch. He was a man of the times and believed in progress, and his latest scheme had been to manufacture a fowl combining the succulent delicacy of the turkey with the provident habits of the duck. The idea was praiseworthy, but his methods crude. Reversing the usual order of arrangement, he persuaded one of his best behaved lady ducks to sit on a baker's dozen of bronze turkey eggs. In due course the bronzelings came into the Saucelito sunshine. Unfortunately, the quackative mother persuaded them into an early still-hunt after crablets, and the ruthless flood tide blotted out the fair experiment in moribunded duckturks. Mr. Saltpickle, however, was not to be disappointed of his notoriety, and floated gracefully out with the sad ebh tide—a banquet for the shrimps.

The New York Sunday Times begins a column with the heading "A Column of Truth," but incontinently leaves off at nearly a quarter of a column from the bottom of the page. There was not enough truth in New York to fill it out.

The Irish societies have determined not to parade on St. Patrick's Day, and we are grateful that they have come to so wise a determination. In view of the present destitution in Ireland, it is a more fitting and graceful thing to send money to their suffering countrymen than to spend it in making an absurd display, that offends half the Irish-born citizens, and all that are born out of Ireland. A Catholic parade, with priests in open barouches and pictures of saints, is an offensive sight to all who are not Roman Catholics, while the flaunting of foreign flags is offensive to all citizens who are American horn, and the parade of military companies not in American uniform is an insult to the land that gives all foreigners an asylum and a home.

In the case of Samuel J. Tilden it does seem to us that Republicans protest too much. That Tilden, or "Sam Tilden," as party opponents familiarly style him, is corrupt, old, sick, unscrupulous, unpopular, can not carry Tammany, and is utterly weak and unavailable as the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, is the ever-chanted burden of the Republican party song. Now, if he is so unpopular, it would seem to be good policy on the part of Republicans to allow him to become the Democratic nominee. But he was elected Governor of New York, and made the best of financial exhibits. He quarrels with Tammany, and that raises a presumption in his favor. He received in the nation two hundred and fifty thousand more votes than President Hayes. This would seem to indicate his popularity. We know of nothing he has done since to forfeit the popular regard, unless it is to fight Tammany. Hence we question whether, under the circumstances of his eight to seven defeat, he would not be the strongest candidate the Democracy can present. He is the choice of the party, rank and file, in California, although we understand that ex-Senator Gwin, Senator Farley, Governor Irwin, and many other leading Democratic politicians have soured upon him. It is our opinion that Governor Tilden will be the next Presidential candidate of the Democratic party.

The Rev. Mr. Ward Crowley, we learn from New York dispatches, is under indictment for starving and otherwise annoying children under his care in the "Shepherd's Fold," and has been admitted to bail, one of his sureties being the godly parson of "the Church of the Heavenly Rest," who qualified in the sum of ten thousand dollars. Clearly the Rest is an opulent institution, and we may reasonably hope that the Fold will in time achieve an equal temporal prosperity under the economical régime of its pastor, approved by the other concern. We like to see brothers stand by one another under malicious prosecution, and so great is our love of justice that if it shall appear that the Rev. Mr. Ward Crowley is innocent, we shall hope he will receive a light sentence.

The opposition to the State Normal School has finally taken a practical shape: the building was burned down the other morning. We are of the opposition, but hope we shall not be understood as altogether approving the destruction of the building; it will probably entail another appropriation by the Legislature, which will somewhat cripple that body in its proposed endowment of a Chair of Pedagogy at the State University—a scheme of which we are avidly enamored. We have a blind old horse of irreproachable morals and honorable record, whom we favor for the professorship.

If there should arise any conflict between the sand-lot and the authorities, what position would Mayor Killoch assume? His duty would be at the head of the law-and-order forces—would he dare take any other position? These are mere conundrums. No conflict is likely to take place. There is no mob element in San Francisco. There are idlers, vagabonds, and ill-disposed persons, but no rioters—no desperate men to take their lives in their hands. We have a strong, well disciplined, and brave police force. Chief Crowley is a cool, self-possessed man, who has no sympathy with disturbers and who will think it humanity to fire low with cartridges of lead. Captains Lees, Short, and Douglas are bold, experienced, reliable, earnest men. So Mayor Killoch had better look to himself and think twice before he undertakes to lead his unwashed gang against the authorities of a city of which he is unfortunately the Mayor. His most equivocal and outrageous speech of Sunday justifies us in suspecting that he is a villain, and is plotting mischief.

Boston, following the Quincy plan, has discontinued the teaching of vocal music in the public schools, and Mr. Lowell Mason, who has for a quarter of a century imposed his not valuable services upon the tax-payers of the "Hub," has now been imposed upon the public purse of Japan at six thousand dollars a year salary. We thank the good God who made the earth that west of us he placed Japan, so that some of the Boston nonsense may drift by us. Herebefore the Yankee singing-school masters have all stopped in San Francisco. We wish they would all go west and teach the heathen how to sing.

The following is vouched for by a reputable clerk in one of our leading music stores: Madame F— M— M— came into the store to order some music. While there, Mr. X—, a pianist, was introduced to her. She had recently given a concert at which she had sung a Bacchanale. Mr. X— had been at the lady's concert and praised her voice, no end. "But the composition," said he, "the composition was certainly very bad. How could you have chosen such stuff? Who could have written it?" "It was written by my former husband." "Surely? I thought I recognized some good things in it; but they were all drowned by the insufferable roaring of the basso. Who is the fellow?" "Oh, he is my present husband."

A Chinese proverb says that the conjuror does not deceive the man who heats the gong for him. Are we to suppose that Mayor Killoch's tonguing and posturing are not "understanded" by Mr. Denis Kearney?

They do say that the last feather which occasionally breaks the back of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction is a cock-tail feather.

Twixt Grant and Von Moltke this difference fine
The deaf may discern as they run:
Von Moltke is silent in languages nine,
And Grant says nothing in one.

"McDade" considered the bill "unconstitutional," and who in the devil's name is McDade, and what does he know about constitutional law?

HIS LETTER.

A San Francisco Teacher to his Friend in Los Angeles.

I am writing, dear Dan, in my garret—
A den you would call it—and, lo!
The tallow-dip melting beside me
Has blotted my sheet in its flow.
These Minna Street lodgings, O Daniel,
Are simple and rustic, you know.

The truth is, old fellow, I'm skipping
A dance on that shadowy line
Which separates beefsteaks and plenty,
Good lodgings, good cheer, and good wine
From stomachs atwist and atremble,
From pawn-shops and straw-ticks like mine.

You see, they have shaved us. The city,
In some unaccountable way,
Has chosen a Board of Directors,
Of whom there are seven who say—
That conscience—that aviv most rare—
Compels them to cut down the pay.
Just think of it, Daniel!—a school board
Encumbered with conscience that way!

My room-mate is Jack of the Union;
We taught for a season or so
In Stanislaus County together,
Some five or six summers ago.
Poor fellow! he's under the blankets,
And dreaming of oysters, I know.

We've skirmished the city all over;
We've panned every rag in the fold;
And Jack has a list of the places
Where fifteen-cent dinners are sold.
But Spring Valley water and turnips
Fill out, in the absence of gold.

John Swett called to see me last evening,
And borrowed my only white vest;
And I fear he will lend it to Denman,
Who suffers for clothes like the rest.
The fact is a trifle, but shows you
How closely the teachers are pressed.

The ladies, dear creatures—the "schoolmarm's,"
As Wadham would sneeringly say—
Are also distressed and distracted,
And fear is the rule of the day.
I'd marry them all, if they'd have me,
And start for Salt Lake right away.

Good-bye, dear old fellow—I'm going;
My wash-woman treads on the stair;
She had on her war-paint this morning,
And threatened to claw me right there.
I will leave her to Jack's tender mercies;
He knows how to deal with the fair.

Just this, ere I wind up my letter:
If you are approached with a plea
To succor the suffering Irish,
Or any one over the sea,
Just turn a deaf ear to entreaty
And send all your surplus to me.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1880. D. S. RICHARDSON.

THE GREAT EDISON SCARE.

What a happy man Mr. Edison must be! Three times within the short space of eighteen months he has had the glory of finally and triumphantly solving a problem of world-wide interest. It is true that each time the problem has been the same, and that it comes up again after each solution, fresh, smiling, and unsolved, ready to receive its next death-blow. But this peculiarity of his triumphs, though interesting from a practical point of view, is doubtless of too trifling a character to damp the joy of victory in Mr. Edison's own mind, since it appears in no degree to interfere with the plaudits with which his followers hail each fresh achievement—or, as we should rather say, bulletin—from Menlo Park. And thus not only is Mr. Edison to be congratulated on the happy past, but his friends may look forward to a long and equally happy future, crowned at periodical intervals by similar dazzling and final triumphs; for, if he continues to observe the same strict economy of practical results which has hitherto characterized his efforts in electric lighting, there is no reason why he should not for the next twenty years completely solve the problem of the electric light twice a year, without in any way interfering with its interest or novelty.

But all this, we are told, is altered now. We are given to understand, by accounts from head-quarters, that this time Mr. Edison really has done it; and descriptions of the perfection and economy of the light are showered upon us which quite take away one's breath. That the light itself is all that its inventor could by any possibility desire will not surprise any one who has had experience with inventors; but it does startle us to be told that its cost will be only one-fortieth that of gas. In the face of such definite assertions incredulity would seem to be a crime, and it would appear to be the duty of all gas directors to make forward contracts to deliver old iron, in view of the immediate future when gas will be spoken of as a thing of the past. Curiosity, however, is such a persistent trait of the human mind that one can not repress a desire to know the exact details of this all-transforming discovery, and to form one's own opinion of the sources of its transcendent merits. Fortunately, the veil of mystery that has so long hung over the doings of Mr. Edison's laboratory has at last been drawn aside, and we are in full possession of the magic secret. It does not sound very wonderful after all. There is nothing new in the lamp. It is an ordinary incandescent lamp, with a slip of carbon as the substance to give forth the light. The sole secret is that Mr. Edison makes the carbon out of burnt paper.

The discovery bears strong marks of Mr. Edison's bandiwork. Like all the other so-called discoveries of his in connection with electric lighting (with one exception, of which we will speak presently), it is wholly without novelty, unless there be some unimportant details in the particular form of the connections and regulating mechanism, in which he has chosen to exhibit that ingenuity which he undoubtedly possesses, but which could have been as well arranged in a thousand other ways. The idea of a lamp consisting of a piece of carbon placed in a vacuum and rendered incandescent by the passage through it of a strong galvanic current is at least as old as 1845, when it was patented by King, and similar devices have since been continually proposed and employed by others. Experience, however, taught inventors (as it will probably teach Mr. Edison when he has a little more acquaintance with the subject) that a vacuum is a very awkward thing to deal with, and that much more satisfactory results could be obtained by placing the carbon in a non-combustible gas, such as nitrogen, or carbonic acid. Accordingly, recent lamps in which incandescent carbon has been used have generally been of that type. Such was the Sawyer and Mann lamp, which excited so much attention in New York some twelve months ago, and which consisted of a thin rod of carbon in a receiver full of nitrogen. Of late we have heard nothing of this lamp, and we very much fear that it is another instance of the fatal gulf between theory and practice, and that its disappearance from public view is due to the existence of some practical difficulties in the application of what seemed to be an ingenious idea. Other lamps are upon similar principles; the most successful one, so far as we can judge by report, is a French one, in which there are three small carbon rods in a closed receiver, the oxygen of which is consumed by the combustion of one of the rods, leaving the atmosphere in the receiver incombustible during the incandescence of the other two. Nor is there any more originality in the idea of procuring the carbon for such lamps from burnt paper or cardboard. That such carbon was very suitable for producing light by incandescence has long been known to electricians. Mr. Swan used it fifteen years ago for an electric lamp on the incandescent principle, and, curiously enough, used it in the shape of a horseshoe, exactly as Mr. Edison is now using it; so that there must be something more than a resemblance between the two lamps, seeing that the carbon and the enclosing glass vessel (which may be of any shape) constitute the whole of the lamp proper. The use of this carbon was given up because of its want of durability—a difficulty which, however, Mr. Swan says that he has now got over; and it seems to be tolerably evident from Mr. Edison's own account that he has done little or nothing to remedy this defect, of which he is probably not fully aware. At any rate, it is clear that the carbons he uses are fragile in the extreme, for he says that they must be taken out of the mould with the greatest care, to prevent their falling to pieces.

The general result, therefore, is that Mr. Edison leaves the subject of the electric light precisely where he found it, so far as discovery is concerned. He has added nothing to our knowledge. The next thing to consider is, whether or not his lamp performs the practical service claimed; whether, in short, the method he adopts—by whomsoever invented—will in fact accomplish what is alleged of it. Considered in themselves, there can be no doubt that the tales that have come over to us about Mr. Edison's new discovery are in the highest degree improbable. The use of incandescence as a means of procuring light from electricity, without breaking the continuity of the circuit, has been known from nearly the beginning of the century, and all its advantages and disadvantages have been thoroughly studied. The result has always been to show that it is a very wasteful method of using the electric current when compared with the electric arc or the broken circuits of such lamps as the Regnier and Werdermann, which hold an intermediate position between the two classes. It possesses great advantages, which are obvious at first sight; but so great is the disadvantage of which we have spoken that its use has been very limited, except for special purposes, as, for example, the little medical lamps for illuminating the cavities of the body to facilitate diagnosis. That this principle should turn out to be the enormous commercial success that Mr. Edison's lamp is represented to be is in the highest degree unlikely, seeing that, as we have said, his lamp differs but slightly, if at all, from lamps previously known. Nor do the accounts themselves that have reached us tend to reassure us much. They show clearly that this lamp is more fragile and more difficult to handle than any of its compeers. They do not give us the least reason to think that it has any elements of success in it other than the bright character of the incandescence of carbon made from paper; and as such carbon can not materially differ in its qualities from other kinds, and is even more liable to be heterogeneous and uncertain, this small advantage seems to be a very slight matter to build such high hopes upon. They do not suggest any way of getting over the difficulty which is met with in lamps constructed on this principle, of keeping the glass from getting dulled by particles of carbon coming off from the incandescent mass within it—a difficulty which would be peculiarly fatal to a vacuum lamp like Mr. Edison's, which can not be cleaned on the inside. But, above all, there is a strong flavor of humbug about the whole matter. Every account—even those which Mr. Edison himself seems to have authorized—is written in a way in which no good electrician could write. We have a sensational account of the supposed discovery, where a thin filament of carbon is represented as having been accidentally tried with a strong current, and we are told, as of a newly discovered marvel of science, that this carbon filament resisted an intense heat, and "proved in reality more infusible than platinum." As though every school-boy who has dabbled in chemistry did not already know that carbon was incomparably more infusible than platinum, or indeed than any other substance.

Then there are references to other electrical phenomena which have about as much to do with the matter as the processes of electrotyping would have, but all of which are ingeniously identified with the so-called discovery, as though they specially belonged to Mr. Edison's lamp. Thus it is explained that the current can be made to run a sewing-machine; and other potentialities are vaguely shadowed forth which are said to be dependent on a knowledge of the laws of electricity. Of course, a continuous current can be made to do work in a thousand different ways; but what have the marvels of electricity in general to do with the question whether Mr. Edison's lamp is a good one? Again, there is the new dynamo-electric machine. Mr. Edison must, of course, come before the public in a state of complete independence of all other inventors, so he must not even get his electricity from the same sources as others. Hence, for a second time, he produces a dynamo-electric machine, which he calls by the pompous title of the Faradaic machine. It merits this title only in virtue of its representing a state of knowledge more nearly that of Faraday's time than any machine in use at present. It is strange how Mr. Edison's efforts in electric lighting seem cursed with a total absence of originality. This machine, both in its separate parts and its general arrangement, is the merest copy from other machines. Its principle, its arrangement, and everything about it are so utterly unoriginal, that really it is difficult to understand how Mr. Edison himself can fancy he has any claim to be considered its inventor. It only differs from the machines at present in use in that it is much what they must have been in their early forms, before their makers had learned how to intensify the magnetic field in which the armatures rotate. He drops hints of machines that utilize ninety per cent. of the power applied to them. The correctness of this figure, if it is intended to apply to this machine, we cannot believe in. Such a percentage is about what is expected from a good machine on the Siemens's Gramme or Brush principle, and it is simply absurd to suppose that this blundering imitation, which is destitute of all the special improvements which experience has suggested to their makers, can contend with these machines on equal terms.

All these circumstances, and many others, cause us to regard with utter distrust the glowing accounts of Mr. Edison's invention (if it is entitled to be called such) that reach us from New York. And, added to this, there is the remembrance of what happened some eighteen months ago, at the beginning of Mr. Edison's experiments on the electric light. Every one recollects how, in October, 1878, there came a telegram from New York that Mr. Edison had completely solved the problem of electric lighting, and how this telegram caused a tremendous panic in gas shares, sending them down to two-thirds of their previous value. Even the instructed, who could detect, in the very language in which the telegram was couched, evidence that it was framed either by or for persons who were ignorant of the subject, scarcely dared to imagine that such a telegram could have been allowed to go forth, or to remain uncontradicted, unless Mr. Edison had really obtained most important results, and was in a position to effect practically electric lighting at a reasonable cost. It is fortunate for Mr. Edison that public attention can not remain very long fixed upon any one subject, and that by the time that a few months had elapsed people had ceased to think of him or his telegram; for we now know in what position he stood when that outrageous telegram was sent. And it is well that we are able to arrive at this from sources directly connected with Mr. Edison himself, for it would otherwise be impossible to convince any one of the true state of the case. Some six or eight months after this telegram two patents, representing the latest completed results which even then Mr. Edison had obtained, came over to this country, and were made public amidst the universal derision of all who knew anything about electricity. The wonderful secret that was to solve completely the problem of electric lighting was the use of incandescent platinum (or an alloy of platinum and iridium, we forget which) to give light. It would seem that Mr. Edison has an irresistible passion for electrical antiquities. Not only is this one of the very oldest devices known, but it was actually patented in 1848 by Staitte, though we doubt whether such a principle could even then have been the subject of a valid patent unless there had been something special in the form in which it was applied. We forget whether Mr. Edison attempted to patent his lamp, or even if he had any lamp at all at the time; but he certainly patented a regulator, which was intended to turn off the current when the heat of the platinum got too intense. This was a simple instrument, of little or no merit, and deserving of no notice. We really do not know whether it was able to do its work; we have heard that it failed even to do that; but whether or not this was the case is of no moment, for, so far as we have been able to learn, both the lamp and the regulator have, for all practical purposes, proved abortive. We have never heard of their being tried on any practical scale, or even of their being used at all outside of Menlo Park; and, whatever may be Mr. Edison's love of perfection, we do not believe for an instant that, if he had got a really practical lamp, capable of doing a fraction of what that was represented to do, he would have let months pass without its coming into the market.

But these two were not the only precious gifts which were then bestowed on the world by Mr. Edison. There was a third, to which no disparaging remarks as to its extreme simplicity could be applied. The second patent then taken out by him was for a wonderful dynamo-electric machine of a wholly new construction. We willingly give Mr. Edison credit for originality in this machine. Coils were fixed to the vibrating arms of a monstrous tuning-fork more than a yard long, and these, by the vibrations of the fork, were made to approach or recede from magnets, and thus currents were generated. If it were not actually in a patent taken out on Mr. Edison's behalf, all instructed persons would hesitate to believe that such an absurd arrangement could be seriously proposed at a time when such machines as the Gramme, the Siemens's, the Lontin, the Brush, and a host of others were in existence, much less that it could be proposed by a man of Mr. Edison's advantages and fame. It is difficult adequately to express the ludicrous inefficiency of the arrangement; but one thing is abundantly certain, and that is, that the person who seriously proposed it was wholly destitute of a scientific knowledge of either electricity or the science of energy. It is clear that he was tempted by the hope of getting out of the vibrations of the tuning-forks something more than the force he expended on them. No doubt he thought that vibration was so confirmed a habit with tuning-forks that they would vibrate on the merest hint being given to them. To those who remember the amusement that this wonderful invention excited among English electricians, it will be interesting to read the following passage from the latest authentic American account: "Mr. Edison's first experiment in machines for generating the electric current did not meet with success. His primal apparatus was in the form of a large tuning-fork, constructed in such a way that its ends vibrated with great rapidity before the poles of a large magnet. These vibrations could be produced with comparatively little power. Several weeks of practice proved, however, that the machine was not practicable, and it was laid aside." We should very much like to know when these weeks of practice (not a very long trial for a new invention) took place. Not before the patenting, or it would never have been patented. Then it must have been after the patent was taken out—a matter which confirms the opinion held by most persons in England who were competent to judge of it, that no such machine had at the time ever been made (except, perhaps, on a small scale), and that the whole matter was a pure speculative suggestion. Remembering the unrivaled opportunities for experiment possessed by Mr. Edison, the fact that he took out this patent without any adequate preliminary trial—and we are convinced that a most superficial investigation would have demonstrated its worthlessness—is a striking lesson as to the reliance that must be placed on the accounts of the extent of the preliminary experiments to which his so-called inventions are subjected. We can assure Mr. Edison that it will require a long list of successes, not only announced, but realized, to counteract in the minds of those capable of judging of it the effect which that absurd patent has had in convicting him of being a man with no scientific knowledge of electricity, and either so incapable of judging of the value of his work or so careless of his own reputation as to be ready to patent a machine which on a few weeks' trial proves itself, on his own confession, to be an utterly worthless device.

These petty results, or rather the small fraction of them that he had obtained six months previously to their publication, represent all that Mr. Edison had actually completed when the famous telegram was sent. In other words, he had not the slightest ground for announcing that he had made any substantial advance in the treatment of the electric light, much less that he had completely solved its difficulties. Now we do not suppose for a moment that Mr. Edison would aid in giving currency to a report which he did not believe to be true. The most probable hypothesis is that he is an inventor who is absolutely intoxicated with his own reputation, and who has an unlimited belief not only in the efficiency, but also in the novelty of all that he proposes. In no other way is his conduct comprehensible. The exciting cause of the celebrated telegram could not have amounted to more than that, having thought a little over the difficulties of the rival plans for producing the electric light, he resolved to concentrate his efforts upon the oldest and the easiest—namely, incandescence in the continuous circuit. Having resolved in his own mind that this was the best form, his vanity treated success as so certain that we honestly believe he viewed it as a grand new departure in electricity, whereas it was only what hundreds had done before, and hundreds will do again. Then he went on floundering through all that his predecessors had gone through before him; advancing knowledge not one whit, inasmuch as all his results were old, but still pressing on with the profoundest conviction that everything that came upon him as a novelty was new also to the world. It is only by keeping these things in mind that we can judge of the value of the recent reports of his successes, and we can come to no other conclusion about them than that without independent confirmation they are not worthy of credence. It is not that we do not think that Mr. Edison is likely to help in the development of electric lighting. On the contrary, considering his unexampled advantages, it is matter for surprise that so ingenious a man has not discovered something worthy of remark by this time. For he is undoubtedly an inventor of exceptional merit. Independently of the important share he has had in the development of quadruplex telegraphy, his success in the carbon and loud-speaking telephones shows that he is possessed of great inventive power and remarkable mechanical ingenuity. His other great achievement, the phonograph, would alone go a long way toward justifying his enormous reputation. But these successes seem to have completely turned his head. He allows the wildest reports of his doings to obtain currency. The same account to which we have referred speaks of his having recently invented an air-pump, a method of utilizing mining tailings, a sextuple telegraph, and a specific against headaches. This last child of his fertile brain is old enough to be christened, and rejoices in the mysterious name of Polyform, and the reporter goes so far as to state that Mr. Edison takes it himself. But this must surely be an exaggeration. Altogether he reminds us forcibly of the White Knight in Through the Looking-glass, and we expect soon to hear that he has—

"Completed his design
To save the Menai Bridge from rust
By boiling it in wine."

It will be remembered that the White Knight also had invented devices for the preservation of his health. All these things make us feel that Mr. Edison is not capable of judging of his own performances, and confirm us in the belief that his latest idea is but a doubtful rival of many lamps that are already in the market. The calculation as to its costing one-fortieth the price of gas is an utterly absurd one, even when read by the light of the meagre details on which it professes to be based. The most economical form of electric light is, and in all probability always will be, the arc-lamp, where it can be used on a large scale, and no form of incandescent lamp can approach it in economy of production. Yet engineers are very well satisfied if they can bring down its cost, even under the most favorable circumstances, to between two-fifths and one-fourth the price of gas. We feel tolerably certain that the cost of Mr. Edison's lamp, even if it is otherwise practicable (about which we have a good deal of doubt), will be many times this. The only good point about the news is that Mr. Edison seems at last to have settled down to the useful detail work of trying various methods of improving the manufacture of carbon for electric purposes. This is much wanted, and Mr. Edison is exactly in a position to do it. But, supposing that a manufacturer of artificial carbons were to discover that it was better to use barley-meal than wheat-flour, or lump sugar than moist sugar, in their preparation, we should be considerably surprised to find him announcing himself to the world by telegram as being the greatest inventor of the age. In our opinion, Mr. Edison's pretentious announcements are as little justified by the fact that he has satisfied himself as to what is the best form of carbon to use in the ordinary and well-known incandescent method of electric lighting, as a candle manufacturer would be justified in announcing that he had completely solved the problem of domestic lighting because he had devised a slightly improved candle-wick.

In an article on "The Literary Calling and its Future," in one of the current English magazines, Mr. James Payn, the novelist, makes a vigorous attack upon the laus temporis acti as applied to literature, and asserts categorically of modern periodical literature that, "however small may be its merits, it is at least ten times as good as ancient periodical literature (that of the early Edinburgh Review, for instance) used to be."

CURRENT COMMENT.

Says the New York Dispatch: "Out, damned spots! But the spots will not out. The sons of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales—Prince Albert Victor and his brother George—serving as 'middies' on board one of her Majesty's ships, the Bacchante, have actually been tattooed, and now their royal noses bear the protuberant proclamation of England's power and supremacy in 'broad arrows' of the approved gunpowder tint of royal blue. Surgeons have been consulted and physicians advised with, but not all the medications or machinery at the service of science can efface the evidence of boyish folly in the cockpit of that war-ship."

Says the New York Mercury: "The Shah of Persia has written a book which shows that he is fond of the Koran, ballet girls, and of pictures that would cause Comstock to shudder. In St. Petersburg His Majesty was shown the elephant and the ballet by the sedate Grand Duke Alexis; at Vienna he was charmed with the most fascinating and lively belles of the blue Danube; at Berlin Prince Fritz revealed to him all the delicacies of the season; and in Paris he fairly went wild over the opera ballet girls and numerous other Parisian eye-openers. The Shah seems also to have fallen in love with a picture of 'Venus Rising from the Sea,' in all her fresh and roseate beauty, which the Princess Mathilde presented to him."

Says the New York Tribune: "The cave-openers are at it again. Closely following the announcement of the wonderful cave in Adams County, Ohio, where was found the recumbent figure of a colossal Mercury, winged helmet and all, and a nine-foot mummy, there comes news of the exploration of a rival cave in Missouri, where is found a beautifully finished temple, cut from solid granite, a model of architectural splendor, with colonnades and arches, naves and transepts, and carving on the walls in 'characters closely resembling the Phœnician.' One of the apartments is described as 'a room hewn out of solid limestone, thirty-five feet wide, fifty feet long, thirty feet high, and vaulted to the centre, the ceiling being forty-five feet from the floor in the middle of the room. At intervals of ten feet are graceful slender columns of granite, with square base fantastically carved in imitation of some unknown plant. The shafts, like the shaft supporting the arch, are surmounted by capitals.' Nothing is known at this moment against the veracity of the reporters, because they are too modest to give their names to the public."

Says the Washington Republic: "Now and then crime holds a special carnival. On one day last month a New York lawyer shot himself, a retired army musician hung himself, the dead body of a man was found hidden among the rocks at Paterson, in Milwaukee a man killed his wife and then himself, a woman confessed an eight-year-old murder, a negro in Maryland assailed a young lady and was lynched, an old man was murdered by tramps, a clergyman at Syracuse went to the insane asylum, woman case, the moonshiners killed two marshals in Tennessee, a man in Georgia blew his brains out in the presence of his wife and child, one in Indiana stabbed a man in a quarrel about a dog, a lawyer in Fort Scott was shot and killed by an unknown man, a boatman in Georgetown committed suicide, and the lover who kills himself in the presence of the girl who refuses to marry him turned up in New York."

Says the New York World: "Some fatality has attached itself to the number three during the year 1879. Serious attempts have been made upon the lives of three of the crowned heads of Europe—the Emperors of Russia and Germany and the King of Italy. Three potentates have been dispossessed—the Ameer of Cabul, the Khedive of Egypt, and the King of Zululand. Three famous actors have died—Falconer, Buckstone, and Mathews, and the 'fourth estate' is not without its fatal adhesion to the unlucky numeral. Three editors or proprietors of our foremost newspapers have bidden 'a long farewell to all their greatness'—Lawson, Delane, and Sergeant Cox."

Says the New York World: "Some London wag has executed the following skit at Henry Irving and his great admirer, the Baroness Burdett-Coutts: It is said that the baroness, hearing that there was discontent in her servant's hall, so that, in fact, the whole corps had determined to leave, sent for the butler, and inquired: 'Now, Jones, what does it mean?' Butler—'Beggin' your ladyship's parding. Which we humbly desire to explain our conduct, having hony one complaint to make. We do not hobject to Mr. Enery Irvin at breakfast, though hevery day; nor we do not hobject to Mr. Enery Irvin at lunch and dinner, though he do rarely miss. Nor we do not hobject to Mr. Enery Irvin at supper hevery night. But what we do most respectfully hobject to is that, whenever any one of us las a hevenin' hout, we should be expected to go to the dress suckle of the Lyceum and clap continuous.'"

Says the Pall Mall Gazette: "If there was a conservative Czar, his son was sure to be a reformer; if he had Western ideas and a turn for constitutions the Czarowitch was impressed just as strongly with the folly of putting a new piece into an old garment. As far back as the fifteenth century we hear of serious disputes between the Czar and the Czarowitch; and now we find the Emperor of all the Russias and the heir to the throne still at loggerheads. 'Ah! you find fault with my political acts,' cried Ivan IV., when the Czarowitch asked leave to go and fight the Poles. 'This is treason! Who knows if you have not already conceived the design of raising the standard of revolt against me? Rebel! you are leagued with the boyards in a conspiracy to dethrone me.' A goodly array of historians are pretty well agreed that it was no hatred of the Czarowitch's person that prompted the savage blow with which Ivan clenched his argument. The Prince was the one object that he loved in the world; and we read that when it was too late he fell upon his body in a paroxysm of despair, and, for once, Ivan the Terrible became Ivan the Tender. He called surgeons and sorceresses, and promised treasures and titles to any who would conjure back to life his son."

Said Madame De Staël bitterly: "The coalition of two women on the banks of Lake Geneva frightened the master of the world." A coalition of two women will frighten any man. They are the flint and the man is the powder.

The past week has not been prolific of the highest order of dramatic and musical entertainments. What with the commencement of the Lenten season—a year dreaded by all theatrical managers and "stars"—and the disintegration, founded on professional jealousy, of the Wilhelmj troupe, the local amusement world is in temporary partial eclipse. In order to bring herself to perform at all in Lent, Miss Clara Morris would appear to have had as tough a wrestle with her conscience as that experienced by "Launcelot Gobbo," when he found "the devil pulling him one way and his conscience the other." But so as not to disappoint Manager Maguire, and to fill an ugly gap caused by the Wilhelmj break-up, the lady so far compromised with her conscience as to act for just three nights, the last of these being the opening one of Lent.

Augustin Daly's version of the French drama The Countess of Somerive, more commonly known as Alixé, was the pièce de résistance during the first three nights of the week at the Baldwin. The play is of the French, Frenchy, in which airiness, sprightliness, frivolity, and extreme improbabilities all emanate from a plot of the slimmest texture. Like most Gallic dramas, however, the construction is commendably close, not a word being wasted in the development of the story, such as it is. The piece is by no means new to a San Francisco audience, having been performed here as long ago as 1874, and it has had one or two brief runs since. Nevertheless, as it has just been rendered by a different cast, with the exception of Miss Morris, it will bear a little fresh handling. Alixé, as we will call it, will, like Article 47 and Divorce, betenacious of life among society plays, lasting as long as there are essentially society actors, of whom Miss Clara Morris is the type, to enact the leading feminine roles. We will not stop to inquire into the quality of the public taste which delights in witnessing such productions, in which there is more ephemeral enjoyment than solid instruction. Indeed, there is altogether too much cant uttered concerning the "legitimate drama;" for, despite of all preaching to the contrary, the public will take leave to stamp as "legitimate" that which pleases it best, and will bestow its patronage accordingly. The author of Alixé has kept aloof from a practice, founded on the pernicious modern "star system," of writing a play in which most of the characters are kept quite subordinate to a principal lady and gentleman. It is true that of all Shakspeare's works there is only one—Othello—in which two male "stars" will appear, the part of "Iago" being considered as great as the title role. But nearly all the characters in every one of the great dramatist's productions call for good actors. The same may be said of Alixé. The attention of an audience is by no means absorbed in the nervously sensitive young lady of that name, and her eccentric lover. All the other characters evoke a considerable, if a lesser, interest than the unhappy couple.

As the confiding and betrayed "Alixé," Miss Morris has an opportunity to exhibit all the phases of her peculiar talent—filial and other love, strong emotion, tenderness, the power to evince and conquer intensified feeling, to forgive a generally considered unpardonable wrong, magnanimity, devotion, and finally despair which overwhelms and crushes her and leads to her self-destruction. This pretty well covers the gamut of feeling. We assume that most play-goers are familiar with the plot. To put the gist of it in two or three sentences: "Alixé" is in love with and is loved by "Henri de Kerdran," who has previously been betrothed to "Lucienne," the daughter of the "Count de Somerive." His wife, "Madame de Valery," had run away from him, and she turns out to be the mother of "Alixé." She discovers that "Henri de Kerdran," her lover, is likewise the lover of her half-sister "Lucienne." By a strange fatality all these meet on common ground, as the guests of the "Marquis and Marquise de Cesaranne." Here, of course, is abundance of combustible material, and, after several scenes, the only short cut which "Alixé" sees out of the trouble is for her to destroy herself, and she does so accordingly, thus leaving the field clear to her half-sister "Lucienne." In all the scenes, from the opening one, in which "Alixé" receives a letter from her mother, to the dénouement, when she is carried in dead from a neighboring pond, Miss Morris was the centre of interest. Her corpse-like appearance was only tolerable to be gazed at on the ground that it was known to be unreal. The water-lilies which she had convulsively grasped in her death struggle she still clutched in her hands, and the curtain fell on a sorrowful group.

Mr. James O'Neill is usually considered the beau idéal of a stage lover, one fashioned after Michael Cassio, who was "framed to make women false;" but he by no means sustains this reputation as "Henri de Kerdran." True, he found himself in a very embarrassing dilemma, similar to that occupied by "Captain Macleath," in The Beggars' Opera, when he exclaimed: "How happy could I be with either were 'tother dear charmer away." It certainly is awkward to be engaged to marry two ladies at the same time, and to have them both meet and discover the unpleasant fact. Nevertheless this does not furnish a reason—nor does the play demand it—for storming in their presence, and there and then quarreling with a rival. Mr. O'Neill evidently disliked the role, and what one dislikes he seldom performs well. His pathetic reading, however, of the poor suicide's letter, in the last scene, as she lay before him a ghastly corpse, made amends for some of his previous shortcomings. Mr. Lewis Morrison, as the wealthy old roué, the "Duc de Mirandol," rather overacted the character, especially in his boisterous love-making with "Alixé," whose opposition to his suit he could not understand, as he declared that he had succeeded by similar means "with hundreds of women before."

Social Sacramento.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—You are wise (you think you are, which amounts to the same thing!), can you tell us how people dance all night, three and four times a week, look bright the next day, and charming and fresh, in new toilets, every other evening? How do they do it? We wish they'd stop it, they do make us so tired! And where do you suppose all that energy comes from?—and those floating, fleecy dresses, that make girls look as if they had Heaven in their memories?—and those heavy, handsome toilets, that make matrons look as if they had three hanks to back them? And who toils for all those lovely things? Be it father, or brother, or husband, or lover, we say it is a shame that Miss M. wore a point-lace overdress at the Undine party, and Mrs. W. diamonds as big as hazelnuts, while Ireland is starving for flour, and Sacramento newsboys go cold and ragged! Yes, we howl and rant and rage—it's a burning shame! And we would accept so graciously the exquisite overdress, and imagine we looked bewitching 'neath its filmy folds; and we would shine so brilliantly in the hazelnut diamonds—if we could. But as we can't, we're going to screech "vanity" and "selfishness" after these be-diamonded and be-laced women. That's the way the world does, and we're of the earth, earthy.

Well, after all this little moralizing, we'll tell you about the Undine, Monday night, which was really worth seeing and hearing about. You must know that it is a boat club, and they row on the river in their pretty little boats in the summer, probably stowing away muscle for these parties that they give every winter. Formerly they were very, very swell, very dress, very—very—ten dollars! The older portion of aristocracy frequented them. Now, they have rather given place to younger, nimbler members; and these same members are not miserly, and are quite content with one dollar and a half per man. But they are just as swell, just as successful and entertaining. They give them in Turner Hall, which is our best dancing hall; and they decorate the room so prettily in flags and flowers and mirrors and bird-cages and tele-a-letes. After supper, this year, it was converted into a leap-year party, and all those dear damsels had to solicit programmes and bow thanks and stand up while gentlemen were seated, and fan them devotedly, and bring them ices, etc. It was real sport, too, and they carried it on perfectly—perhaps because they had such a good leader or floor director, Miss Jennie Lindley; and she was just the one, too, to blow that whistle gracefully when all was ready, and to walk up to strange gentlemen and introduce them to wall-flowers to make out the sets. All the young people were there that attend parties—the Misses Milliken, Acock, Felter, Johnson, Cosby, Arnold, Quinn, Garfield, Seelye, Bonte, Lyons, Minis, Tyrell, Tyler, Henley, Ramage, Edwin, and hundreds of others, both married and single. They all were attended by their cavaliers; and so much bright young beauty, seen all at once, made it hard to decide which beauty was brightest, which face fairest. And the toilets were all so very tasteful and becoming. How they must have racked their fertile brains to devise them!

Of course you heard of the Governor's reception, Friday night. Every sister and cousin and aunt and attendants was at that Pavilion. It was crush and cram and crowd from ten P. M. until three A. M. Certainly two thousand five hundred people tried to shake the Governor's hand that night—poor hand! The Governor gave his friends a feast, and the caterer gave the Governor a bill for $7,000.

Breathe it not to Ada Ven, but we are, we are invited to a "two-and-a-half" tea. BETSY AND I.

Surely the many friends of the late William V. Wells—and no man in this community had more while he lived—will be glad to hear that a number of our best musical artists have arranged a matinée for the benefit of his widow, to be given at the Bush Street Theatre (kindly furnished by Mr. Locke) on Thursday afternoon, 26th instant. The programme, which will be ready for distribution early next week, will contain much that is excellent and well worth hearing. Meantime tickets can be obtained at the leading music stores.

PRELUDES—IN DIVERS KEYS.

Mr. Max Vogrich, who had already, during the first series of Wilhelmj concerts, made friends and admirers of the entire musically cultivated portion of his audiences—probably all the more in that he stood as an embodiment of the truly intellectual artist alongside of the mere virtuoso, who had nothing to show excepting his dexterity upon his instrument, and whose single composition that has been heard was a veritable Achilles heel of weakness—has at last been enabled to let us see the best and strongest side of his talent in the Symphonic Overture for orchestra that was performed at the matinée concert of last Monday. In producing his work Mr. Vogrich was at the disadvantage of having to do so with an orchestra entirely inadequate to carry out, or even fully appreciate, his intentions; a few excellent players in an orchestra cannot make amends for either the incompetency of others, the want of a proper balance between wind and stringed instruments, or the lack of sufficient rehearsal. So that what we heard of "Marnion" was, after all, but a second or third reading, with the orchestral coloring barely suggested, and with so much left to be filled out by the imagination (provided it was one that was able to see and follow the intention of the composer) that the really great impression produced by it upon a mixed audience may be regarded as a test of the inherent quality of its composer. Mr. Vogrich's composition is one on which I should not wish to—indeed, could not—form a final judgment on hearing it but once, under such adverse circumstances, but it impressed me as having many qualities that betoken great talent, and the promise of fine things in the future. Thematically it is fresh and interesting, without being strikingly original; the themes have, however, the genuineness and spontaneity of real thought that is quite sure ultimately to find its own forms of expression. The instrumentation seems to be clever and shows considerable routine, as well as feeling for orchestral effect. Of this, however, one was compelled to judge more from what was suggested than what was done, which was frequently not at all what the composer had evidently designed.

The weak sides in Mr. Vogrich's work seem to me to be a certain want of repose—especially in his harmonic construction, which is exceedingly restless—and the absence of complete certainty in his own mind with regard to his form. Not but there is discernible in this Overture a clearly defined formal intention, rather successfully carried out, but there is also to be felt throughout it the fact that Mr. Vogrich is not yet quite clear as to his models; his evident predilection for the Poemes Symphoniques of Liszt struggles at times with his recollection of the great Leonore Overture, and again with the Introduction to "Tristan" of Wagner, and between them all he has evidently not yet entirely decided where to cast his lines. I hope he will think better of it, and conclude to stick by Beethoven in the end. I think it will be the safer anchor for him. For he has undoubtedly much talent of a high order and beautiful quality; he is of the stuff of which great artists are made. That he did not play the Weber Concert Stuck well does not signify; he was evidently unprepared, tired, and wretchedly accompanied. But he can play beautifully, and in time will write beautifully. In his interest I can not wish it, but for ours I should be glad if he could remain in this city. We should be the gainer for the constant activity among us of such an artist-nature allied with the freshness and hopefulness of youth. Naturally, it would not last; the sordid, superficial nature of our life and work would soon either destroy the quality of the work or drive the artist from us. But while it lasted it would be helpful. And I know of no place in the world that needs an infusion of new, healthy artist-blood more than the one we live and write in. Those of us who are here have grown to be mere hacks who work for a living, and exhaust ourselves doing that. The artist has been either starved or frightened out of us; we dare no longer sit down to write without considering how much the thing written will bring in the market. And one doesn't write Symphonic Overtures with one eye on the cash book.

Instances of young singers who carry the evidence of their unripeness on to the concert stage are so frequent with us, and what is said or written about the critic who happens to take enough interest in them to tell them candidly of their mistake in doing so, or the faults they display, is mostly so entirely misunderstood and so rarely attributed to what seems to me the only motive one could have for writing about them at all, that I am often half-inclined to wish there were no such things as debutantes. Certainly, the most of them would, at least, be much the better off without either the teachers who push them prematurely before the public, or the foolish friends who, out of sheer ignorance, flatter them into the belief that they have the power to sustain themselves there; the flattery of friends and honeyed promises of designing or misguided teachers are generally more palatable than the truth, and while one is young one is very apt to prefer the sweeter meat to the more wholesome. I think it must be about a year since I wrote of Miss Annie Gleason that she had a pretty, light, flexible, soprano voice of very little timbre, and scarcely any charm of tone-quality; that she had evident talent for a certain kind of florid singing, and that, with much work of the right kind, she might hope some day to become a very good singer in what I consider an utterly worthless and unmusical school. This, or something to the same effect. And this—after hearing her performances in the two Wilhelmj matinées of this week—is what I have to say to her to-day. Miss Gleason has still her pretty, light voice, and does some of her passages and scales quite neatly—her trill is frequently very good, her downward scale generally clear (the upward one mostly the reverse of it), and her staccato at least promising. But, as a singer, this is all there is of her. And of true singing—the cantabile, that is after all the foundation of all singing and the only thing worth seriously considering—she has not the first or remotest idea. If she has ever been taught how to properly make or sustain a tone, she certainly forgot all about it in public; from the beginning to the end of her work I could see nothing of it. Her attaque is mostly bad (false), and, as a natural result, her intonation at times inaccurate; her legato and portamento (the things she should have been taught before ever a scale or trill was thought of) in the crudest condition, and—what seems to me to be the worst blemish in her work—her idea of phrasing is none at all, or, rather, at times, positively abominable. This was most noticeable in the two ballads that she sang as encores; her numbers on the programme consisted only of worthless, unmusical variations. If progress in the bad direction in which she was when I heard her a year ago is progress, or if a somewhat improved trill and somewhat greater flexibility of voice is improvement, then Miss Gleason is progressing and improving. But in all the essentials of a good vocal school of style she seems to me to stand just about where she did, with very little to hope for out of the present direction of her training.

At the Bush Street Theatre H. M. S. Pinafore has been succeeded by The Chimes of Normandy, which has been, in the main, a very pleasant performance. Next week's repertoire will be made up of the Bohemian Girl and the Grand Duchess, in the latter of which Miss Melville made a great success at the beginning of her San Francisco career. I hear from Mr. Locke that he expects shortly to produce Sullivan's new opera The Pirates of Penzance. WEIL.

Professional Etiquette.

We poor outsiders know very little about it. It begins, if I mistake not, at the court of the Romanoffs, and ends at the tip-end of Herr Wilhelmj's fiddle-stick. When you are in the presence of the Autocrat of all the Russias you are forbidden to be seated, or to speak until you are spoken to; and on the play bills, where the name of the great fiddler appears in large type, the names of all other artists are to be printed in smaller type. If you violate the rules of the court of the Czar you are provided with a dead-head ticket to Siberia; and if the printer does not vary the type on the play-bills of His Immense Highness, the fiddler, H. I. H. foams at the mouth, and tells the printer, the manager, and the public to go to a very much warmer place than Siberia. The printer made a mistake, and Mr. Wilhelmj, being professionally affronted, declined to appear at the Baldwin, for which theatre he was announced last Monday. Well, well, we must bear it. We are accustomed to such nuisances as Kearney; why shouldn't we tolerate the arrogance of a Wilhelmj, who has talent, if we can stand the mouthings of the sand-lotter, who has not? But this overweening arrogance of "the profession" is rapidly passing the bounds of endurance. Our greatest writers, the most profound philosophers, men who by their brain power and erudition control the world, keep in the shade, and are, as a rule, the most diffident and unassuming of mortals; but the moment the critic or claqueur has put the stamp of greatness in art on men or women, they become the terror of all managers, the insolent masters of the common people who pay to see and listen to them. And the manners of their betters are imitated by the small fry, from the leading man to the coryphée. Miss Clara Morris receives $500 for every performance; Miss Adelaide Neilson, sixty per cent. of the gross receipts, with a guarantee of $500 per night; Edwin Booth, Jefferson, and Sothern would scorn an offer of less than $3,500 a week. They are the absolute rulers of the entire theatre and the manager while their engagement lasts, and woe be unto any one who presumes to differ with them in any single particular. As with "stars," so with the stock company: Mr. Jones is engaged as "leading man," and will play only such parts as suit him; Mr. Smith, who is the "juvenile," will only play light and gentlemanly parts; and Miss Sophronia Brown, the "leading lady," indignantly thrusts such parts as seem beneath her dignity upon her second. It is not a matter of art with them; it is a question of professional etiquette. Instead of making much of an inferior role, their aim seems to be to make nothing out of a good part. They, as a rule, depict a character as a sign-painter paints his sign—in flaming letters, with his own name conspicuous at the bottom. They seldom lose themselves while acting; it is not "Ophelia" we see; it is Miss Sophronia Brown, who recites the part. And if a critic allows himself to point out their errors, they throw their play-books at the head of the stage manager, and tell him that the part is not suited to them.

STEPHANOTIS.

WASHINGTON SOCIETY.

No satire, says the Capital, ever penned struck so hard blow at the follies of the dancing world as the Little-Tin-Gods-on-Wheels, a trilogy after the manner of the Greeks.

Our Little-Tin-Gods-on-Wheels are running round at a rapid rate. The day for their race is near its close, and then comes the season when repentance will be de rigueur. There is in our midst a large number of wall-flowers who, like Miss Tiger-lily, loudly bemoan their fate, as did she and her companions:

We, the unfortunate, dull and respectable, Good, but not beautiful, no one will speak to, Fearing lest they will be struck on us during the Whole of the evening. Men are but simpering Idiots anyway. Little we care for them. Rarely we think of them. All our delight is in Culture and intellect, sense and refinement; We should not wish to be worldly and beautiful, Foolish and frivolous. No, not for anything.

Young Dazzle, a lieutenant in the navy, just returned from a cruise on the Mediterranean, which was a great frolic, as his vessel stopped at the noted places, and gave him opportunities of seeing French society at its best and worst, is a familiar person to us. Mr. Carnation, a kind-hearted but inexperienced youth, we meet daily; while Mr. Crocus, a worldling of some years' standing, may be seen each morning wending his rheumatic steps up the entrance-way of the Club House, on H Street. Mr. Souvenir, "a howling swell," is on duty in the State Department, and may be saluted any afternoon near the Arlington. Miss Jacqueminot, a raving beauty, daily takes her walk toward the English legation, to meet her lover, forbidden the house by a savage papa.

As for Miss Bouseline, a "tearing bud," she is too well known to all old habitués of Washington society to need description. Has she not for years and years been acting bridesmaid to all the young and pretty girls? Is she not continually "au le promenade," where she makes the mistake of supposing that holdness is simplicity, and in fashionable salons, where she indulges in the equally grave error of assuming impertinence and be-sprightliness, and trying to pass insouciance for wit? We all know her. And then the chaperones! Look at the etching in the trilogy, and at the german to-morrow night, cast about for prototypes of those whose miseries the artist has so vividly depicted. The Fathers indulge in the following:

Look here now, we are decidedly sick of this; It's the last time that we mean to put up with it—Sitting up this way till two in the morning! One must be made like the Archangel Gabriel, Blessed with Job's patience and more than humanity, Not to get mad at this wildly preposterous, Perfectly scandalous state of society; When we were young would our parents have winked at it?

Not they, the sturdy and strait-laced old Puritans. We will not either; and this is the last of it—This is the last of it, you bet your hat on it!

Chorus of chaperones—mothers:

Come, dears, it's time to be putting an end to it; We are all getting as sleepy as pussy cats. Lulu must be up, all fresh for her practicing, Early to-morrow, and Peep has harmony; Oh, it is hard on our pitiful chaperones, Sitting alone in our slumberous solitude; Oh, we are somnolent! Where are the carriages? Once we were charming and lovely young damosels; Once we were raving and tearing and beautiful.

(Party breaks up. Miss Tiger-lily and Miss Bouseline shake and wake—one her father, the other her mother—and in a jaded manner they proceed to the dressing-room.) Read the little Tin-Gods.

If the gushing critic of the Alta knows anything about it—which I think he does not—Mr. Wilhelm played the Mendelssohn violin Concerto—matinee of last Tuesday—like a "semi-god," whatever that may mean. Also, he played the Chaconne of Bach in response to a demand for encore; which I am sure he did not, since I was there and heard what he did play. I did not think he played the Mendelssohn Concerto particularly well (not at all well for him), and believe he thought so himself; the andante (in which the tempo—a little slower than either Wieniawski or Urso—pleased me very much) was dull and lifeless, and the finale at once too slow, too heavy, and frequently inaccurate. It is, perhaps, the first time that we have heard anything slovenly from this great violinist, and I instance it mainly to show that even so great an artist who has his moments of carelessness or unreliability. Also that, as I said before, the Alta man—whenever he may be—doesn't know anything about it. On Tuesday the Otello Fantaisie made ample amends, however, and on Thursday everything, for Wilhelm played superbly, as is his wont. Again I say, hear him everybody, and hear everything you can of him, for it may be a lifetime before you get another opportunity to hear anything as well done as he does it, even when not at his best. O. W.

John-ny's mam-ma passed the plate to John-ny. There were two apples on the plate. One was a nice, large one; the other was small and speckled. John-ny was too po-lite to help him-self be-fork his sis-ter Jane was served. She was too po-lite to take the big ap-ple. She took the lit-tle speckled one. John-ny had the big one left for him. John-ny was a good boy. I know you are glad his po-lite-ness and good-ness be-re-wa-rd-ed. It was hard on Jane. Yes; but this is not a story for girls.

The celebrated Marshal Narvaez would appear to have been a man who understood his country and his time. On his death-bed his confessor asked him if he freely forgave all his enemies. "I have no enemies," replied the dying Marshal, proudly. "Every one must have made enemies in the course of his life," suggested the priest mildly. "Oh, of course," replied the Marshal, "I have had a great number of enemies in my time, but I have none now. I have had them all shot!"

There is one thing about the California Street Railroad that we cannot understand. From its present terminus to First Avenue the company have built an extension; the distance is only six blocks. The thing that gets us is this: It is a wide track, and is run by a regular broad-gauge railroad locomotive. This would indicate, not the extension of an avenue road, but the beginning of a new railroad. Then, where is it going? To the ocean beach, perhaps? To Santa Cruz, perhaps, along the beach? When we find out we will let our readers know.

A RUSSIAN DUEL TO THE DEATH.

A Twice Told Tale.

"One of our brother officers, named Vetsky, had a brother officer in the civil service, who was an especial favorite of mine. He was a man of singular intelligence, but I never saw a man so full of physical imperfections. Ill health had rendered him a species of abortion. He knew his weakness and his natural defects, and carefully avoided all effort and all gymnastic exercises, leading a life of the utmost precaution. On horseback he was a terribly comic spectacle, and whenever we arranged a riding party he invariably chose the oldest and least spirited of the horses. He had also a defect in his pronunciation, which obliged him to speak very slowly in order to keep from stuttering. You may imagine what a figure this unhappy man made, with his ailments and his precautions, among a band of vigorous young men, who never looked before they leaped.

"Vetsky was nevertheless a good companion. We all were fond of him, but we made no allowance for the infirmities of his constitution, his awkwardness, and his excessive prudence, that bordered on cowardice. Vetsky took all our jokes in good part, sometimes wittily retorting upon us, sometimes joining in the laugh against himself. Nevertheless, it frequently occurred that when some sudden raillery attacked him he found himself at a loss for a reply. It seemed as if the faculties of his mind, like those of his body, suffered occasional paralysis. He was one of those men whom it was easy to unseat with a word, and who have not the power of immediately regaining the saddle. In cases like this, Vetsky evidently suffered very much, however strongly he forced himself to conceal it under a cold and calm exterior. Every one could see that he made every effort to remain master of himself, because, as he would say with a forced smile, 'To get angry would be to injure my health.'

"I had observed since a certain epoch that my brother was one of the most pitiless persecutors of poor Vetsky; but we had all so fallen into the habit of laughing at our petit maître, as we called him, and made this jocularity so much a regular pastime, that I paid no attention to this childish waywardness. It seemed to us so perfectly natural. All things, however, have a secret cause; and the secret of this was, that my brother was desperately in love with a lady who, by a singular caprice, gave a marked preference over the elegant Vetcheslaff to the distorted Vetsky.

"When officers are newly appointed, it is the custom among us Russians to expect them to 'baptize their epaulettes,' as we say. As we had some new-comers in the regiment, days were fixed when we should dine successively with each of them. You have some idea of the style of what our fêtes used to be. You have been ten years absent, and in Russia ten years is an age. The time has gone by for those wild, frenzied revels that you knew once. Now young men are very rational, even over the bottle, and good taste reigns in their orgies. Their wives might preside over them without blushing. It is not that wine is wanting. They do not drink at present, it is true, until they are under the table; but they drink enough to become gay and quarrelsome, and foolish sometimes, and to say things in their cups that they regret in sober moments.

"We dined one day in a little country house (it was the period when the troops were encamped in the suburbs of St. Petersburg for the summer review), and our host was liberal of his champagne. The dinner lasted a considerable time, and all of us, including even Vetsky, were, to use a military phrase, charged up to the muzzle. It was two o'clock in the morning. The room was close, and I felt as if I was suffocating; so I left the house to wander through the fields and fresh air. I remember it still. The skies were pure; the country silent. A faint morning breeze was arising, and I hailed it with voluptuous delight. The field, bathed in the purple rays of the rising morning, made a delicious picture. Not a sound was audible, except in the direction of the cottage where we dined, through whose open windows fragments of laughter and snatches of song floated. Suddenly song and laughter ceased. This unexpected change from noise to profound silence alarmed me, and I shivered involuntarily. My heart beat as if I had just learned evil news. By an involuntary movement I returned to the cottage. At the moment of crossing the threshold I met Vetsky coming out with his hat in his hand. He did not speak to me; but his face was white as a sheet, and he sought to dissemble some agitation beneath a smile. My presentiments were verified!

"My companions related all that had occurred during my brief absence. It was a boyish freak, but one that I feared would lead to bloodshed.

"Some of them had opened a window that looked out on a court-yard, and one young fellow, in a fit of gaiety, leaped from it. A second followed, then a third. The window was a considerable height from the ground, and whoever was unfortunate enough to miss his footing would certainly be hurt. The laughter provoked by the falls that some received, and the danger of the jump, excited in all the young men present a reckless emulation. Each tried if he could not break his neck in this foolish exploit.

"Now, what are you going to do?" said my brother to Vetsky, when all had tried the peril, with a loud laugh.

"I will not leap," answered Vetsky, coldly.

"No! But you must leap!"

"I have told you that I do not wish to leap."

"You don't wish to leap," answered my brother, in the heat of wine, 'because you are a coward.'

"I advise you not to repeat that," said Vetsky.

"My fool of a brother knew not what he said or did."

"I not only repeat it," said he, putting his arms akimbo, 'but I will tell it to the Countess M—— [the lady that both were paying their court to]. I will say to her, Your adorer is a coward! What will you bet that I will not tell her?'

"Vetsky, in spite of all his sang froid, could no longer contain himself. He caught my brother by the throat.

"You fool!" he cried, 'if you dare—'

"A blow on the face was the only reply."

"What remained to be done? For a moment I thought of reconciling the adversaries, but how to accomplish it? To force my brother to apologize was impossible; for his uniform had brought with it the most exalted ideas of personal dignity. He felt that he was wrong, but to commence his military career with what might be called an act of cowardice, to recede from his position—no power under heaven could have made him consent to it. As for me, I had not the courage to face such an idea; and my only chance was to attack Vetsky, whose prudent timidity, instinctive moderation, and general good sense gave me some hope. In my selfishness I thought that, in order to save my brother, this man would, as I would, recoil from nothing, not even public contempt. Stiffening my pride, I proceeded to Vetsky's house.

"When I entered his room, I found him seated at a writing-table, tranquilly smoking a cigar. His calmness disturbed me.

"I wished," said I, 'to have an interview with you rather than your second. You are a man, and certainly must look upon my brother's conduct as nothing but the rudeness of a boy, entirely unworthy of your attention.'

"Vetsky looked surprised, and smiled.

"Sir," said he, 'you do not think what you say. Be frank with me. What is the matter?'

"These few words gave me a new idea. I would endeavor to touch his feelings. I pictured our situation, my mother's feeble state of health, her farewell to us, and the promise she had exacted of me. I did not spare poor Vetcheslaff. I called him a fool and a scamp. I believe that I even muttered the word 'pardon.'

"A moment," said Vetsky, with the cold smile that had never for an instant quitted his face. 'Is it on your brother's behalf, or on your own, that you apologize?'

"I knew not what to answer. He fixed a penetrating look upon me, and continued:

"I understand your position perfectly. I understand that your brother will never apologize—he can not. I pity you as much as him. I am not a fire-eater, and duels are not in my line. I have always laid down as a rule for myself to avoid every thing that might conduct to one; but, he added earnestly, 'not to recede a step when a rencounter became inevitable. Put yourself in my place. How many times have I not been forced to turn off in a joke words that, if addressed to another, would have provoked twenty duels with your brother? I took pity on his youth, and I acknowledge, pity on myself also. Life is already sad and short enough, without sacrificing it still further for a folly. But this affair is more serious. What would the world—which already finds me too prudent—say of me if I were to let this affair pass as something not meriting attention? You know what prejudices exist. I would not know where to hide my head. Every finger would be pointed at me! I would have nothing left but to blow my brains out; and that, you know, would not be prudent in a man of so much prudence.'

"These words were delivered coldly and disdainfully, but I felt that I could not reply.

"If it is to be so," I cried, angrily, 'it is with me, sir, that you will have to settle.'

"If it is agreeable to you," said Vetsky, shaking the ash off of his cigar; 'but not before your brother and myself have finished. Besides, I am certain that your brother would not listen to any other arrangement. I have now to apologize to you—but I have some letters to write.'

"He bowed coldly, and I left the house with a despairing heart.

"One hope remained to me. Vetsky was a bad shot. I would naturally be my brother's second—it was a natural duty that I owed him. Wishing, therefore, to give my brother all the advantages possible, I proposed that they should be placed at twenty paces, each advancing ten paces after the word was given, and firing at discretion. I counted on Vetcheslaff's quickness and correctness of eye. Vetsky's second accepted these terms.

"We had scarcely finished this bloody compact when Vetcheslaff entered. Bocks bounded before him, barking with joy. My brother tried to put a brave face on the matter, and played with the dog; but one could see that he could scarcely restrain the interior emotions that agitated him. Poor young fellow! Life was, perhaps, never so attractive to him as at that moment. Who would blame him if he grieved at the chance of quitting it? When I saw his fair young face, my heart bled. In the few hours that preceded the duel I grew twenty years older.

"In a few minutes after this we were on the ground. The thought that it was I who led my brother to take his stand before a pistol, deprived me of the faculty of either thinking or acting. In vain I forced myself to exhibit the sang froid necessary under such circumstances; but I was no longer myself. Vetsky's second had to fulfill my duties. The fatal moment arrived. I gathered all my strength, and examined my brother's pistols; they were in excellent order. Vetsky was cold as ice. An almost imperceptible smile wandered over his compressed lips. One would have thought that he was merely warming his back at his drawing-room fireplace. I looked at Vetcheslaff, and saw with terror that his hand trembled.

"The signal was given. The antagonists approached each other slowly. The sight of the danger had driven from Vetcheslaff's memory all the instructions that I had given him. He fired precipitately, and Vetsky staggered, but did not fall. The bullet had broken his left shoulder. Controlling his agony, he made a sign to his antagonist to advance to the fixed limits. My brother obeyed, with a convulsive and involuntary movement.

"I felt as if petrified. A cold sweat bathed my body. I saw Vetsky advance, step by step, pistol in hand; I saw his cold, pitiless eye. He was only two paces distant from my brother. Then I thought of my mother—her last words—my oath. I felt as if I were going mad. A mist swam before my eyes; I forgot everything—honor, reason, the regulations of the duello. One sentence only rang in my ears: 'Your brother is being murdered before your eyes!' I could no longer support this agony. I sprang before my brother, and making a rampart of my body, cried out to Vetsky:

"Fire!"

"Vetsky lowered his pistol.

"Is this according to the rules of the duello?" he asked, turning calmly to his second.

"A cry of disapprobation came from every mouth. Some of the by-standers dragged me away from my brother. The next instant a pistol-shot was heard, and Vetcheslaff fell—dead."

ARTICLES DE PARIS.

Lord Vere de Vere to his spouse—"Pardon me, your ladyship, I did not say that I knew you were the worst woman on earth. What I did say was that you were the worst woman on earth I knew."

Lady Clara—"Wretch!" (Flies to mantel-piece and hurls at him a life-size cast of Vere de Vere.)

Discussion having arisen as to the age of a sovereign, the Almanach de Gotha is referred to.

"He is twenty-three," says one of the parties, "he was born in 1857."

"Bosh! I knew he was twenty-four—that is last year's almanac!"

Sainte-Beuve used to be pestered by a lady who laid great claim to literary pretensions and had a mania for match-making.

One night she happened upon him in a salon where there was no possibility of escaping, and asked him point-blank: "Seriously, now, I want your candid opinion about Homer."

"Why, whom are you thinking of marrying him to?"

Not long after Beaumarchais's famous comedy had been reproduced at the Comédie Française, a friend of Samson, the actor, meeting him, shook hands with him warmly, and cried with enthusiasm: "How glad I am to see you! Let me congratulate you! You never played Figaro as well as it was played last night."

"But," gasped the actor, "I didn't play it—Monrose is playing it."

"That makes no difference. You never played Figaro as well as it was played last night!"

At the office of a charitable society which delivers orders for fuel to the poor:

Shepherd [to first sheep of flock]—"Well, come now, what do you want, eh?"

Sheep—"Some coal, your reverence, please."

Shepherd—"Coal, coal, nothing but coal. And I suppose every one there in the line behind you wants coal, too! Just like you, all coming for coal at once. Why couldn't you have a little forethought? Never catch you coming for coal in July, when we have leisure and coal is cheap; no, you never think about coal then!"

A Bohemian artist had written to Baron Taylor that he was down on his luck, had a heartless landlord, and asking for three hundred francs to enable him to leave the dwelling where he was daily insulted.

The Baron was touched by the letter, and at once sent the money. The first intimation of this that the Bohemian received was conveyed by his landlord, who handed him his bill receipted, saying, "Your friend, Baron Taylor, has paid your rent for you in full—three hundred francs!"

"——!" yelled the artist in an uncontrollable paroxysm of gratitude; "why didn't the —— send me the money—you'd have been glad enough to let me move out for nothing!"

Scene—Dinner-party at a rich bourgeois's house. Prosperous advocate recounting his career.

"When I took my first brief," he says, "I was excited and nervous, especially as my client was a consummate scoundrel—a bad egg, any way you took him. But then I was beginning my practice. He was a man of good family, the reputation of which would have been fatally tarnished had he been convicted, so I took the case and got the rascal off."

After dinner enter an important personage, great friend of the host, who presents the lawyer to him.

Great Personage (patronizingly)—"I do not need to be introduced to this gentleman—I met him long ago. In fact I may say I gave him his first start in life. I was his first client."

Dumas, the elder, had a weakness for placing himself and his friends at the service of every new acquaintance he made.

Once upon a time he sent to a friend an ornament of the swell mob, as it afterward appeared, with one of the most gushing of letters of introduction—"Throw wide open to him the doors of your house and your heart; treat him as you would me," and so on.

Shortly afterward Dumas encountered his friend, who was decidedly frigid, and on his demanding an explanation of this coolness, his friend said: "Don't you remember sending me a gentleman with a very enthusiastic letter of introduction?"

"Yes, yes; fine fellow—real heart of gold—full of wit—charming companion."

"Yes, I desay; but he stole my watch from off the mantel-piece."

"What? Your watch, too?"

A gourmand was asked what color he preferred.

"Rose," he answered, passing his tongue round his lips, "rose-beef!"

The sick man had been brought back as if by miracle from the very gates of death.

"It is too bad," says the clergyman; "he'll never be half as ready to die as I had him this time. I never took such pains with a sinner before."

Verse from a popular song:

To make this little nest of moss
What do we need, my partner fair?
The whitest wool we can come across,
A deal of love, a deal of care.

Though how on earth a nest of moss is to be made out of wool, even with love and care, is not explained by the young people who carol this gem of minstrelsy with their eyes full of love, trust, and household hints.

THE TEST.
Hold a slip of silk in a blaze of fire. On removal, if it ceases burning at once, it is positive proof that such silk is not adulterated, and will neither cut nor grow shiny in actual wear. Otherwise, if on removing a slip of silk from the blaze it continues to burn, it is positive proof that such silk material is from 1-3 to 3-4 adulteration, and will either cut or wear shiny.

VOL. VI. NO. 8.

SAN FRANCISCO, FEBRUARY 21, 1880.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WILD-FLOWER SEASON.

From "The Californian" for March.

It is a trite saying, but nevertheless a true one, that this section of the world in which we live is peculiar and distinctive in many ways. Mineral wealth, luxuriant vegetation, transparent air, genial and balmy temperature—all attest this fact. Nature, at some prodigal moment, seems to have lavished her favors upon sub-tropical California. Nor, while producing fruits of prodigious size and in extraordinary variety and abundance—while rearing the stems of wheat, corn, and oats to unheard of heights, and filling their ears with wonderful store of grain—did she forget to add beauty and grace of countenance to the more solid charms of her person. In the spring-time of the year our meadows and pastures literally shine and glow with beauty—leagues upon leagues of radiance. The bountiful lap of Earth is filled with bloom; her breast is adorned with living jewels; she is literally smothered with flowers. Such is Nature's exuberance in this respect that botanists have been compelled to introduce new names into their text-books—to christen, in fact, these strange flowrets kissed by California suns and baptized in California dews. The world-wide species and genera of the flower kingdom are here blessed with new family members—productions of or variations caused by sun, soil, and climatic conditions. March is the flower month par excellence; central California the chief field of its display. Not that other portions of the State are not here and there bedight with all the colors of the rainbow; but not in such lustre and luxuriance as the grass-meadows of the San Joaquin and its tributaries, which, over all their flats, present a wilderness of bloom. The plow may plow them down, herds innumerable of sheep and cattle crop them close, still their tenacity and vitality go to prove that the deep foundations of nature were not laid for individuals, but for species, and not for the animal more than the vegetable kingdom. But the Papaveracea please not the farmer; the Geraniacea grieve him sorely; and the Violacea vex his thrifty soul. It seems to be a fundamental rule of nature—why or for what purpose it were hard to guess, but so it is—that utility and beauty can not walk hand in hand; that either mind or matter must go down; that aesthetics can not coexist with practicalities, facts with fancies, or champagne with shabbiness. The husbandman can not fill his gunny-sacks with poppy-seed or monk's-hood, and command as wide a market as he can with grain.

The Papaveracea, or poppy family, are well represented in this State. First and largest, we have the Eschscholtzia Californica, whose capsules are curved, whose flowers are two to four inches in diameter, of a bright yellow, shading off into a brilliant orange toward the centre. Then there is the Platystemon Californicus, or cream-cup, whose petals are pale-yellow, and whose tints, like those of the Copo de Oro, turn to orange at the centre. Then the Platystigma Californicum, with pale-green leaves, and long pale-yellow or creamy-white flowers; and the Meconopsis Heterophylla, whose flowers range all the way from scarlet to orange, glorify alike their genus and the fields where they grow.

Of the buttercup family, we have the Ranunculus Californicus, its flowers bright-yellow. Then we have the Aquilegia, or columbine, with nodding flowers, usually red, frequently tinged with orange or yellow; the Delphinium, or larkspur, with its tall stalk, and dull-bluish velvety flowers; and the Aconitum, or monk's-hood, its flowers also blue.

Of the Violacea, or violet family, there are the Viola Adunca, with violet or purple flowers; the Viola Pedunculata, yellow, veined with purple; and the Viola Sarmen-tosa, with small, tiny, yellow flowers.

Turning to other genera, we have the Polygala Californica, with flowers of a greenish-white hue; the Silene Californica (of the Caryophyllaceae), with its large, deep-scarlet flowers; and the Dodecatheon (of the Primulaceae, or primrose family), with a pink corolla. Only some of the varieties have been here enumerated, the object of this paper being rather to confine itself to such as are more peculiarly Californian in their character, and such as are thorough representatives of their genera in form and color, than to ransack botanic vocabularies for a complete and Solomonian list, ranging from the Calaveras Big Trees to the exotics in a Nob Hill conservatory.

It will not do, however, to dismiss this subject without a cursory glance at some of the less showy but more useful constituents of our pastures; those which make beef and milk, and wool and mutton.

This class is likewise well and strongly represented. The Leguminosae muster strong in many and frequent varieties of clover. There is the Melilotus, or sweet clover, with very diminutive yellow flowers, scarcely a line in length; the Trifolium Macraei, with dark-purple flowers; the T. Gracilentum, a pale rose-color, and many others, whose modest attire may look dingy beside their more gorgeous sisters of the meadows, but whose unattractive appearance, nevertheless, as it so often does in other circumstances, covers a large amount of solid worth. Take, for instance, one of the most unassuming of the genus—the Medicago Denticulata (Anglice, bur-clover), the distinguishing characteristics of which are small, yellow flowers in auxiliary clusters, and spiral pods, armed with a double row of hooked prickles. This unpromising exterior conceals beneath it qualities without which the flocks and herds of California would have but a hard time of it—in fact could not exist through the long, dry months of summer and autumn. The bur-clover is the stock-raiser's best friend.

Visitors from other parts of the world can not understand how stock keeps fat, and in better condition even than on green feed, upon seemingly bare, brown plains. The solution of the mystery lies in the little dry, prickly, brown bur. There is, however, another auxiliary to the Medicago Denticulata, and this auxiliary hails from the Geraniaceae, or geranium family, and answers to the name of Erodium Cicutarium in Latin, alfilarilla in Spanish, and pin-clover, wild geranium, or flaree in English. Stock of all kinds are very fond of it when young and green, but still more so when it is dry, and in this condition it becomes a valuable adjunct to the bur-clover, being, like it, licked off the ground and places where it has settled, and whither it has been blown by the wind.

Speaking of wild-flowers, I have in my mind's eye a level expanse of pasture-land, lying between the Merced and San Joaquin Rivers, near the two or three empty houses called Dover, which, for various and multitudinous color, kaleidoscopic permutations, and general rainbow effects I have never seen equaled. Thousands of acres—not hundreds—dotted with the orange of the poppy, the purple of the violet, the yellow of the buttercup, the pink of the clover, the blue of the larkspur, and the deep scarlet of the silene, seemed to weave a carpet harmonious in color and exquisite in its blending and contrasting tints; such as Pan and his attending satyrs might have reveled and danced on to their heart's content; such as Arcadia itself could not have rivaled; while the new-risen sun gilded the vivid emerald of the grass, and the dew from the recently dispersed mist decked every bell and every petal with a diamond.

R. V. BOUDET.

A Very Feminine Protest.

DEAR OLLA-PODRIDA:—You are very bright and witty, oftentimes profound, but you are also most certainly malicious. Is it not enough that other men should proverbially hide their inconsistencies behind feminine petticoats, that you, too, of whom we hoped so much, should thus turn traitor? I verily believe you are the man who jilted that old maid (happy woman!), and a benign providence has only preserved you from your deserved fate, of hanging, to punish you in some more frightful and effective manner—probably by being talked to death by your victim's revengeful sisters. I sincerely hope the punishment may be sure, and the torture long-continued. That I may have the satisfaction of seeing the siege fully opened, I fire the first shot myself.

I am young, at least, if I am not pretty, and I am a woman, and I have worn fine dresses. But I do not, and I never did, and I never will, wish to see my appearance discussed, or my "exquisite toilet" paraded in a newspaper.

I am not logical, of course, being a woman; but I am very positive, and force sometimes has the effect of reasoning. Therefore I protest against any such sweeping assertions as those you made in the last issue of the Argonaut. As you are so superior to our weaker sex, in this matter of "dress parade," at least, rest in peace on your pinnacle of glory, and let more lowly and unfortunate mortals fight out their sham battle alone. Sincerely, opposedly,

BUTTERCUP I.

Eminent Republicans.

Rinaldo Rinaldini, not he of Ariosto—nor yet the story-telling Munchausen of our boyish days, when we delighted to have our hair stood on end by the murderous and bloody recitals of incidents in enchanted castles—but Rinaldo Rinaldini, a San Francisco correspondent of the Philadelphia Record, gives us an entire column concerning the opinions of our "eminent" men concerning Grant. The most eminent of our eminent men is the Hon. John P. Jones, of Nevada, and he thinks, and this most sapient and knowing Rinaldini thinks, that Grant is favored by a majority of the Republican leaders. Now, who are the Republican leaders? First, ex-Governor Rodman M. Price, ex-Governor of New Jersey and "venerable statesman." A Democrat, who has not been in California for nearly thirty years, never was a "venerable statesman," so far as we are advised, and favors General Hancock for President. And now we quote Mr. Rinaldini:

"From Governor Price I walked out Sutter Street to the palatial home of William F. Higgins, the 'Man of Destiny' of the Republican party of California. Mr. Higgins has never occupied office, but any position within the gift of his party is at his command. Nothing and no one in California can withstand him. To my regulation question, 'Who is going to be the nominee of the party?' Mr. Higgins replied: 'Have no choice. The party is full of eminent leaders—all available men. Any one of them can carry this State.'

Our friend Higgins must have invited Mr. Rinaldo Rinaldini to dine with him, and there must, we think, have been gin in the soup. The next "eminent" gentleman among "leading" Republicans was Alexander Campbell, the criminal lawyer, who is not a Republican at all, but a late defeated "Honorable Bilk" candidate for judge, and who "preferred Blaine to Grant." The "next gentleman" was Mr. M. M. Estee, not "eminent" and he favors either Blaine or Washburne. The next was the Postmaster, "who owes his official position to a sore eye," and he is for Grant, who appointed him. The next "eminent" is William Sherman, the "Treasurer," and as he holds his office from Sherman, he goes for Sherman. Collector Shannon is the last of the eminences, and as his term of office expires very shortly, he has taken a very bad cold, and can not smell at all, and him Mr. Rinaldo styles "Tactful Tom."

So, of all the eminent and leading Republican politicians on this coast, only two pronounced Grant men are found, and they are both in office. We will venture this remark: There is not one leading Republican in California, who is not at present in office or who does not desire an office, that favors the nomination of General Grant. We invite Rinaldo to mention half a score of names in his next communication, and send us a marked copy.

How We Saluted.

In '58 or '59 the nomination of John Conness for United States Senator was a decided victory for the boys in the Fire Department of Sacramento, as they had striven tooth and nail to bring about this happy result. One dodge was admitting members to their companies for their votes. Among these was a man commonly known as "Glass Pud In," on account of his vocation, who was notoriously poor and terribly out of luck; but some of the boys paid his dues and promised to find him work if he would just vote for Conness. No. 1 Engine Company had a cannon, of the old-fashioned make, which had been bought from the early Spanish settlers, and into which you could put a pretty good-sized boy. It was mounted on two wheels, and when fired recoiled so that the boys built a little earthwork about one hundred feet behind it, as a kind of short stop. On the occasion I mention we ran it out of the engine-house and fired a light charge, to call enough men together to man the ropes. Fifty or sixty responded—Tom Rooney, "Glass Pud In," and a man known as "Jersey" being the leading spirits. Away we went, down J Street to the river, stopping at every saloon to warm up. We fired away until all but three charges of powder were gone. These Rooney wanted to save to fire on our return to the engine-house; so we manned the ropes again and started for the Union Hotel, where Mr. Conness was having a reception. He was up stairs in the parlors with all the wire-pullers; liquor was free to every one, and the place was packed.

We made such an infernal racket that Conness came out and invited us all in. All accepted but "Jersey" and "Glass Pud In," who stayed to "mind the gun," by Rooney's orders. Every now and then we would hear "Jersey" yell at the top of his voice: "I say, ain't any of you fellows coming out to give me a show?" This added to the merriment, as the boys thought they had a fine joke keeping "Jersey" out in the cold while all the liquor was being drunk. I finally went out on the sidewalk to get some fresh air, and found that "Jersey" had pointed the old cannon at the hotel! I hailed him:

"Hallo, 'Jersey,' what are you doing?"

"Oh, I'm going to wake those fellows up pretty soon."

Into the gun went a second charge of powder.

"Say, 'Jersey,' don't you fire that gun, or you'll shake the whole building down," I said, approaching him.

"Look out, boss," he said, as he rammed in the third charge; "if those fellows don't hear this thing in a minute and a half, I'm a liar. 'Glass Pud In,' old fellow, I'll give you a job for six months. Just move off a little, for she kicks like the devil!"

I was afraid the old thing would burst, with three big charges of powder in, so I moved off lively. When about fifty yards from it, away she went, and for fifteen minutes, from the sound, you would have thought it was raining glass. The concussion knocked down about twenty men in the bar-room, broke most of the glasses, tore the doors off, shook most of the plastering down, and scared every man in the building out of a year's age. The old cannon ran back through a Jew's second-hand clothing store, carrying away counters, tables, and chairs, and was found in the back-yard on top of a stove. And there stood "Jersey" in the middle of the street, shaking hands with "Glass Pud In." "Didn't I tell you, old fellow, when you joined the company, that I'd find you work? And hain't I done it?"

"Jersey" was right; there wasn't a whole pane of glass within two blocks, and his partner reaped a rich harvest.

AN OLD BOY.

The Church of England has two archbishops, twenty-eight bishops, four suffragan bishops, thirty deans, seventy-four archdeacons, six hundred and ten rural deans, twenty-three thousand clergy of all classes, one-fifth of whom have no parochial charge. One archbishop—Canterbury—and twenty-four bishops have seats in the House of Lords. The incomes of the prelates range from seventy-five to twelve thousand dollars a year; that of the deans, from fifteen to one thousand dollars. The number of churches is sixteen thousand. The gross income of the church, from all sources, is about forty million dollars per annum. An established church and a standing army are two expensive and useless institutions. Put all the world's soldiers at labor on the farm, and all the priests and preachers into school-rooms to teach, and the world would be more peaceable, prosperous, and better fed; and not half as many souls—if people would get into hell—if there is a hell.

BEREAVEMENT.

Is heaven far away, O my dead love?
 If thou couldst see
 The agony of longing in my soul,
 The misery
 Of life without thee, thou wouldst lean from heaven
 To answer me.

How dost thou know that I am faithful still
 To thy least word?
 How do I know that my heart-stricken cry
 Is by thee heard?
 If thou canst see my grief, is not thine own
 Tender heart stirred?

How can it be that thou art happy, love,
 From me apart?
 In every hour of life thy heart didst grow
 Nearer my heart;
 Thou canst not know, beloved, that mine will break,
 Where'er thou art!

It was not like thee to be cold or grave
 With loved ones near;
 How can it be thy silence shall incline
 My heart to hear?
 How can I follow thee without a sign
 To find thee, dear?

Oh, reach thy hand for mine, and I will go
 Where thou shalt lead,
 With blinded eyes; for I shall know thy touch,
 Dear one, indeed!
 And that I may with thee find heaven, wilt thou,
 Love, intercede?

HER SACRIFICE AND MINE.

My sister Alice—my gentle and sweet sister Alice—came into her true nature forty years ago, and then she was twenty years old. As a child she had been peevish, as a girl willful, selfish perhaps, but oh, what a glorious woman blossomed from that earlier life! When she was sixteen, after spending her petulance on a rose-thorn one day, she lifted her vexed and brimming eyes to me. "Margaret," she said, "it is these little things which try me so. Were great trouble, great sacrifice, great work, to descend like an avalanche upon me, I know I could meet such avalanche with a brave heart." Heaven forgive me! but I laughed and shook my head.

From the beginning of her early teens, Robert Moore had been almost a lover to my sister Alice. What a handsome pair they were, she with her shining dark eyes, he with his tender blue ones—it yet gives me a pang to think of them as then they were. For, two years older than she, I loved him so well, too, that seeing him thus with her was a pain second only to seeing him not at all. To see her tease him so prettily, to note how every day she won him anew, to watch her so lovely, and so all but loving—ah, my heart rose and sank, and sighed out its pain in a sea of its own bitterness. How Alice knew I loved him I could never guess, but by and by I knew that she knew it.

It was when she was twenty years old, then, that she bowed her head, and the avalanche broke over her. I looked into the arbor one day, and half-hidden among its vines she knelt, her face in an agony covered with her hands. I know now she was enlisting a power mightier than her own to aid her in the renunciation of Robert Moore, for from that hour began her great work. And I? I saw it, and in the spirit abased myself in dust before her, but in the flesh I was not strong enough to refuse her sacrifice.

Repelled gradually by her continued and quiet coldness, Robert sought me for unspoken comfort, as nearest her. Then was the opportunity of a lifetime, but tremblingly I thrust it away and deafened conscience. How easily I might have brought them again toward each other; but I loved him so, I loved him so! I twined my hair upon my fingers; I wore my brightest ribbons, and with smiles I dimpled my face that he might think me lovelier than Alice. But I was not, oh! I could not be, for I could see, though others might not, the opal heart of the sacrifice that had opened in her eyes and breathed between her lips.

Oh! the bitter-sweet of those days as they must have been to her! Men's eyes are blinded to the good and bad in women, and so Robert did indeed turn from Alice to Margaret. What wound must have bled in my sister's soul when by and by he bent over me as he had bent over her head when I wore the violets he brought in his hand—when tenderly and softly he wrapped me in shawls, and together we wandered away like young love with spring. And all the time I was beating with joy from head to foot: no voice was to me like Robert's voice—life could not be life without him. But Alice must have loved him just the same.

One night we had been away among the paths. I scarce knew where nor cared, and the moon was shining, shining on us as though it were almost full with happy tears. The love that was in me shook me like a leaf, and if I half listened I knew I should hear it spring and flutter, I could taste its sweetness on my lips. I could see it like a star in my own eyes, I could feel it hovering on my hands and rosy my finger-tips. When we stood again at the small piazza, Robert took me in his arms and my head lay against his strong heart; then, standing so, he kissed me.

"My little Margaret!" he said, and then I heard a rustle, and my sister Alice, within the shadow of the passion-creeper, had seen it all. Humbly I crept up the stair with her to bed in our chamber under the roof; in look and action I begged her to forgive me for the happiness once hers, now mine; but I could not even then have released the cord that bound him to me.

When the village bells rung in our marriage-day there in the early morning Alice had risen to prepare the bride-maid's dress—her own dress. Fairer, far fairer than the bride was she as down the lane we went, and as if to give me courage to accept the gift of her life, she beld my hand in her own warm pressure, and her eyes were like unto heavenly eyes. She listened to the marriage service with a smile, as if in that moment she had grown a very old woman; out of her great age she seemed to look down upon us and say: "My children, God grant you happy years, my dear, dear children!"

When my first-born came he lived a little while, and now in heaven I feel that he is Alice's child, not mine.

at all. He should have been hers on earth, you know; but I sinned, and I know he must be hers in heaven. Yet still the same rapture ran over me like a flood when my husband's voice came floating in to me. And when I stole toward him in his chair, and my arms crept round his neck, ever his hand came up to meet mine with the same sweet thrill in its touch.

"My wife!" he would say, in his tender, reverent tone, and then I thought: What if it were Alice standing here! Why, Alice should be his wife! Can it be Margaret whose love is thus to the world woven round him? Ah! and Alice was shut away from him, a lonely life chosen for my sake, and in that great trial she was victorious.

We were still in the old house, the three together, but Alice never flinched as day after day she stood by and saw our happiness. She was sister Alice—the old maid sister Alice as time wore on—the angel sister, as well I knew.

And then came our last child, my little girl, my wee woman, my baby with the face of Alice and Robert's eyes. From the day she was born there was a dumb prayer in my heart: "My God, let her be my child. Now Alice has one, let me have one. The other one I gave; don't take this one."

When the baby opened her eyes and first took notice of a face, they rested upon her Aunt Alice standing near, and then the first smile dawned on her little red lips. Oh! that first smile should have been mine! It was for Aunt Alice she cooed and crowded, and held out her flower-like hands; it was for Aunt Alice her first tottering step was taken; "Alice" was the first word she learned to speak. Then I knew this one was not my child either, and I wrapped myself close—oh! so close—in Robert's love. But to her he was "papa," and twin with that love for him was her child-love for Alice.

Then she, too, drifted out toward the unknown heaven, but even there I knew that Alice's love had followed her. "Aunt Alice! I want my own, my own Aunt Alice!" she had whispered with her latest breath, as filled with a great weeping I stood over her, and so I stepped aside, and Alice took the mother place. Alice now has two children, and I am childless.

I am getting to be an old woman now, and Alice is gone, and Robert is gone—both gone to the children. The passion of my youth is dead, and I feel the pure unselfish love that filled the heart of Alice once. I wish now I could have that same choice again. I know I should give to my sister her own place. But in my heart I have given it to her for eternity; all time lies before me and for all time I will take my stand, as sister, by Alice as wife and mother.

The peace of a great renunciation is mine now. I think of Robert as my husband no more. I give him, with all his store of tenderness, his wealth of love, to Alice. Not even in name will I call the children mine, and now I have no dead—they are all each others.

Think of it! never to think of them in heaven as mine—not my husband, not my babies, not even my sister! Oh, the agony of it, and yet the joy of it! Thank God, the greater sacrifice is mine. I have won sweet peace where once I warred within myself. Greater than Alice suffered I have suffered, but I know somewhere is my recompense, and on my knees I thank my God it was given me to choose again.

KATE HEATH.

A Deuced Good Yarn.

The following odd bit of legal flotsom—here reproduced as nearly literatim as the resources of a modern printing office will permit—has been borrowed from A Treatise of Testaments and Last Wills, "compiled out of the Laws Ecclesiastical, Civil, and Canon, as also out of the Common Law and Statutes of this Realm," by Henry Swinburne, Judge of the Prerogative Court of York, and printed for "Elizabeth Lynch, law Bookfeller to his Majesty's Courts of Law in Ireland, at her shops, No. 6 Skinner-Row, and in the Four Courts, Dublin, 1793":

"At Paris one Morning a hungry poor Man, begging his Alms from Door to Door, did at last espy very good Chear at a Cook's Houfe, whereat his Mouth began to water; and the Spur of his Stomach pricking him forward, he made as much Haffe towards the Place as his feeble Feet would give him Leave: Where he was no sooner come, but the pleafant Smell of the Meat and Sauce did catch such hold of the poor Man's Nose, that (as if he had been holden with a Pair of Pinfers) he had no power to pafs from thence, until he had (to stay the Fury of his raging Appetite) eaten a Piece of Bread which he had of Charity gotten in another Place. In the eating whereof his Senfe was so delighted with the freth Smell of the Cook's Meat, that tho' he did not lay his Lips to any morfel thereof, yet in the End his Stomach was so well fatisfied with the Smell thereof that he plainly acknowledged to have gotten as good a Breakfast as if he had there eaten his Belly full of the best Chear. Which when the Cook had heard, (being an egregious Wrangler) he in hafte steps forth to the poor Fellow, lays hold on him, and in a choleric Mood bids him pay for his Breakfast. The honest poor Man, amazed at this frange Demand, could not tell what to fay: But the Cook was so much the more earnest, by how much he perceived the good Man to be abashed at his Boldness, and did so cunningly cloak the Matter, that in the End the poor Man was contented to refer the Deciding of the Controverfy to whatsoever perfon should next pafs by that Way, and abide his Judgment. Which Thing was no fooner concluded, but by and by cometh to the Place a very natural Fool, and such a notorious Idiot as in all Paris his like was not to be found. All the better for me, thought the Cook; for more he doubted the Sentence of a wife Man than of a fool. To this aforefaid Judge they rehearsed the whole Fact; the Cook complaining, and the other patiently confefling, as before. To conclude, this Natural perceiving what Money the Cook exacted, caufed the poor Man to put so much Money betwixt Two Bafons, and to fhake it up and down in the Cook's Hearing. Which done, he did award, that as the poor man was fatisfied with the Smell of the Cook's Meat, fo the Cook should be recompenfed with the noife of the poor Man's Money."

The author of the phrase "shoot the hat" was an Austrian tyrant named Gesler. More than this it is unnecessary to Tell.

THE COUNTRY.

A "slough of despond" in winter, a Sahara in the summer, the country as portrayed in idyllic verse and arcadian romance has charms. Its green fields and shady hedge-rows, its sylvan dells, its fair meadows, daisy grown and smelling of new-mown hay, fascinate the imagination of the monotonous plodder in the highways and byways of the city. We read of pretty milkmaids tripping through dew-tipped clover; visions of modern Bopeeps, in short shirts and pinafores, mix themselves up as inextricably as "Buttercup's" babies, with dashing vagueros in gold-laced velvets and picturesque sombreros. As we contemplate on city tables rich fruit and luscious wines, we are carried away in spirit to a Utopian land, and we dream dreams of fair bacchantes, crowned with purple grapes, whirling in the mazes of an endless dance. We think of the country as the home of rosy-cheeked lassies, with flashing eyes and heaven-tuned voices; and brave lads, with sun-browned faces, fine physiques, and sturdy, manly hearts, whose cheerful whistle echoes over the hillsides and dies away in melancholy cadence with the glory of the setting sun. It is a very charming view of the country, I confess, and when I read I am almost tempted to believe.

It may be true to nature, but the original studies were not made from Californian country life. Our pictures resolve themselves into elements less pleasing. The dashing vagueros is transformed into a dirty, ignorant, drunken, quarrelsome "greaser;" his mettled steed into a meagre, gaunt, woe-stricken representative of the financial difficulty under which his master labors. The green fields, on closer scrutiny, develop an amazing tendency to tar-weed and bur-clover, and the shady hedge-rows lengthen into straight, flat, dusty, uninteresting lanes, with a fringe of half-burnt stubble on either side, and a dilapidated fence to stop the depredations of wandering cows. The pleasant pastime for which city-bred people sigh, of gathering fruit fresh from the trees, is accompanied by disheartening trudges over acres of plowed land, with the sun broiling your face to a crisp and unbecoming brownness, and the goal once reached, the topmost bough is the bearer of the reddest cherries and the ripest peaches. After sundry scratches and much fruitless climbing, in your inmost heart you form new opinions less flattering to rural life; and if you are a Kearneyite you forthwith reform, and record a solemn vow that as long as you are a "noble voter" and fruit-trees bear fruit, the "moon-eyed Mongol" shall stay to gather in the harvest. The brawny harvesters of romance are less romantic when you discover about them an odor unmistakable, and far from faint, of bad whisky and worse tobacco. Well-packed lunch-baskets for a country picnic make you dream of green oak groves and trickling streams, but they never make you think of ants and bugs that will infest your treasure and viands; of the slippery, hot, baked earth on hillsides that have scorched for weeks under the blaze of an almost tropical sun; of the flushed faces and cross looks that always grow out of burned cakes and unsettled coffee. The "honest granger" with a halo around him changes into a very ordinary, ignorant backwoodsman, who smokes his bad tobacco in a murderous clay pipe, who uses his sleeve in lieu of his handkerchief, who eats with his knife, whittles sticks, and murders the Queen's English. His wife, poor woman, with her multitude of cares, oftentimes has a soul above her work of patching, darning, scrubbing, cooking; but her aspirations are smothered and her ambition killed, until she settles back into the groove where chance or an unkind fate has placed her, and wears out her meek and uncomplaining lot till death relieves her from the drudgery her life imposed. The "sturdy, manly, country lads" you would never know in the shuffling hobbledohoy you meet in the dusty roads, still less in his Sunday attire of much-puffed shirt, liberally oiled hair, and high-heeled boots. And the "buxom country lassies"? In this glorious climate of California they have white, pinched faces, walk with a shuffle, and sit with a stoop. Aping the airs and follies of their city cousins, they plaster their complexions with harunful cosmetics, and tie themselves into tight veils until they exclude the last ray of sunshine. Poor, pale, delicate girls, with no muscle and many nerves! Their intellects on a level with their bodies—as ignorant as sickly.

Ah, the country is beautiful in the abstract; but take the country without the newspapers, without the stock reports, without the business excitement, without dressing, shopping, calls, without variety or change, divested of the legendary brightness of novels and poetry—in fact, the country as it is, with the dust, mosquitoes, and heat of summer; with the mud and monotony of winter, and the picture is disenchanting. True, there are compensations: in the absence of book-agents and bores in general; in long drives after the sun has gone down, and the kindly dusk hides the unsightly blots of farmhouses; when the stillness and hush bring peace to tired heart. A warm, bright fire, built of blazing logs, glows brighter when the family circle narrows around it, and the rain pours down in productive copiousness, and all the world is shut out. But these are only oases in the desert of country existence. Give me the city's wind and sand and fog, and with it life!

VACAVILLE, February 1, 1880.

The gift of ten thousand dollars, by John W. Mackay, to the suffering poor of Ireland, was a graceful and generous act. The gift of twenty-five thousand dollars, by the Nevada Bank, was also appropriate, and entitles the donors to the gratitude of a distressed people. The establishment of an Irish relief fund, by the New York Herald's princely donation of one hundred thousand dollars; is an act of which Americans have a right to be justly proud. Mr. Mackay is of Irish birth, Mr. Flood of Irish descent, Mr. Bennett of Scotch and Irish descent. Want of bread should level all class distinctions, and it is well that these gentlemen are not unmindful of the sufferings of the country that gave them and their fathers birth.

The following is copied verbatim et literalim from the letter of a Rochester newsboy: "Dear Brother I taught I would rite to you and let you now how I am getting on Mother and Sister ellie are well Mother is marridd to a farmer down by aunt hanna im in rochester dear Brother Could you send me five or ten dolars do you rember taking that two dolars from me Ellie is not got no close I want to Byhersom."

POOR IRISH LANDLORDS.

The almost universal interest which the condition of Ireland has excited in the United States during the present unhappy crisis in the former country has left but few aspects of the situation doubtful, or even imperfectly known. Yet, in the necessarily broad grouping or contrasting of the parties, social and political, several misapprehensions may readily have arisen in the minds of people unfamiliar with the actual condition of land in Ireland—that condition having reference to its tenure and obligations. For instance, the American people, in classifying the occupiers of Irish soil in the two relations of landlord and tenant, is apt to accept these words as synonymous with "rich and poor." This is a fallacy. It is true that many landlords are rich, and many tenants poor; but, while it is also true that most tenants are poor, it by no means follows that most landlords are rich. The records of the Encumbered Estates Court, from its establishment down to to-day, give an often pitiable insight into the actual poverty of the owners of the soil. Boulogne, Malaise, a hundred cheap French, German, and Swiss resorts, have their circles of Irish landlords—absentees, not from choice, but from necessity; living abroad because they can not, even in the most modest manner, keep up the state which they conceive their dignity demands at home. And the truth remains—a ghastly and appalling truth to landlord and tenant alike—that agricultural Ireland is a bankrupt country. It may be stated as a broad fact, and one whose few exceptions are no more than sufficient to prove the rule, that every landed property in Ireland is well nigh swamped with debt. The fair acres are mortgaged up to the park wall or beyond it; the lien of the mortgage rests on the broad green lawn and on the graveled sweep whereon the carriage of the landlord drives to and fro while waiting for its owner on sufferance to issue from the mansion which perhaps bears his name and of which he is in reality only the tenant. Outside the domain the property is let, perhaps well, but very often on a lease for a mere nominal rental. This last is a method of handicapping Irish property which is little understood in America. A landlord, in pressing need of ready money, grants a lease of a hundred acres for "three lives, or thirty-one years," at the nominal rental of, say, half-a-crown an acre, receiving an immediate consideration of, perhaps, £1,000 from the incoming tenant. Of the three lives which have to drop before the lease expires, his (the landlord's) son and heir is commonly one, some member of the royal family—frequently the Prince of Wales—is the second, and the third is either the lessor or the lessee. The stipulation of thirty-one years marks the minimum of the lease in case all the lives should lapse within that period. This kind of lease was very common during the last generation, and the present generation of Irish proprietors is suffering accordingly. Their fathers granted the leases, pocketed and spent the ready money "fines," and left to their heirs a property whose fairest farms are tied up in these iniquitous leases. The present owner has little hope of better things during his lifetime, for was not his life—when still heir—inserted in the lease? And the best he can hope for is that, after he is gone, there may not be yet a third life to impoverish the inheritance which passes to his son, and emphasize—like an Hibernian Nemesis—the curse that "The sins of the fathers shall be visited upon the children."

This condition of things, bad as it is, must in the course of time rectify itself, for these leases, and they are the commonest in Ireland, do not last forever. It may be, of course, that the first owner who receives his property free from such encumbrance will again put up these leases for sale to the highest bidder, receive his "fine," and "revel as free as his fathers did," but at least he will have had the opportunity to keep his property free from encumbrances of this nature. But the mortgages—what will clear away the mortgages which lie like a shadow across the fairest town-lands of the finest Irish estates! Americans would be surprised, would be incredulous, were the statistics of some of the county families in Ireland presented in these columns. Select one at random—it is not an isolated, it is not even a particularly aggravated case, for the family in question still manages to remain at home, and has not been driven out by that terrible pressure which fills Boulogne and kindred resorts with absentee Irish landlords. The property is not in Connaught, where the distress is now epidemic; it is in the comparatively prosperous province of Leinster, and here is its exhibit: The estate in question covers something more than six thousand acres, of which a very fair proportion is good land, with only a sufficiency of bog and bottom land, and there are no mountains in the neighborhood. The rental at present is £4,700 per annum—a small return for six thousand acres; but many of the choicest farms are held on the "three-life" system, at nominal rentals. The mortgages on the estate amount to about £60,000, which, at the prevailing rate of mortgage interest in Ireland—five per cent.—calls at once for £3,000 from the annual rental. There are five younger children, who draw from the estate £200 per annum apiece—£1,000 per annum in all—leaving the nominal owner £700 a year to maintain the position in the county which is in a manner demanded from the representative of one of its oldest families and the possessor of an estate which every one remembers to have yielded £10,000 a year. This is not an isolated instance, but might be duplicated, aye, triplicated, in most Irish counties. And many fine properties have been brought still lower by ancestral extravagance and the sale of leases.

How, then, does a season of famine affect the Irish landlord in this or a similar predicament? Of the sufferings of the poorer tenants, "of the humble bed and the fireless cot and the bread so hard to find," we know much. We have seen harrowing pictures drawn and heard heart-sickening tales told of the poverty and distress of Ireland during a famine year. But the landlord, too—at least the landlord in such a situation as that outlined above, and that is unhappily only too common a one—is not he in a situation of difficulty? Perhaps the American people, opening their hearts and purses with their wonted warmth and liberality for the relief of the starving poor in Ireland, wonder that more is not being done at home—that the landlords who receive the rent of the soil can not do more to tide their dependant tenants over a single bad season. But let them read the true picture sketched above, and imagine it repeated, with often more sombre coloring, throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, and they will realize how mutually dependent are the landlord and tenant upon each other. How can the land-owner, whose income is derived from his rent, relieve the land-holder, whose first indication of mendicancy is his inability to pay that rent? How is he to meet his mortgage charges? How is he to maintain the fight that he has so long maintained, waiting for the time when the leases shall lapse and he can bequeath to his son a comparatively unencumbered estate? There is nothing for it, if the rents do not come in, but foreclosure and a sale in the Encumbered Estates Court, where the property may or may not yield sufficient to pay off the charges—for it need scarcely be said that land in Ireland, just at present, does not offer a very tempting inducement for even the most speculative capitalists. And when the property is gone, whither shall he go—brought up as he has been to no trade and no profession, with the faulty, useless education of Eton and Oxford? Ask Boulogne; ask Malaise; ask any of those strange, out-of-the-way little places which we occasionally meet, when we "do" Germany with a knapsack or Switzerland with an alpenstock; or ask the mines of Nevada or Colorado, or the great pasture lands of Texas. There are many men there who have known better days; and the sterner material, after the stroke of ruin has fallen, gravitates thither, while the inert and the feeble wears out a fretful existence at the cheap continental resorts. Or ask many of the Western newspaper offices, aye, or of New York for that matter; there are many men with histories there.

So that the poor landlord is to be pitted as well as the poor tenant, and it may be that a finer organization intensifies the pang of his fall, though he may not be called upon to endure the actual physical suffering entailed by the empty potato barrel, the "boneens" seized in a distress for rent, and the hungry, leaden months which intervene between now and the next harvest.

"The Dampools are Still Quite Numerous."

A sleek individual (says the Capital) with his seedy coat buttoned up to the chin, and having the appearance of a statesman in impecunious circumstances, unlatched the station-house door, walked over to the stove, and picking out the easiest chair, sank into it with the air of a man who felt that he was of importance to the world. After toasting his shins and warming the soles of his feet, he arose, and turning his back to the stove, placed his hands under his coat-tails, spread his feet apart, and viewed his surroundings with great satisfaction. The door was again opened by a hesitating hand, and a tramp with a dejected countenance shuffled up to the railing and muttered that he wanted lodgings. The station-keeper was about to enroll the new-comer's name among the legion of tramps who had had lodgings before him, when the man at the stove cleared his throat. Then he paused and remarked: "Lodgings! Do you know, my friend, of what lodgings consist? Do you know the legal definition of lodgings?" The tramp murmured that all he wanted was a place to lie down until morning; but the man at the stove, not heeding the interruption, withdrew one of his hands from beneath his coat-tail, and describing a graceful parabola in the air with it, proceeded: "Do you know that the word 'lodgings' has been clearly defined, interpreted, and explained, so that no mistake can be made in the meaning of the term? It has. When a traveler drops into a station-house and asks for lodging, what does he get? He is permitted to perch on a bench all night, and wait till the janitor comes in the morning and turns him out into the street. Is this lodgings? The law says no."

The dejected tramp brightened up a little as the orator proceeded, and he dropped his little bundle and opened his mouth in wonder.

"In the case of Skimmerhorn versus Buglehorn," continued the man at the stove, "a case which I had the honor to decide when I was on the bench, the opinion of the court was that the law required the station-houses to furnish lodgings, and, as to lodgings, the opinion was that lodgings means a warm place by the stove until such a time as the lodger desires to retire, some one to look after your baggage, a feather bed with clean sheets and three quilts, and some one to black your boots in the morning. That's the law, gentlemen. If you go to a hotel and pay for lodgings would you consider that you had received lodgings if the clerk put you in the cellar and gave you a corner of a bench to sleep on? No, sir; you would demand your money back, and any court in the land would sustain you. Now lodging is lodging, whether it is in a hotel or in a station-house. Law, majestic law, that holds the universe together, interposes and says what lodging means."

The dejected look had now left the tramp's face, and as the last words dropped from the mouth of the man at the stove, he shuffled over to him and grasped him by the hand, looking up at him as a great benefactor. Then he shuffled back to the rail, and throwing his bundle upon the desk, remarked to the station-keeper:

"Look here, Cully, I guess I will stay here to-night."

"What?"

"I want lodgings—do you understand? and you can't fool me. I want a bed. You had better hustle around and shake up a bed for me while I sit down and warm myself." And the tramp drew a chair up to the stove and proceeded to divest himself of his shoes.

The station-keeper smiled a strange smile as he started up stairs. The tramp shouted after him:

"Be a little careful of the sheets, Cully, for I am very particular about the sheets; and, mind you, tell the boy to be gentle with these shoes when he blacks them, for they are a little shaky."

There was a noise of feet on the stairway, and the station-keeper returned. He was accompanied by two policemen. The station-keeper stood over the tramp and remarked:

"He wants a bed."

There was a momentary struggle, and a hurrying toward the door, and the next moment the tramp was landed with his bundle in the middle of the street. He yelled back at the officers:

"Yes, I want a bed!"

And the door was closed. The sleek expounder of the law then moved up to the rail, had his name put down in the book, and as he stretched himself on the bench in the lodgers' room it is reported he chuckled several times and remarked: "The dampools are still quite numerous."

The man who never smelt powder never came near a woman's cheek.

CURRENT COMMENT.

Writing of Eugénie's visit to the scene of her son's untimely death, the New York Tribune says: The class in England and France who are always roused to a blind fury by the mention of a Bonaparte still find it impossible to dissociate this widowed, childless, aged woman from the spoiled beauty of the Second Empire, and loudly denounce the whole journey as "sham grief," "a bit of stagey posing for popular effect." Surely there is no longer any need of this vulgar personal abuse to sustain the cause of liberty in France, or England, or anywhere else. When it pursues this woman, just now, it is what Whitman would call a barbaric yawp in the most vehement Republican. Eugénie had her day of triumph, supreme in beauty and power. She enjoyed it, and abused it perhaps, but no more than any other woman of mediocre intellect, bigoted prejudices, and narrow, strong affections would have done. The beauty and the power have gone; her last ambition and hope died with her son. No man has anything to fear from her; why not, then, leave her alone in her grief? Her loss and sorrow have been great as was her triumph, and, to be just, she has borne them with a humility and a patience befitting a nobler nature than hers. Not a word of reproach from her was added to the weight which the coward Carey had to bear. This journey to the other end of the world, only to kneel where her son died, is a fond and very foolish fancy, perhaps; but not unnatural in a woman who has nothing left but her boy to think of, and who, unlike the majority of mourning mothers, can afford both time and money to make him alive to her a little by such expedients as this. Nobody need envy her this luxury of grief. If she were a poor washerwoman, with a dozen other children to feed, she would have learned by this time to think of her boy with a cheerfulness, more healthy regret. But as it is, her worst enemy should have the decency not to make a party cry of her grief, but at least to pass by on the other side in silence and leave her to mourn her dead as seems best to her.

The Earl of Longford has just entered upon a legal action of curious origin. In November, a workman busy in an old house on Rutland Square, London, discovered a cash-box of antique structure, concealed beneath a step leading into a strong-room on the ground floor. Colonel Palliser, the owner, then in Ireland, was written to about the box, and the particulars of the discovery were published. Thereupon several persons, including the Earl of Longford, put in claims to the treasure. The late Earl and his son occupied the house until 1848; and the late Earl told his wife previous to his death that he had in the house a large sum of gold in case of need. At his death the Countess instructed the executors to search for the money, and a careful but fruitless examination was made. In 1848 the house was let to Mr. George Willoughby Hemans, son of Mrs. Hemans the poetess, from whom it was subsequently conveyed to a Miss Cookson. When the box was opened it was found to contain, besides money, an envelope addressed "Earl of Rutland," the remainder being torn away; a letter beginning "My Dear Lord Longford," some Parliamentary papers of the Houses of Lords and Commons, and a plan of the upper story of the house, showing certain partitions which had been put up by Thomas, Earl of Longford, and having some writing upon it, sworn to be that of his lordship. The present Earl, Colonel Palliser, and Miss Cookson are now all contending for box and contents.

Miss Helena Bradford (says the New York Star) is announced as the latest addition to the American colony in Paris. Some years ago this charming young person was the acknowledged head-centre of the class of female propagandists known as Bloomerites. It may be ungallant, and so we will not say that it was fully thirty years ago that this delightful creature scorned long dresses; and if she did not display her charms in tights, she at least thought the bifurcated garment the most becoming. Time works a large assortment of wonders. In this case we would not suggest that Time has anything to do with it, and so it must be Worth who has reconverted Miss Bradford to the adoption of dress en train.

A few days ago (says the New York Times) the wife of one of our most millionaire millionaires gave a luncheon party at her Fifth Avenue home to seventy-two ladies. There were twelve tables, each table arranged for six guests, with differential service—the cloth, napkins, glass, china, flowers, every bit of equipment and garniture, indeed, even to the gas-shades, harmonizing in color and design. The glass and china were of novel pattern and the costliest kind, and the napkins and table-cloths elaborately wrought. Instead of the ordinary cards, with the names inscribed, were cards finely and specially painted, deserving to rank as works of art, the subjects suggested by gastronomy in some form or other. As mementoes, various trifles, as they were called, were placed beside the plates. They were fans, bouquet-holders, ornamental glove-buttoners, and the like, each and all of curious and dainty workmanship. The effect of the twelve tables and their varied service, with the guests in rich visiting dress of the latest mode, must have been ravishing to the feminine eye, though it is doubtful if the masculine mind could have had any just appreciation of the ingenuity and expense of the entertainment. It was intended to be, and probably was, the most elaborate luncheon-party yet given in the city, and luncheon parties have been a feature of metropolitan society this season. We are obviously not drifting toward rigid economy and Spartan simplicity.

"Little Bopeep" (says "Grandma" of the Boston Courier) is a name that has a sweet and pastoral sound to the father of a family, and suggests an inexpensive costume in which he would willingly see his daughter clothed for a fancy ball; and so when a certain young lady on a certain avenue asked her father's permission to go to a recent New Year's ball as the aforesaid shepherdess, he said, "Yes, my dear." He said something else when he received a bill for a green silk gown, trimmed with platings of pale rose color; and a cambric under-dress with ruffles of Valenciennes, a French hat with a knot of roses, made especially for the costume, and a basketful of roses and mignonette, and a crook wreathed with roses. But then men are puffed with bills, and the young lady looked pretty in her dress and had plenty of partners.

A TRUE STORY.

Barring Names and Localities.

The Widow Bufford lived at Smithsville, in the State of New Hampshire. She had a nice old broad-acre farm, inherited from her father and out of debt. On a knoll, back from the highway—surrounded by garden, lawn, and orchard—was a great, old-fashioned, comfortable farm-house, painted white, with green blinds, as every farm-house ought to be. At a little distance were a spacious barn and outhouses, well filled with hay and grain and farming implements, with borses and carriages for summer, and horses and sleighs for winter. The widow had one daughter, Cleanthy, who had married John, who managed the farm. He and Cleanthy were to inherit the farm, as a matter of course, when in the fullness of time the widow should climb the golden stairs up to that Presbyterian heaven where golden yellow is the prevailing color.

But the widow was a worldly-wise woman, and she beld on to things, and John was compelled on the first days of each year to account. He was allowed for wages and management; he was charged for his and Cleanthy's board, and for that of the children; and annual receipts were exchanged. This was all ship-shape and friendly, but it left the widow mistress of the position; for she owned the farm, and the bank account was in her name.

The war broke out. The old lady was past ninety. She had always been a Democrat. John was a Democrat also. He was worse, he was a Copperhead. But the widow was a War Democrat. She was tinged with Abolitionism. She was down on Jefferson Davis. To see the country triumph, the Union prevail, and the slave-holders' rebellion put down became the absorbing idea of her life. She had just made her annual settlement with John. When receipts were as usual exchanged, the old lady wiped her spectacles and said: "John, I have been thinking quite seriously about this dreadful war."

"Yes, mother," said John, "it is a wicked war. It ought never to have been begun, and it ought to be stopped."

"Well, John, I am glad we agree."

"Yes, mother, if it had not been for the Republican party and Abe Lincoln, all this money and all these lives would not have been wasted."

"I don't like," said the old lady, "to see the Union destroyed. My father fought in the Revolution and my husband fought in 1812; they fought to make the Union, and I think every man in the country ought to fight to preserve it. Don't you think so, John?"

John scratched his left ear with his right forefinger.

"Well, yes, mother; somebody must fight for the Union if the war goes on."

"It will go on, John, you may be sure of that."

John thought it well enough to humor the old lady, for he had his weather eye on the farm.

"If I could get away, and could leave things, I would enlist myself; but that is impossible, and I must not think of it."

"Well, I don't know, John, I guess Cleanthy and me could manage for a spell, if you think it your duty to go."

"I didn't think of enlistin'," said John; "it's goin' to be a busy summer, and I shall be needed on the farm."

"I guess Cleanthy and me can get on, John, if you feel as though you must go; and since you have suggested it, I will tell you I was thinkin' the same thing, and I had made up my mind to speak to you about it. If you go, I will make a clean deed of the farm to you and Cleanthy as soon as you get home; but if you don't feel like tearin' yourself away from Cleanthy and me and the children, I can sell the farm and give the money to the Government to hire men to fight for it."

John saw his patriotic duty in a new light. He enlisted, and when the hundred days were out he re-enlisted, and fought through the war. He was honorably discharged, and when Lee surrendered and the Confederacy collapsed, John came home.

The widow hung on till ninety-eight years of age, and her only prayer was that the Rebellion might be crushed; that John might be spared to his wife and babies, and that she might live to welcome him home and see the war ended. Lee surrendered in April; the old lady made the deeds over to John and Cleanthy and died in the following May.

SAN FRANCISCO, February, 1880.

P.

Pious Blackmailing.

The zealous reformer is commonly a most unpleasant person, and the missionary spirit has in it some of the essentials of a vice. The zeal that induces your neighbor to labor with you in order to make you something other than you have chosen to make yourself is a part of the same quality that under other circumstances will impel him to put his finger into your private pie for a less commendable object than your moral or social regeneration. The best men we ever meet are the men who, if they do not "mind their own business" at any rate do not mind ours, and can contemplate us going to the devil according to the dictates of our own consciences, with unruffled composure and smiling assent. We are moved to these remarks by the doings of a brotherhood of New York zealots calling themselves "The Society for the Prevention of Crime," as if the whole nation, except the criminal class, were not a society for the prevention of crime; as if all the legislatures, the courts, the prisons, the churches, schools, families, and asylums had not that object in view!

However, there is always room and scope enough for organized effort in the direction of reform, if it is made with some regard to the rights of the reformers and the decencies of social life. But the New York society goes to work by employing detectives to "spot" the habitués of disreputable houses and "work up a case" against them, with a view to holding it in terrore over their heads. The manager of this worthy institution then approaches them and (having previously terrorized the keepers of the houses) suggests that they give him pecuniary assistance in "closing out" the houses. By discreet revelations of the information he has obtained, coupled with an ingenuous expression of reluctance to proceed to such extremes as would entail publicity in the papers and newspapers, the holy sneak commonly obtains what he wants—by downright blackmailing makes his victim "shell out." This sort of thing is of course much applauded in religious and goody-goody circles in New York, and we confidently look for its speedy importation to this coast. Couldn't the bald-headed inquirers of the Young Men's Christian Association undertake it, and make themselves even more popular than they now are among the three tramps whom they are certainly known to have benefited? Besides, they would thus win their own respect, which, in the absence of ours, might perhaps be almost as agreeable to them; there is no accounting for tastes.

The current number of the American Art Review fulfills the high promise of its initial issue. It contains several important contributions to the literature of American art, prominent among them the concluding paper on the late W. H. Hunt, with an admirable portrait and two successful reproductions on wood of his great mural paintings in the State Capitol at Albany, "The Flight of Night" and "The Discoverer." The first of these is especially well and spiritedly given, as from its superior excellence it deserved to be. There are two etchings in this number—a portrait of Mrs. Charles Francis Adams, good as to face and bad as to hands, and a street in Algiers. We conceive it to be a mistake, however, to print etchings on paper of so pronounced a tint. A. L. Bancroft & Co. are the agents here.

While the wise men of Alexandria were still puzzling over the supposed Masonic emblems found under Cleopatra's Needle, Boston was being entertained by a divulger of Masonic mysteries. He calls himself the Rev. D. P. Rathbun, a Wesleyan Methodist minister, of Illinois, and is actuated by religious scruples. A large audience gathered in the Chambers Street Chapel, attracted by his promise to "still further expose the secrets of Masonry, and to 'work the third degree.'" The pastor of the chapel opened the proceeding by expressing sympathy with the expositor's purpose. Mr. Rathbun began to "work the third degree" by declaring that Masonic oaths were profane oaths, much better broken than kept, and some person in the audience helped him "work" it by adding: "Yes, when you're a liar." Interruptions then became numerous, and increased to an uproar during the working process—a boy having been hired for two dollars to take the part of the candidate for the degree. The police were called in, but did not suppress expressions of disgust. In the midst of the "disclosure" a vote was taken on the question of confidence in the way in which the degree was being worked by the orator. Some thirty persons, including two ladies, showed their belief in the speaker's veracity, but nine-tenths of the audience voted in the negative, and called him a liar and a perjurer. Mr. Rathbun worked out the degree, but the audience refused to withdraw, and found a champion in a man who denounced both clergymen, during great excitement interspersed with cheers.

The Freemason question, by the way, seems destined soon to supersede the Catholic question, the Woman question, and the other old favorites of contemporary discussion. The other day a man from California threw himself under the cars on an Eastern railway, and, rather naturally, was killed. He left a memorandum: "I killed myself because I knew the Masons would when I got to Chicago." He had perhaps been "working the third degree" somewhere. Gone to meet Morgan.

A correspondent in Tuesday evening's Bulletin makes some very sensible suggestions concerning the employment of our present idle laborers, by extending the sea-wall westward from Meigs's Wharf to Van Ness Avenue or Point San José—"Black Point." There is in the fund set aside for this purpose now some $420,000, and it is increasing by monthly net earnings some $25,000. The Governor, the Mayor, and three Commissioners have control of this fund and can declare the work; contractors stand ready to bid for it, and laborers by the hundreds are desirous of the chance to go to work. This would give temporary relief to our unemployed, and would tide over the crisis.

"Sir," she said; and the music of her voice thrilled the car; "sir, is this seat engaged?" He looked up at the vision of glowing cheeks and laughing eyes, marble brow and clustering curls, and he relented; even the masher's heart warmed toward the lovely girl, the latest victim of his manly charms. "Oh, certainly not," he said, and his bow was a study of grace for the steam man; "oh, certainly not; you are entirely welcome; I shall be only too happy—" "Then," cried the charmed victim, "mother, you can sit here beside this gentleman." And an old woman, seventy-three if she was a day, with no teeth and only one eye, a small box, a big hand-box in a bag, a green reticule and an umbrella, two paper bags, and a piece of calamus root, tottered into the proffered seat and sat down and piled her things into the young man's lap. And the girl, the beautiful girl, went and sat down beside the passenger with the sandy goatee, who was so bashful that he couldn't and didn't say a word to his companion all the way to Newark, and blushed to his ears every time the fat passenger winked at him.

There is no doubt that there are many persons out of employment in San Francisco. Times are hard. But these are not the persons that are parading the streets with banners, proclaiming their unwillingness to beg and indicating their unwillingness to work. When, in a great city of three hundred thousand people, there are less than one thousand men and only a score of draggled females who tramp the streets, there is slight indication of very dire distress. The real suffering is out of sight, among those who are too proud to tramp the highways and too sensitive to make their wants known. The man who, with beery face and slouching gait, with a cigar in his mouth, or the woman who forgets her sex to walk the streets, has not our pity or sympathy, while every poor and honest man and woman who needs employment for bread has our deepest, warmest, kindest compassion.

Sarah Bernhardt could never play the part of "Mazeppa" successfully, unless before an audience sufficiently sympathetic to compensate for apparent deficiencies by a vivid effort of the imagination.

"THE CALIFORNIAN" FOR MARCH.

This magazine improves with age. In the March number Mr. Gally's story, "Sand," is continued, abating nothing of its interest. In the matter of "heavies," the number is especially rich. Mr. Henry S. Brooks discusses "Our Relations with Mexico" in an interesting way, his paper being full of facts, statistics, and conclusions of great and permanent value. His exposition—or rather exposé—of the revenue system of the "Sister Republic" is no less than startling. General John F. Miller presents "Certain Phases of the Chinese Question" like a politician, and Mr. Highland tells us something about the past and present of Ireland—tells it well and with knowledge. Among the lighter articles is a paper on "Sheep-berding," by Mr. Milne, which, in a taking way, rather rubs the bloom off that romantic and classic vocation. Mr. Milne rapes the roses off the shepherd's crook without compunction and without remorse. "Nine Days on the Summit of Shasta" gave Mr. Colonna enough of it; but he imparts only a portion of that quantity to the reader, who—in his dressing-gown and slippers—could endure a good deal more of Mr. Colonna's hardships with fortitude and delight. In an old darkey '49er, Mr. Cbeney finds material for a striking personal sketch. "The Wild-Flower Season," as the briefest prose article in the book, we have reprinted on our first page. Mr. Edward Belcher has something readable to say about the "one-poem" poets—who are not poets at all, by the way, any more than the man who makes a magnificent "scratch" is necessarily a billiard player. The second and last installment of Mr. J. F. Bowman's extraordinary paper "On with the Dance!" leaves the reader with some slight hope of recovery. In fiction, we have two love stories by two ladies, one (of the stories) a deal better than the other. The same writers, by a coincidence, can be compared in the present number of the Argonaut. The "Outcroppings" do not crop out this time; why, we do not know. The poets, too, are mostly absent, although a Mr. Kouns—who is he?—contributes some notable verses, entitled "Lex Scripta," and Miss S. E. Anderson a sonnet of promise. Altogether, the March number is the best so far. To the experienced eye of the journalist (our eye), which discovers something more than meets it, and is given to reading between the lines, this present number of the magazine evinces a vitality and mettle which assure its permanence and prosperity. The unerring instinct of the literary purveyor has had its will of the materials, and the editorial judgment has been on duty for their preparation. It is a good thing—this Californian.

Every poet is a mutton head. The mutton head is a genus; the malicious mutton head is a species. This moral maxim is not gratuitous. It is in payment of a long outstanding debt. It means that this office has been a second time invaded. This time there was no music in either the voice or the reputation of the storming party. It meant business, however, and its business was blood. Three writers were at work "doing" the heavy moral, and our poetry editor was in the waste-basket, trying to find a "Sonnet to Sarab Ann." At the first glance the visitant seemed not at all dangerous. It was an ulstered figure, presumably feminine; but there was an ominous hiss following the first sentence, which smelt like the powder of the first volley from a skirmish line. "Who's yer poetry man?" There was a squeak from the depths of the waste basket, and our poetry editor emerged, clad in the engaging modesty which made him so almost invaluable. "I am he," said our poetry editor. "And yer the man which left out 'Dear as Remembered Kisses after Deth'?" It seized him in its willowy hands and thrust him in the blazing grate. Its fingers, cruel as steel bands, bruised in his throat the wail of fate. And this office is now in need of a young man with a more perfect memory, and in whose mutton head there is no malice.

The appointment of James Russell Lowell to the Court of St. James (says the Stock Report) has caused an eruption of rhyme, blank verse, and prose rhapsody over Lowell and Boston and Boston and Lowell. One eruption, an excellent example of Boston literature and sentiment, we reproduce. It is poetry:

O, Boston!
O, certain intense young women with blue goggles; ditto as to the color of their stockings, who "admire" (not "like") to look wise.
O, Commons!
O, prodigious immensity of illimitable conceit; mastodontic prodigiousness of o'erwhelming conceit!
O, beans!
Baked beans!
With brown bread!
O, Oliver Wendell Holmes; and that breakfast at which the things which were said caused the ashes of Solomon themselves, in all their glory, to chill with envy!
O, James Russell Lowell!
Yum!
Yum! Yum!
Hub!!!

Professor Hilgard, of the State University, makes the following sensible suggestion in regard to the ornamentation of the college park: "The varied nature of the University grounds offers locations suitable for a great variety of economically important trees and shrubs; and as they can be utilized for ornament as well by a skillful landscape gardener, I trust that in the planting of the University grounds, outside the portion allotted to the agricultural department, this important consideration will be steadily kept in view. It is certainly eminently desirable that the University Park should not only be made attractive in an ornamental point of view, but should simultaneously be made to subserve, as much as possible, the primary objects of the University. This is the more necessary because of the unfavorable nature of the soil in the greater part of the agricultural grounds proper."

"Annetta" wants to know if there is "a healing cure, a tender balm for a love-stricken heart?" Annetta, child of the usual destiny, there is—you just bet your ethereal language there is a cure, there is a tender balm. Get sea-sick, go to sea for a week; and if the blue Pacific serves you as it served us, you will spread it on the record that it is just a little the balm balmedest balm you ever plastered on.

THE ARENA.

"Judith" vs. "Growler."

SAN FRANCISCO, February 16, 1880.

Ab, "Growler," how bad you are! Why, bless your heart! I know it, even from your own telling. You are a scamp, from the crown of your bald head—"just half enough to be domestic"—to the tips of your un-domestic boots. The girls court you, and so spoil you. But let me tell you—you "big, healthy, loving, generous, clean Man"—that "Judy dear" don't have to "reach" for her kisses, even in leap year; and were "Judy dear" to kiss you, it would make the hair of your head—what there is of it—stand upon end till it broke off. Then you'd be bald indeed. And now, you make me happy with suggestions of a "Mrs. Judith Growler" in the uncertain future, and in the next breath spoil it all by telling me you are leaving me in sorrow—just my luck! Everything that makes life beautiful comes floating to my feet. I stoop to grasp it—when lo! it floats away again, and mocks me from afar upon the bright waters. I look, and my very soul cries out in agonized longing for the lost happiness in prayer to the Lord. But it's all the same. He knows His business, and will do as He pleases.

"Temper!" Yes, indeed! "Judy dear" has the best and worst temper you ever saw. It bears patiently till "forbearance ceases to be a virtue," and then—well, the Lord has need to look after the offender.

"Ada" and "Gany" would like me, though; they would say all sorts of charming things about me were I in a ball-dress—anything lovely—except that I was putty. Bah!—pretty! Is it complimentary to say of these fashion-dolls, with their stuffing of saw-dust, that they are pretty? And yet, poor souls, it makes them happy, and that's what we are here for. No one ever said I was pretty but once—and that was the morning after a carnival. I forgave them for that, for I had retained the mask of satin and lace throughout the night. I excused them, for the white satin dress was short, with a Pompadour-cut neck, bordered round with rare old lace, and the rounded arms bare, from the tops of the ten-buttoned gloves to the shoulder. And I forgave them, for even I looked and wondered if I gave I, for there was nothing like unto me, from the creamy rose-buds garnishing the hair to the golden sandals that graced the feet.

Next for "the man who struck the woman in the face." I won't tell you who he was, but the woman was "Judith." Shall I also tell you how bitterly he was punished? The mark stood there many a long day—the mark upon "Judith's" face—and finally sank out of sight, down in her heart, never, never, never to be wiped out. But "Judith" bent down and kissed the dear, fair hand with the blackened, swollen lips, and buried the loved one deep in her heart beside the blow; and these two will walk, to the end of time, in two separate ways. Is "Judith" a woman?

No, "Growler," we won't get married; we won't settle on Tehama Street; we won't fight; we won't get drunk; we won't get a black eye till you let another woman whip you, and we won't be kissed, even on paper. But we will shake hands, and I will think how lovely (you say) you are, and wonder whether you die a natural death, or get swallowed up by "horned toads, dusky maids, or divorcees."

That same old sixpence,

JUDITH.

There, "Judith," there, "Growler," we have had enough of this. We do not keep a matrimonial agency, nor a sugar shop.

Letter from a Lunatic.

STOCKTON, February 18, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I have been sent here because I am a poet. The reason may be good in law, but it does not sound just right in writing, for I have been searching for "Caliban" and Will Pollock and the lady poets of the Post ever since they locked me into the noisy ward, and not one of them is here. Oscar S. Tuck and Mr. Shinnie have both called since my arrival, but they were both guests of the Superintendent. One of them wanted the doctor to teach him how to develop the "Sideral Sanity of the Red Beet," and the other wanted him to subscribe for the "Anthomystery of a Dead Beat." Mr. Tuck left the following sonnet on the doctor's desk, and that kind-bearded old gentleman flipped the fragment of prospectus on which it was written into our ward:

TO MY LITERARY FAME.

If I had loved you less I should not care
Though you should think my folly worse than weak,
Though you for me should paint each rounded cheek
With the red pigment, shame. I should not fare
A whit less jocund if—beyond compare—
No love for you had thrilled, like rarest wine,
If hope to have and hold you, and to dare
All things for your dear sake had not been mine.
I may not lure the past from out its cave,
I may not set the future on its hill,
I may not name the present as it flies,
Though, with wild looks and wilder words, I rave
With my vain love I may not mate your will,
Or comfort hope that broods with helpless eyes.

I did not see Mr. Shinnie while he was here, but the kindest and prettiest of the matrons gave me the following "elegant extract" in the very neat handwriting of our most excellent young friend:

IN 1881.

In 1881
Brown shall we all be done.
So Mother Shipton said—
Who, happily, is dead,
This 1880.

In 1881
No single mother's son—
Or double mother's sons—
Will "racket with the buns,"
As now in '80.

In 1881
We'll have no end of fun,
Harping on big, damp clouds,
In pretty flannel shrouds
Saved from old '80.

In 1881
Pick, with Old Nick will run
A Hades "go-as-you-please"
Beneath the brimstone trees;
And the Deacon dank will freeze
The torrid furnace breeze.
While we, from clouds of gold,
Will watch these pined-lot-sold
Cheap ghosts, so sanctified and old,
From 1880.

I like Mr. Tuck's best. Don't you? Don't you think they might let me out?

"THE MAN WHO GRINS."

Sweet Belle Jangling.

"Oh! who does know the bent of woman's fantasia?"

SAN JOSE, February 16, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—The above line from Spencer is to let you know that I know "Ajax" is a woman. No man would have written so cruelly, so heartlessly, about the "opposing sex"—at least no one but a very bad man, and bad men are never good writers; while, as you very well know, naughty women have been the cleverest with the female pen, so far as literary history gives any clue.

That, however, is neither here nor there. What I wish to quarrel with in you is the lack of manly spirit—of firmness, perhaps—permitting you to print such writing merely because it is clever. You have more appreciative women readers than you evidently think you have. Or do you think we read "Ganymede," "Hebe," and the "Chips from Other Blockheads," to the exclusion of all other reading in the Argo- naut? Why—if you do know how much we like you—why do you permit another woman to insult the intelligence of every thinking woman reader you have?

I like "spice" as well as any of your readers, but I don't like red lead in my cayenne pepper—do you? Now, if Mistress "Ajax" knows anything about social science—which I doubt—she knows how idle, rapid, and vainglorious her conclusions are. It is true that polygamy is the practice—secret or avowed—with a major portion of existing peoples. It is also true that polyandry is the practice in parts of Thibet, in New Zealand, and in various other places. Further, it is true that drunkenness, or improvidence from alcoholic indulgence, is a habit of mankind. But experience has proven each habit to be a vice, and no person, no community, no people has, in modern times, prospered, in any high sense, under the corroding cloud of any of all these habits.

To go into the detailed statistics social science has tabulated for the investigation of the marriage subject would be to monopolize more space than you would, or well could, spare me; and the doing so would accord to Mistress "Ajax" a consideration that her flimsy flings at argument do not deserve. But for the earnest consideration of the marriage question—which this breath of controversy does not even outline—the safest place in this world is the silent chamber of the chastened heart in the God-given attitude of prayer.

[Well, what would you have? You admit that "Ajax" wrote well; we assert that he (or she) wrote without indecency. Au reste, we are not concerned about the opinions of our correspondents, and supposed that by heading "Ajax's" screed "Letter from a Brute" we had sufficiently expressed our sense of his (or her) moral condition.]

Meant to be Hard Knocks.

LOS ANGELES, February 16, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—I take the liberty of calling your attention to a letter entitled a "Letter from a Brute," dated Oakland, February 9, 1880, signed "Ajax," which appeared in your last issue. If published as a joke, it is entirely too gross and indecent to appear in the Argonaut. If earnestly written, and published as the true views of some one on the subject, then I think it is time for you to give your communications a little closer scrutiny before sending them to print. Any man who would pen such an article in jest, endangers his reputation for decency, character, and morality. Any man who would pen such an article in earnest, either wilfully falsifies the truth, or is void of all respect for humanity, all faith in virtue, and all honor for the sex to which the mother that brought him into this world and nourished him in his infancy belongs. I know, Mr. Editor, that you do not entertain the same opinions expressed in that letter; if you do, you fall far from practicing what you preach, and are one of the boldest hypocrites of the age. No decent man or woman honestly believes but that there are many good and honest people in this world, even in this age, who sacredly and religiously observe their marriage vows, and who are at the same time happy and contented, and belong to none of the classes into which your correspondent divides mankind. Your paper has done much good work, socially and politically, and I, for one, think you owe it to a community that largely patronizes you to "sit down upon" all such contributors, by utterly ignoring their communications.

YOUR CONSTANT READER.

Another Wounded Moralist.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 16, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—I am surprised that you, who I know keep a shotgun, should permit that preposterous fellow, "Ajax," to have his being when you know him to be within range. Confound the fellow, what does he mean by giving us away to the women? Is there no honor among thieves, then? Why, this traitor in the camp, who betrays us to the enemy, ought, as a traitor, to be "shot to death at sunrise." Kindly undo the miscreant's labor by telling the ladies it isn't so. By the beard of the prophet, I think the publication of such atrocious sentiments immoral. Besides, it's really nonsense to say that the average man is not satisfied with one wife. Give him his neighbor's, and see if he will rustle round to get another of his own.

A MAN.

An Always Seasonable Suggestion.

CITY, February 10, '80.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—You know—as all San Franciscans know—what a deucedly windy, foggy, disagreeable city ours is during portions of the summer months. Do not you think that a belt of the swift-growing Australian gum-trees, planted just west of the city, along the ridge of which Lone Mountain is a part, would break our summer winds, absorb our summer fog, and make us a deal happier than we are—who can not afford summer lodgings over the bay?

FRISCAN.

An Oaklander's Protest.

OAKLAND, February 18, 1880.

EDS. ARGONAUT:—Between one and two years ago the City Council of Oakland entered into a contract with the Tribune and Times of that city, by which those papers were to do the city printing at certain rates, for the period of five years. The tax-payers denounced the action of the Council in making a contract which should last for years after its term of office had expired, and at rates which were outrageously exorbitant. It was reported that Mayor Andrus shirked the responsibility of signing, or refusing to sign, the obnoxious ordinance, by absenting himself from the city at the time. During such absence the ordinance became a law, without any other action on his part, as provided by the charter.

Andrus was re-elected Mayor by the non-tax-payers of Oakland, assisted by those whose interests he had as faithfully served. The existence of the contract, as well as the circumstances attending the passage of the ordinance, are almost forgotten by the general public of Oakland; but the owners of real estate are frequently very forcibly reminded that the contract is anything but a myth.

By order of the Council a sewer has just been laid in a street, fronting upon a small lot, of which I have the charge. I examined the books in the Marshal's office to ascertain the cost of the sewer. These are the figures:

For lamp-hole, man-hole and covers, and superintendent's salary, $47; for sewer, and all the labor performed in laying the same, $62.04; for advertising, $63.32. The advertising, therefore, came to more than the sewer, and about three-fifths as much as all other things combined.

Advertising of street work now in the city of Oakland costs the property-owners about five or six times as much as it did formerly, when newspapers were allowed to compete for the advertising. Either of these papers will do the same amount of advertising for private individuals for $10. In looking over the files of the Oakland papers, it will be seen that much of the street work is done in small pieces. The cost of advertising for these is as much as for larger pieces, and proportionally much higher for the tax-payers.

The sewer referred to in this article is only about one hundred and twenty feet long. A protest was presented against sewerage such a small part of the street, when contiguous portions of the same street needed sewerage equally as much, and could be included in the same contract without injury to any one and proportionally at much less cost. The protest did not even receive a respectful consideration. The letting of these small contracts still goes on. The owners of the papers are profited thereby. Do any others receive a profit from it?

I remain, an indignant, though powerless, TAX-PAYER.

The Puff-Ball in Politics.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 20, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—The markets of this city are at present insufficiently stocked with the puff-ball, an edible fungus of pronounced socialistic utility. Mr. Justin P. Moore, of San Rafael, has printed a valuable paper on edible fungi, in which he shows clearly, and I think convincingly, that a great many varieties, not only of true mushrooms, but of what are commonly known as "toad stools," may be eaten with impunity when young. In regard to the eating of puff-balls, it is explained that they must be perfectly white inside, the yellow interior of those some days old indicating their unwholesomeness. It might simplify existing labor complications if those color-blind capitalists who persist in employing Chinese should go a puff-ball picking. The noxious fungus would be all of a "whattness" to them, and in their descent of the yellow stair there would be great joy.

MRS. SMITH.

An Old Maid's Plea for Her Guild.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 19, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—"Thoughts are so great. They seem to come upon us like a deep flood."

While quite alone this evening I took up one of George Eliot's works. I always find in this writer many very true sentiments, very touching truths, especially to a woman. The one above particularly moved me; it seemed as though I had paused a moment to look back over the waste of waters—my past. Trifling joys, deep sorrows, alike "lay upon me like a deep flood," almost drowning me by the surging of the waters.

"An old maid, jilted more than half a century ago." Perhaps I am mistaken; it may not have been a beautiful thought of a gifted woman, but the careless slur of a man, in his criticism for a brilliant journal, that caused the floodgates to break open, letting me see the wrecks of many years still floating on the waters. Man is ever ready with his unjust interpretation of motives, ever ready to catch at a straw, to let it fall, and then to think of it afterward as a log of wood so heavy as to bend his back in carrying it.

To me, nothing is so offensive as the epithet "old maid." Because I am one, and the home-thrust cuts deeply? Not so, but because it is ever given as an opprobrium. Young girls are duly educated, introduced into society, advised with an idea to escape the fate of an "old maid," to make the best "catch" of the season. Young men can find no pleasure in "old maids' company, no matter how cultivated or intellectual they may be; life is short, their purses but scantily filled; it is time for them to angle for "gold fish."

Did it ever occur to you that the title of "old maid" could be one to be honored. Did you ever imagine its bearer to be a noble woman who has suffered—a woman, perhaps, whose bright, best days may have been devoted to the demands of duty? Many women, not mothers, have fulfilled a mother's trust; and when later they find themselves supplanted by ties newly formed, they feel the want of the right to the sacred name of mother. Then—can you blame them? They remember a love crushed down, while duty stared them in the face. Then they feel that they had had the pain—they might have had the joys. Did it ever occur to you that some women had such strange ideas that neither money nor position were equivalent, indeed synonymous to "love, honor, and obey," and rather than be mistress of fifty palaces, they chose to be "old maids"?

Every day the papers are describing brilliant social entertainments. Can you see behind the door when society is absent? Does the old-fashioned sentiment of love pervade those fashionable households? Are the husband and father, the wife and mother there? Perhaps so, too often they are not, for what thoughtful father would allow wine to flow freely? What old-time mother would put temptation in her dear child's way?

Have you ever thought where your sons go after these entertainments? Have you cared? Oh! if mothers would think of the lives dependent on them for all that is best helpful in the young lives they rear. Will mothers always be content to see their daughters the mistresses of one man's wealth, of another man's heart? Will they remain content to see their sons bereft of reason, lower than beasts in their excesses?

Let no mother laugh at an "old maid." It is better that daughters were such, with nothing to fill the void caused by loneliness, by the lack of all that to woman is most beautiful, than to see them whirling in the vortex of fashion, dragging so many down. How many less divorces, how many less heart-aches, how much more self-respect would there be in the world to-day, if gold were not the god, and an "old maid's" fate less dreaded.

A Quadrangular Fight.

SACRAMENTO, February 16, 1880.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—We like the "Sore-head Warble" (and what a "sore" warble it was, anyway!) of poor Prod—we mean "Pauline" and the virtuous "Virgie." We like to be noticed by two so well known in fame. We think we're on the road to fame and fortune. Do it some more! We'd like to "pepper" them in French, but this article is entirely too "sacred," and as they tell us there is no one in the city to translate their native language for them, we'll stick to the old Saxon, which is very good in its way. Sorry we can't accommodate them in Dutch, but pate de foie gras is better to our palate than sauer-kraut! We wonder if "Virgie" and "Paulie" are so old in virtue and years that they have forgotten their respective mammies were Madame de la Tour of Normandy, and Margaret of Brittany?

BETSY AND I.

Art and No Art.

SAN FRANCISCO, February 9, 1880.

EDITORS ARGONAUT:—A number of "our own painters," who do not condescend to "draw" at all, may read the following testimony of William E. Marshall with possible profit. Speaking of Couture, one of the art-ions of the season 1850-65, Mr. Marshall says:

"Couture's method in art has often been inquired about. It was as simple as it was effective. Absolutely perfect drawing was the first requirement. The subject was outlined on canvas with a crayon point in every general feature; it was then painted in light and shade with bitumen, after which it was finished in pigments. His only principle was never to correct; if the beginning was imperfect, commence a new picture."

To me, good drawing is as vital to the integrity of painting as is grammar to the worth of literature. Is the art school wise in permitting its pupils to use the wings of painting before they have mastered the use of art's every-day legs—drawing?

PAUL AND VIRGIE.

A "Railroad Employee" writes, asking if it "Be not practical to create a fund out of the surplus earnings of servants of railroad companies which shall to some extent assure them against the time when they are no longer able to perform active duty?" We think such a scheme, if judiciously managed, might be productive of great good. We think, however, that some system which comprehended the insistence upon frugality as a factor of continuance in employment, and a moral system which compelled wives and children to look always to the husband and father as bread-winner—compelling him to provide or else cease to create—would be the best system for the servants of the railroads, and for all servants.

"J." is informed that the "Marseillaise" mentioned by our contributor is the famous revolutionary hymn. It's a tolerably good thing, too, when well sung.

The gifted author of "The Lay of a Carpet" is requested to add a few lines explaining whether it was tacked down at the edges.

"Pond Lilies." The MS. is found, but we have lost your name and address.

No, "Parsee," we will not print your "Hymn to Fire;" we will refer it to the subject of it. Couldn't you favor us with an "Ode to the Waste-basket"?

CXVII.—Sunday, February 22.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons.

Vermicelli Soup.
Potato Salad.
Beefsteak and Mushrooms.
Boiled Rice. Green Peas. Celery with Cream Sauce.
Roast Chicken. Potato Croquettes.
Lettuce, French Dressing.
Ice Cream. Brandied Peaches. Orange Cake.
Fruit-bowl of Apples, Pears, Oranges, and Bananas.
To MAKE ORANGE CAKE.—Two cups sugar, two and a half cups of flour, five eggs, half cup of water, the grated rind and juice of one orange, and one teaspoonful yeast powder. Reserve the whites of two eggs for soft icing. Beat the eggs together; add sugar; beat again; put in the orange water, and, lastly, in the flour. Make in two tins for twenty minutes. Beat the whites of the two eggs, with the grated orange and two cups of sugar, until thick; then spread the cakes when cold, and ice the top with the other half, and decorated sugar.

AMERICANISM IN LETTERS.

Mr. Richard Grant White in the New York "Times."

Some ten or twelve years ago I found in the corner of a stray newspaper that fell into my hands some verses entitled "Her Letter." I read the first three or four stanzas, pleased and amused with the light social satire veiled under the supposed writer's description of her new position in life. But when I came to that which tells her memories of the dance in Harrison's barn, lit by tallow candles, and

"Of the steps that we took to one fiddle,
Of the dress of my queer vis-a-vis;
And how I once went down the middle
With the man that shot Sandy McGee!"—

I said to myself, Is there not here something new? and has not this rhymed produced, although in a small way, the "something American" in literature for which so many people both in Europe and in America, but chiefly in Europe, have been asking so long? At that time the very name of Mr. Bret Harte was unknown to me, and when, a few days afterward as it happened, a copy of the Overland Monthly Magazine fell into my hands, and I read a story, or sketch, in which the experiences of a Mr. John Oakhurst and his companions, who went astray in the natural wilderness of the West, as some of them had gone astray in the man-made maze of life, the question came up again, Is this a new thing under the sun? Has there appeared in California the beginning of an American literature?

Of course it was not long—only a few days—before I found out who it was that had given me this new pleasure. But before I had made that discovery I had answered the questions which he had provoked, and the answer was, No—surely, unmistakably, No. Nor was this answer at all biased by displeasure—a displeasure which had in it an element of sadness—at the obtrusive ugliness of the fact that this new and seemingly "American" literature owed its distinctive qualities chiefly to the fact that its subject and its substance were furnished by vulgarity glaring in the unaccustomed light of newly-bought diamonds, and by a remnant of unextinguished human emotions of blacklegs, demireps, hoosiers, and hoodlums. For, although it was not pleasant to believe that an American literature must needs find its exciting cause, and its material, in coarse and degraded forms of life, it was clear, upon brief reflection, that subject, with its adjuncts of manners, customs, habits, and costume, is neither the source nor the sign of a distinctive literature—or as it is generally, but wrongly, called, a national literature—and therefore that the question of Americanism remained unaffected in any way by these vivid, picturesque, and humorous sketches of Western life.

In all these writings, whether in the originals or in the many clever imitations which their success has called forth, it will be found that only the subject is new. The personages and their surroundings make up a striking picture, which has the zest of novelty. In them we make new acquaintances, and are brought into contact with strange manners and unaccustomed habits of life—an experience which is more likely to be agreeable in books or on the stage than it is in real life. Hence the peculiar interest of these writings, and that sense of freshness which they brought with them, and which caused so many persons to welcome them as the bright dawn of a new and national literature. They are, however, nothing of the sort. They leave the question of a new and so-called "national" or "American" literature as untouched as it had been before left by Mr. Curtis's charming Howadji, and by his humorous Potiphar Papers, or—to take as an illustration the greatest work of prose fiction given to English literature in the last half century, and the most American in its subject—as it had been left by Hawthorne's Scarlet Letter.

The scene in Harrison's barn, with its flags and tallow candles, its mining desperadoes mingling with pretty women, who bear easily sudden transplantation to the somewhat crude splendors of the Fifth Avenue, is new; but so it would have been new if Mr. Charles Reade, having lived in California long enough to be familiar with its peculiar customs, had written a sketch of life there in prose or in verse. In all this literature there is nothing new but the subject. Any man of English blood, gifted with the faculties of observation and narration, with humor and with literary skill, and who had lived in California for a few years, and had made life there the subject of his story, would have produced what would have differed in no essential element, even slightly, from Mr. Bret Harte's work. The differences that might have existed would have been the result of individual peculiarities—merely such differences as distinguish any two British or any two American writers from each other. But if a Frenchman had undertaken the same literary task, there would have been a great and highly distinctive difference, a difference not at all dependent upon the language in which he wrote, but which would be plainly apparent, even in a perfectly idiomatic English translation of his work. And if a German writer had done the like, we should have had yet a third variation. The German work would differ from both the French and the English, and these differences would be in a literary way essential and characteristic. No such differences would exist between the writing of an Englishman and a so-called American, nor is it possible that they should exist.

Now, it is in such characteristic traits as those which produce these differences between the treatment of the same subject by writers of various races, that what is mis-called national literature has its origin, and, indeed, its very existence. It is French wit, French felicity of phrase, French subtlety, French finish, the absence of a certain humor and a certain homeliness, and, above all, French spirit—as appreciable and as unmistakable, but as indescribable, as the perfume of pinks or of primroses—which makes French literature French, and different from English literature or from German, in something other and far more important and significant than either its language or its subjects. Charlotte Brontë's Villette is not French literature because of its French scene and its French personages; nor, in like manner and for just the same reasons, is The Luck of Roaring an American literature because of scenes and personages found in the Far West of America. On the other hand, it is the scene and its personages which give The Sentimental Journey its French-like character. That is due to the French cast of Sterne's mind, and to an intentional imitation of French manner. It seems plain that in writing this book Sterne deliberately and easily cast his thought into a French mould. This peculiarity of style, which is a mental manifestation of difference of race, is so great in some writers that they can not be translated into the languages of peoples very foreign in spirit to their own. It is impossible to express the spirit of Shakespeare's poetry or the humor of his personages in the French language—absolutely impossible; all their distinctive qualities vanish in the translation. So, I am sure, must all the best part of Dickens be absolutely untranslatable into French. Imagine the result of attempting to give a French dress to the Pickwick Papers! Could the wildest grotesque of masquerade be anything beyond it! To this untransferable spirit alone does so-called national literature owe its individual character.

Those who cry out for an American literature, and particularly for an American drama, and who prescribe, as a means of attaining this, the treatment of American subjects, must do so surely in absolute ignorance or in utter forgetfulness of the teachings of English literature, and in particular of English dramatic literature at its best period in this respect. Of Shakespeare's fourteen comedies, only one is English in subject, and that one is not among the best of them, and was, according to tradition, written to order. All the rest have Italian or French subjects. Of his thirteen tragedies, not one has an English subject, for even King Lear is not English. Of his two poems, neither is English in subject. His historical plays were written hardly as works of imagination, but with the deliberate purpose of putting events in English history visibly before the people. They were called "histories." They do not properly come under present consideration. Of Marlowe's eight plays, only one has an English subject, and that one is a "history." Among Chapman's sixteen tragedies and comedies, not one has an English subject. Massinger wrote nineteen plays, of which one only has its scene laid in England. Not to weary the reader with a superfluity of such detail, the whole range of Elizabethan literature, as well narrative and poetical as dramatic, presents a like un-English choice of scene and subject on the part of writers of whom it may be said that they are at once the greatest and the most distinctively English that the English race has produced. It is not until we descend to the lesser lights of the Restoration and of the last century that we find the successful dramatists selecting their subjects from English contemporary life. And the contemporaneity of the subjects of their comedies (for in tragedy they and their successors in the present century went abroad for their subjects) is very important to us in our consideration of this question; for dramas and novels founded on American subjects must find them, to all intents and purposes, exclusively in contemporary life. For America has no history to speak of; none at all which gives any peculiarity to mental tone or manners.

It can not be too clearly or too constantly borne in mind that the term "America" has marked, hitherto at least, no other peculiarity than that of place and political condition. Now, distinctive character in literature is the product, not of place or of political independence, but of race. Englishmen write as Englishmen because they are of English blood and their minds have been formed by English literature, just as Frenchmen write as Frenchmen because they are of French blood, and have been intellectually trained by French teachers and French traditions. It is impossible that a people mainly—and until of late as to the formative element, wholly—English in blood, English in speech, English in mental training and tradition, should produce anything but English literature—literature English in spirit, no matter what its subject. And if the spirit be English, what matter for the rest? That is but accidental, the substance of which is moulded into the work of art. Our dramatists may present us with American scenes; but unavoidably they will do this only as English writers. The distinction between British politics and American politics is very clear. A distinction between British literature and American literature does not exist; it is purely fictitious. The great grammatical historian of the English language, the German Maetznier, recognized this truth fully. His authorities are, for his later period, equally American and British. He makes no distinction; both are English.

There can never be a distinctively American literature until there is a distinctive American race to produce that literature. It need not be said that no such race now exists. When Anglo-Saxon and Hollander and German and Irishman and Negro and Chinese have so blended their blood, centuries hence (may it be cycles!), that from the fusion a new race shall have sprung, with a new heart, new senses, and a new brain, then there will be an American literature which will come, as all originality comes, unsought, unknown, the mere utterance of the inner consciousness of a new soul.

One day, some years ago, when her majesty was standing on the public road, near Balmoral, sketching the castle from a particular point, a flock of sheep approached. Her majesty, being intent on her work, took little notice of the flock, and merely moved a little nearer the side of the road. A boy in charge of the sheep shouted at the top of a stentorian voice:

"Stan' oot o' the road, 'oman, an' let the sheep gae by!"
Her majesty not moving out of the way quite so fast as the shepherd wished, he again shouted:
"Fat ar' ye stan'in' there for? Gang oot o' that an' let the sheep pass!"

One of her majesty's attendants, who had been at a distance, on hearing his royal mistress thus rudely assailed, went up to the shepherd and thus addressed him:

"Do you know whom it is you have been speaking so rudely to, boy?"

"No; I neither ken nor care; but be she fa' she likes, she sudna be i' the sheeps' road."

"That's the Queen," said the official.

The boy looked astonished, and after recovering his senses said, with great simplicity:

"The Queen! Od, fat way disna she pit on cloes that foulk can ken her?"

SOCIAL AFFINITIES.

Some Nice Reading for Our Nice People.

The belief is so widely held (says the orthodox New York Times) that all men like all women that it has come to be regarded as a self-evident truth. But a little observation shows that the belief may be erroneous; that it can not by any means be accepted in its universality. Indeed, there is reason to doubt whether, in high civilization, the reverse of this may not be sustained. In a state of nature the sexes are indisputably drawn together; they are mutually dependent; each gives what the other lacks; their correlation is a need no less than an affinity. They are forced by instinct as well as meagreness of environment to like one another; a certain affection is begotten of requirement. They quarrel violently; the men are irrepressibly brutal; they beat their women; and from such savagery emotional reaction is inevitable, and goes by the name of love.

In enlightenment, amid the epicureanism and artificiality of great cities, the sexes are more separated; their spheres are distinct; their duties and their pleasures do not clash. Men have their daily round; women have theirs: the two need have nothing in common, unless they be so inclined, and many men evidently are not so inclined. What a host of men there are in every commercial centre who seem to have no association with women! They are very justly called men's men, as others are called women's men—because these are forever dangling after petticoats, and appear to be bound by fluttering ribbons. The men's men are not bachelors or widowers only, as might be surmised. Many are husbands and fathers, in the sense at least that they have been married and have children; but they are never seen with their wives; their marriage rests not on proof, but on tradition. They are not misogynists—misogyny is usually a transient condition, tending to the opposite extreme; they do not even disapprove of women as a body or in the abstract; they simply feel no interest in them personally, and keep out of their company. They fail to like women. If they were obliged to be much in their society they would dislike them heartily, and would in time become their bitter foes. Women tire and annoy them, and these men preserve mental peace by letting women severely alone. The fault is with the men; but the absence of all partiality for the other sex is undoubted and undeniable.

It may be said that this dislike of women on the part of men is the result of the artificiality of modern society; that if men did not cultivate false tastes, were not corrupted by dissipation and unwholesome pleasures, they would not have such feelings. Unhappily for this argument, their indisposition to the other sex is unmistakably manifested in childhood, when nature reigns supreme. Small boys of a healthful, normal kind hardly ever like girls of their own or any age. In truth, they detest them, so far as eagerness to get away from them can express detestation. They can not be induced to remain any time in their company on any terms. Their presence is an annoyance, and to be forced into it would be a chastisement. In many rural schools, in fact, boys are made to sit with the girls as a punishment, which usually proves effective in preventing the recurrence of the offense of which they have been guilty. "You are a regular girl," is one of the severest things a boy can say to another; so severe that it is taken, as it is intended, as a gross insult, and usually brings on active hostilities. Girls are commonly spoken of with supreme contempt, with a sarcasm designed to be withering, by nearly all boys from six to sixteen.

Boys do not reach the spoonery stage generally until they are out of their teens, and then a little feminine society goes a great way with them. They cherish in a very awkward manner a stupid sort of sentimental attachment, but they retain their appetite for rough sports, and often, on the eve of twenty, would prefer hanging cats, breaking street-lamps, and fighting with other striplings, to kissing the rosiest lips that sixteen summers had ever sweetened, or holding undisputed possession of a score of school-girls' hearts.

The period when men are fondest, or least averse to women, is commonly between twenty-five and thirty-five, and even then they can seldom be long absorbed by one passion, or by many passions. At forty, having at that age usually escaped the perils of matrimony, they are firmly fixed in the routine and habits of bachelorhood. Men are frequently very foolish, and make themselves ridiculous enough, about the other sex; but they rarely have the folly and take on the ridiculous aspect more than once in an ordinary lifetime. Their grand passion is apt to be short, and they are subsequently so sensible of what has been its effect upon them, are so conscious of the ludicrous part they then played, that they do not repeat it. Marriage cures them of any tendency to relapse; or, if not marriage, the observation of the conduct of others in similar circumstances. To have been once in love, and to have climbed out by dint of reflection, and with unassisted effort, is prone to keep a man forever after, as he would probably put it, in the paths of common sense. The fact that he has made an ass of himself, and is conscious thereof, renders him merciless to all other asses from the same cause.

That the great majority of men have continually recurring spasms of tenderness, of affection, of ardent love, for women, it would be idle and absurd to contradict; but this is very different from liking them generally or uniformly, from wanting to be with them, from experiencing pleasure or happiness in their habitual presence. Even the men who admit their delight in feminine society are easily satisfied, not to say surfeited, with it. Their highest raptures do not hinder them from hankering after masculine friends and masculine modes of killing time.

Club-houses, whence women are rigorously excluded, never lose their allurements for men; few homes can compete with those successfully; the joys of the club-house seem to the average man to be perennial. Inconceivably, all this is due to the ineradicable barbarism of our sex, to their inferior moral nature, to their animal instincts and selfish natures. Men are as well aware of this as women are. But their undeveloped morality, their lack of complete civilization, is not at issue. The question, "Do men, as a rule, like women?" is certainly an open one.

An Arkansas woman is now living with her fourteenth husband, and has only worked one county.

"THE LORD OF ALL THE DEVILS."

And Other Brief Personal Anecdotes.

An altogether jovial fellow was the Chevalier de Forges, Louis XV.'s favorite valet, who had conferred upon himself the titles, "Marquis of the Earthly Paradise, Viscount of the Infernal Regions, and Lord of All the Devils," and wanted to have the law of a priest who would not allow him to sign these titles at length on the parish register as witness to a baptism. When the city of Paris laid out the plans for a new market, he refused to sell one of his houses, the site of which was needed. He went to law with the city, beat it, and compelled a modification of the plans, celebrating his victory by having painted on the wall of the contested building a life-size picture of a sheep shaving a wolf.

He went to do his own marketing in his "thousand-crown coat," so called because he had saved a thousand crowns' worth of other coats by wearing it. He was commissioned by a bashful friend to go and ask the hand of a young lady in marriage, and, finding her pretty and pleasant, he married her himself. Having married her, he naturally fell in love with and abducted a beautiful girl, a young Jewess. Her parents went in pursuit of her, and prosecuted the search with such keenness that it was necessary to take heroic measures. Accordingly, M. de Forges went to the Archbishop of Paris, and represented that a certain ecclesiastic had been laboring with a young Hebrew woman, and had well-nigh persuaded her to turn from the errors of Judaism and embrace the Christian faith. Unhappily, her parents were endeavoring to persecute her into steadfastness in the tenets of their religion, and so it would be proper and laudable to furnish her with an asylum.

The unsuspecting Archbishop thereupon found her a refuge in a convent, and thus the pursuers were completely baffled. Only for a time, however, because they found out the Chevalier, and worried him so excessively, with the assistance of his wife, that he agreed to abandon the girl to them. The girl, furious with him, and as furious with her parents, refused to give him back a large sum of money he had entrusted to her keeping, abjured the Hebrew faith, and took the veil. Only one thing was now possible to complete this complicated drama. The Chevalier had given his ecclesiastical friend, the pretended convert of the girl, a benefice for his assistance in bamboozling the Archbishop. Now the honest abbé came upon the scene, and eloped with the new-made nun!

The youth of men who have achieved distinction seldom fails to be interesting, because it is very apt to show the stuff they are composed of. An account has recently been given of the first engagement in which Farragut took part. It was in 1813—Farragut was only twelve years of age, and had been less than twelve months in the navy—when the American vessel Essex was captured by the Phæbe and Cherub, of the British fleet. He saw the hostile ships approach with awe, and read with precocious perception the hopelessness of the forthcoming combat in the faces of his surrounding elders. He experienced sickening horror when the first man was torn to pieces by a shell, before his eyes, but felt the steadily growing firmness of his nerves as the battle deepened. He was actively occupied in carrying orders, serving the guns—in any service, indeed, that might be required—and was knocked down the companionway by the corpse of a man falling on him, but escaped with a few bruises. He afterward called to a sailor to dodge a ball, and drew him aside, though not quickly enough to avoid a wound in the leg.

After the capture he went on board the Phæbe, and was so mortified that he could scarcely refrain from tears. Observing the pet pig of the Essex on the enemy's ship, in possession of a young reefer, he claimed it, and was told that he might have it if he could beat its captor. A ring was formed, and in a few minutes the American lad was pronounced the victor. Having been sent for by the Captain of the Phæbe, he went into the cabin, was asked to take some breakfast, and his chagrin being visible, was encouraged by the British officer with the words: "Never mind, my little fellow; it may be your turn next." "I hope so," answered the lad, and hurried off to hide his emotion.

Sothern once asked six men to dinner. By the appointed time three had arrived, but the others were late. After waiting for some time Sothern and his early guests began to grow impatient, but were relieved by bearing a ringing and knocking at the street door. "Here they are, confound them!" said Sothern. "Look here, you three men get under the table." Knowing the actor's capacity for joking, and expecting something good, the three early guests got under the table, and had just stowed themselves away when the three late arrivals were shown in. "How are you?" said Sothern very cordially; "glad to see you, though you are a bit late. Now we'll have dinner. I have three other men dining with me to-night, and they've been here some time; but for some reason or other they've got under the table."

The Diary of the Shah of Persia gives to a waiting world the following anecdote:

"A smart soldier, very lightly dressed, without coat, and an old lady whom they addressed as 'Madame,' whose business it was to show the ruins, came out. The old lady, who spoke softly but eloquently, led the way. We walked some distance and reached a number of curious stones lying in the road. The old lady stood still after every pace she made, and said, slowly and quietly, that the stones resembled a human skull and skeleton. We then arrived at a great oak tree, and the old lady again stood still, and gave a long explanation to the effect that this tree was one that had been planted by Madame de Maintenon, one of the mistresses of Louis XIV. There was also a cave there. The old lady again stopped opposite to the cave, at a broken stone, and related how some king or another had sat there with his wife or mistress, both very much in love with each other.

"We passed this stone, and reached a piece lying a little higher than the surrounding ground, where a great number of large stone slabs were piled one on another, and from which we had a fine view of a part of the forest and some of the surrounding country. Here the old woman gave us such a long speech regarding ancient people and their virtues that I was completely tired out, and called out to the soldier to run hard and fetch my carriage. The soldier went, but the old woman continued her course, and cried out: 'Come along, here are some caves and old ruins.' There was another slab, and as I did not go, she somewhat hastily came and told us that the stone resembled a mushroom. Besides all this, the weather was warm, and the forest was full of gnats, and I was very glad when the carriage arrived and delivered me from the interminable speeches of the old woman."

Grimod de la Reynière was, in every sense of the word, a literary epicure. His Almanach des Gourmands is still a text-book deservedly esteemed, and in nowise superseded by later treatises on the subject. An experience of sixty years enabled him to speak as a recognized authority, accepted by his contemporaries, and entitled by common consent to occupy the foremost rank among the "classics of the table." With him this prestige was hereditary—his father and grandfather, both members of the confraternity of fermiers-généralistes, were well-known and distinguished gourmands.

The latter died, it is said, in 1754, of an indigestion caused by an over-indulgence in his favorite dainty, pâté de foie gras. He may, indeed, be cited as one of the leading patrons of that famous school of cookery which originated with Vatel, and attained its culminating point of excellence during the reign of Louis XV. In those days the invention of a new dish was a brevet of celebrity, and the highest nobles in the land did not disdain to officiate as sponsors to gastronomic creations, due in most cases to the inspiration of their chefs. Were it not for the receipt of salt cod and cream which bears his name, who would have heard of the Marquis de Béchamel? And what other memorial have we of the Regent's lively daughter than the filets de la perche à la Berry?

Later still, we are indebted to the Maréchal de Richelieu for the incomparable mayonnaise, and to Madame de Pompadour for the filets de volaille à la Bellevue; nor should the legacies transmitted to posterity by three illustrious ladies of the court be forgotten, in the shape of the cailles à la Mirepoix, the chartruses à la Maucoussell, and the poulets à la Villeroi. Louis XVI. was no epicure; as far as he was personally concerned, the post of the royal chef was comparatively a sinecure, the exercise of his talent being usually limited to the daily supply of plain joints and other simple fare; whereas his brother, the Comte de Provence, and the future commander of the émigrés, on the contrary, established their reputation as bons vivants by respectively inventing the potages à la Xavier and à la Condé.

In London, Alfieri was introduced into the most fashionable and aristocratic society of the day, and for a time frequented balls, routs, supper parties, and all the scenes of fashionable dissipation. But after about three months of this life he became intolerably weary of it. Indeed, at all times he found what is technically called "society" to be as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. And he then took an eccentric resolution: instead of acting the part of a fine gentleman at these festivities, he determined to play the coachman outside the doors! One of his intimates was a young gentleman of a noble Piedmontese family, and nephew to Prince Masserano, Spanish Ambassador at the Court of St. James. The young fellow was an Adonis in his way, and had no troublesome inbred genius in his composition to make him despise or mistrust the all-sufficing pleasures of a fashionable life. Him, therefore, did our Alfieri drive about London, hither and thither, late and early, to all the places of public and private entertainment frequented by the beau monde.

He boasts a little of the success he achieved as a whip, and being able to hold his own, even with the famous London coachmen. Many a time did he extricate himself from a crowd of vehicles waiting for the fine company at Ranelagh or the theatres, and come off with honor, and without damage to the carriage or the cattle. Surely this is as odd a kind of "haunt" as ever tragic poet frequented! Fancy the tall, fair, handsome, well-born Vittorio Alfieri, the future author of Antigone and the Saul; the melancholy, moody, sensitive, enthusiastic genius, fighting and struggling and swearing and cutting in and out, amid a mob of periwigged coachmen and powdered lackeys, and a mass of heavy, splendid coaches, and a clatter of stamping hoofs and rattling wheels; while fine ladies in hoops and fine gentlemen in their court suits, and with rapiers by their sides, crushed and elbowed each other in the alleys of Ranelagh or on the staircase of some grand mansion in the fashionable purlieus of St. James's!

Count Schouvaloff is quoted by the London World as telling this pleasant story: When he was comparatively obscure and unknown, he found himself at dinner one evening beside one of our so-called grandes dames, whose haughtiness piqued, while it amused, the discerning diplomatist. The fish disposed of, he hazarded a remark. No answer. An excellent salade Russe made its appearance, and the count politely asked permission to recommend one of the delicacies of his country. A blank stare rewarded his effort. Not to be beaten without a struggle, he ventured upon a third observation, toward the ices. With studied languor, the lady turned and yawned, slowly, systematically, capaciously in his face. "Ah, madam, I feel for you," cried the count in a loud voice; "I also have many teeth stopped with gold."

Droll stories have attained currency in Hartford anent Gilbert and Sullivan. It appears that during the rehearsals of The Pirates of Penzance one of the female chorus-singers was observed by Mr. Gilbert to be weeping bitterly, and refusing to be comforted by her companions. Feeling interested, he asked her the cause of her grief, but she rigidly refused to disclose it. All that he could learn from her was that the costumer of the theatre had insulted her gravely. "But what did she say to you?" persisted Gilbert. "Oh! I never will repeat it," was the reply that came through the tears that almost choked her. "I will not allow any of my people to be insulted here," said Mr. Gilbert, "and if you will tell me what was said I will see that amends are made." After considerable hesitation, the girl sobbed: "Well, sir, she—she—told me—I was no better than I should be!" "But you are, aren't you?" inquired Gilbert, with the most sympathetic earnestness.

THE OTHER POETS.

Lorelei.

[From the German of Heine.]

Ah, what all this sadness presages
That haunts my mind to-day,
With a legend of by-gone ages
I can not chase away!

The air is still, it is darkling,
And still flows the Rhine;
The sun on the mountain is sparkling,
Its mildest evening shine.

I see a charming maid reclining
So wonderful up there,
I see her golden jewels shining—
She combs her golden hair.

She combs it with a comb so golden,
And sings a song thereby;
And it sounds like a song of olden,
Of wondrous melody.

The boatman below is forgetting
About the falls that are nigh;
A wild spell his heart is besetting,
As he gazes on the sky.

But I fear he'll go to destruction—
Against the rocks he'll run;
And this with her song of seduction
The Lorelei hath done.

That New World.

How gracious we are to grant to the dead
Those wide, vague lands in the foreign sky,
Reserving the world for ourselves instead;
For we must live, though others must die!

And what is the world that we keep, I pray?
True, it has glimpses of dews and flowers;
Then youth and love are here and away,
Like mated birds—but nothing is ours.

Ah, nothing indeed, but we cling to it all;
It is nothing to hear one's own heart beat,
It is nothing to see one's own tears fall;
Yet surely the breath of our life is sweet.

Yes, the breath of our life is so sweet, I fear,
We were loath to give it for all we know
Of that charmed country we bold so dear,
Far into whose beauty the breathless go.

Yet certain we are when we see them fade
Out of the pleasant light of the sun,
Of the sands of gold in the palm-leaf's shade,
And the strange, high jewels all these have won.

You dare not doubt it. O soul of mine!
And yet, if these vacant eyes could see
One, only one, from that voyage divine,
With something, anything, sure for me!
Ah! blow me the scent of one lily, to tell
That it grew outside of the world, at most;
Ah! show me a plume to touch, or a shell
That whispers of some unearthly coast.

—Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt.

Love holds me so!
I would that I could go!
I flutter up and down, and to and fro,
In vain—Love holds me so.

Love let me go—
I seek him high and low;
I wander up and down, and to and fro,
In vain, in vain—Life is cruel woe,
Since Love has let me go. —The Spectator.

Sooner or Later.

Sooner or later the storm shall beat
Over my slumber from head to feet;
Sooner or later the wind shall rave
In the long grasses above my grave.

I shall not heed them when I lie—
Nothing that sounds shall signify,
Nothing the headstone's fret of rain;
Nothing to me the dark day's pain.

Sooner or later the sun shall shine
With tender warmth on that mound of mine,
Sooner or later in summer's air
Clover and violets blossom there.

I shall not feel in that deep-laid rest
The sheeted light fall over my breast,
Nor ever note in those hidden hours
The wind-blown breath of the tossing flowers.

Sooner or later stainless snows
Shall add their hush to my mute repose—
Sooner or later shall slant and shift,
And heap my bed with their dazzling drift.

Sooner or later the bee shall come,
And fill the noon with its golden hum;
Sooner or later, on half-poised wing
The bluebird about my grave will sing—

Sing and chirp and whistle with glee,
Nothing his music can mean to me,
None of those beautiful things shall know
How soundly their lover sleeps below.

Never a ray shall part the gloom
That wraps me round in the silent tomb;
Peace shall be perfect to lip and brow
Sooner or later—ah! why not now?

Best.

"Love is better than house or lands;
So, Sir Stephen, I'll ride with thee!"
Quick she steps where the courser stands,
Light she springs to the saddle-tree.

Love is better than kith or kin:
So close she clung, and so close clasped he;
They heard no sob of the bitter wind,
Nor the snow that shuddered along the lea.

Love is better, than life or breath!
The drifts are over the horse's knee;
Softly they sink to the soft, cold death,
And the snow-shroud folds them silently.

Houses and lands are gone for
Kith and kin like the wild
Life and breath have fluttered
But love hath blossomed of

THE ARGONAUT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1880.

There is a complete and widespread misapprehension of the effect of the anti-Chinese clauses of the new Constitution. It is a popular error to think that a law is more sacred or more potent because it happens to have been enacted by a Constitutional Convention and confirmed by the people. Nothing is further from the truth. The law, whether created by the Constitution, or passed by the Legislature, or by the city and county Supervisors, or Board of Education, is at last only the law, and its power or efficiency cannot be increased or diminished by the imagination merely. The Constitution of the United States and the laws and treaties made in pursuance of it are still the supreme law of the land. If the Legislature of the State could not annul the Burlingame treaty, no more can the Constitution of the State. Now how does this matter stand? Under that treaty, Chinese subjects can come to the United States, of which, notwithstanding the new Constitution, California is still a portion, and when here have all the rights as to travel, residence, and employment that have native-born citizens or foreigners, subjects or citizens of the most favored nations. True, corporations are the creatures of the Legislature, and have only such rights as the Legislature chooses to grant to them. But in this case it is not the corporation that is injured, but the Chinese resident, standing upon his treaty rights, guaranteed by the faith of the nation. True, the Legislature could enact that corporations should not employ mules or use machinery, but mules and machinery are not residing in the country by virtue of the Burlingame treaty. Mules and machinery have no standing in court; they can not be brought up on habeas corpus. Judge Sawyer knows them not, except as mere chattels. The Chinaman can say, and will say, to the courts, both State and Federal: "When you enact a law which closes in my face, as a subject of the Emperor of China, an avenue of employment which it leaves open to the subjects of Emperor William, or Kaiser Francis Joseph, or Queen Victoria, that law is in violation of a treaty made for my protection, and this can only be done by the power that made the treaty, or at least by the Congress of the United States." It is not the corporations whose rights are infringed. Corporations have no rights that the Legislature, which makes them, is bound to respect; but the Chinese are men, and until the treaty with China is annulled or modified in that respect, stand before the law precisely as an Irishman, a German, or an American, and the Legislature of California, or even the Constitution of California, can not say lawfully that he shall not work for anybody who will employ him. It may be that a law forbidding corporations to employ anybody, natives or foreigners, might be constitutional—at least, such a provision would not conflict with the Burlingame treaty; but it can not deprive a Chinaman of any right of employment, or bread or rice earning, left open to an Irishman, German, or Yankee. This is the law, and it will have to be maintained. It will have to be so decided by our own Supreme Court; and it is all idle, and worse than idle, for any class to hope for or expect relief from clamoring around the docks, work-shops, or offices of our corporations.

The Chinese question is a national one, and we are compelled to look to the General Government for relief. It is well for us upon this coast to agitate, and even to clamor, for to us this Chinese immigration is a great evil. It is to us a great wrong. It is unkind and unstatesman-like for our authorities at Washington not to heed our complaints and consider some remedy for our wrong. We are making some progress, even by our own efforts, in resisting this invasion. We have made an impression upon the Congress of the United States, and had it not been for what we deem mistaken views by the President, the Burlingame treaty would have been so far abrogated as to have demanded revision. We only wish that our corporations might recognize the fact that their prosperity depends upon the prosperity of the white people of this coast; that they might heed their wishes, so unanimously expressed at the recent election; that they would forego any contest, accept the situation, discharge their Chinese laborers, and employ white people in their stead. We wish they would be wise and bite into the sour apple at once, and accommodate themselves to the interests and wishes of the community in which they live. The argument of necessity for the employment of Chinese labor does not satisfy us. We have seen railroads built in other States without Chinese. Chemicals are assayed, minerals reduced, boots manufactured, woollen mills worked, clothes washed, windows scrubbed, in cities where the Chinese have not gained a foothold. We do not excuse ignorance nor violence for its unlawful acts, but we say to the intellectual and wealthy and thinking class of society that it is unwise and criminal if it does not seriously endeavor to find some remedy for what we regard as the beginning of a great national evil.

These things being remedied or controlled, what is there to hinder our prosperity or retard our progress? What is there to prevent our State from increasing in population and our city from advancing to wealth and commercial importance with rapid strides? Our mines are not decreasing in their yield or lessening in their profits; every year develops new processes and new machinery for their more efficient working. Our area of cultivable lands extends year by year, and our farmers are gaining year by year valuable experience, and know better how to adapt cultivation to the seasons. New lands are coming under tillage, new lands being reclaimed from the swamps, and new lands made available by irrigation. New crops are being raised; while the wine, raisin, and brandy production has within the last two years entered upon an era of profitable development. Improvement is noticeable in every part of the State among farmers, and we do not despair of yet seeing the small fruit-farms of our foot-hill belt becoming profitable under new and better processes of preparing fruits for market. When a larger population shall find its home in our State, and the profit of smaller holdings and better cultivation shall have been demonstrated, it will be well for us.

We are safely passing over the quicksand of agrarian agitation. It has, we think, had its day; and the scare is nearly over. The new Constitution is in some respects a protection against the dangers that threatened us from this spirit of unrest that disturbed our discontented class. It is almost impossible to create State or municipal debts. Legislation is guarded by some most stringent constitutional provisions, and all through the new instrument there is the spirit of economy and retrenchment. The new Constitution might prove a bad instrument if interpreted by ignorant and vicious men; but there is little immediate danger of evil legislation when it is considered that our Senate and Assembly are not composed of the worst material, and that there can be no snap-judgment through the action of the majority of an accidental quorum; but that each bill must be passed upon reading and roll-call of a majority of all the members elected to both houses. We have the good fortune to have chosen a Governor of intelligence and good judgment, who, by business, social, and political association, is identified with the best interests of the State, and who by exercising his veto power can for four years demand a two-third vote to secure the passage of any bad law. Our State is in excellent credit, and almost free from debt. Our city is in excellent credit, and almost free from debt. The Constitution limits the creation of a State debt; makes it impossible to create a city debt, except by a two-thirds vote of all the votes cast at an election held for that purpose. The Workingmen's party has so far kept its promise of good conduct, and, except for the accidental election of a preacher, a vicious and unprincipled political demagogue, as Mayor, we have little cause for disquiet or anxiety. We are to have a new charter, with two Boards, a longer term of office, increased members, and added checks to guard our city treasury; and it is probable that the new charter and the new legislative machinery will be an improvement upon our present condition. It is certain that our next Mayor will be an improvement upon the present incumbent.

General prosperity at the East and throughout the nation; commercial revival and general activity in the world's trade must be felt in San Francisco. National finances are in a sound condition. Money is abundant, and the rates of interest low. Money is keenly anxious for employment, and will flow to those places where it may be profitably and safely employed. Money is a coward, and will only venture where it thinks itself safe. So when these tramping idiots of our sand-lot shall find that they are driving money, employment, and bread beyond their reach by their threats of violence, we presume they will stop biting at their own dirty noses, and then prosperity will return. Our new southern railroad is being pressed with energy. It will give us a new trans-continental highway from ocean to ocean. The Atchison, Topeka & Kansas road is being pushed vigorously, and the more northern road to Puget Sound seems to have a vitality that promises a speedy consummation. The Economist, a paper published in New York, affects to believe that we look with anxiety upon a road that may terminate at San Diego, or at Guaymas in Mexico, lest it should, by the creation of a new commercial city, threaten the supremacy of San Francisco, or the building up of a new city at Puget Sound in the north. We have no fears and no anxiety in this respect. All the money and enterprise that Boston people or anybody else may desire to expend upon any one of our ports will only increase the wealth, the population, and the trade of the Pacific Coast. If some enchanter's wand could set Boston down at San Diego, and transport Baltimore to the splendid harbor of Washington Territory, we should hail and welcome the event. We should endeavor to maintain ourselves as the New York of the Pacific, and endeavor to hold our way in rivalry with these two cities who have not as yet planted even the germs of their future greatness, while we have the honest start of three hundred thousand people and six hundred millions of wealth. We should be glad to have an interoceanic railroad on every parallel of latitude that crosses our continent.

Already we note improvement in our business prospects. We have been through a hard and pinching time. Reverses have overtaken many of our business men. But these hard times, these lessons that have come from stock gambling, these reverses that have checked our prosperous career, will have the effect to teach us wisdom in the future. We note improvements in our city; those completed showing that we have not stood still, even in the past three years; and others begun, indicating confidence in the future. The narrow-gauge railroad connecting us with Santa Cruz, and the new Alameda ferry, is a recent work, and is pressing to completion. The new road to Monterey, and the contemplated improvements at the old Spanish capital, are assuring to us that the railroad people are content with the business outlook. The southern road, and its prosecution and advantages, we have referred to. The construction of the California Street and the Geary Street railroads, the extension of our avenue roads to the Park and ocean, the Presidio road, and the one up Pacific and down Broadway, that ought to be granted by the Supervisors, are important works, and are building up our outside additions, and giving value to lands that have heretofore been unable to compete with our growing suburbs of Oakland and Alameda. The Donahue road has brought its terminus to San Rafael, and this town has within the period of our depression been a thriving village. The North Beach, for almost thirty years a dump for dead cats, has taken a new start and an impulse of fresh energy since the construction of the new sea-wall. New sections are contracted for. The sand-dunes off Black Point and the vicinity of Fillmore Street are moving to North Beach by steam and rail. Our rolling mills are doing a good business. The Mission and Pioneer woollen mills are concentrating at Black Point. Hallidie will soon erect substantial wire-works in the vicinity of Meiggs's Wharf, and there are rumors of important possibilities at North Beach, in locating there one of our largest steam lines. Montgomery Avenue, opened within the past three years, has already become an active business avenue, while the lower part of Montgomery Street and the neighborhood of the Post-office is getting back much of the business that at one time threatened to migrate south of California Street. The Appraisers' store is finished, and will soon receive the courts and government officers. The Post-office is being improved and enlarged. The new ferry-slips and wharves of our water front have undergone a transformation. Our city is not increasing its debt, and the spirit of economy and retrenchment is abroad.

That our city and State are destined to a healthful progress we can not doubt. In the development of an oriental trade, and a tendency of Australian and Asian business to pass through our city and port, we see the promise of an active and increasing commerce. The opening of an interoceanic canal, the completion of our own railroad lines and the building of the Canadian railroad, the increasing importance of the Hawaiian and other islands of the Pacific, the growing coast trade with the States of Central and South America, the closer commercial intimacy between our city and Mexico, and the rapidly developing resources of our agricultural lands and mines, all give us assurance of a splendid future, and one to which we may look forward with hope and confidence. The Republican party has a clean working majority in both houses of the Legislature, with a Republican Governor. Upon it has devolved the responsibility of carrying our State through the crisis of a Constitution enforced upon us by a combination of circumstances somewhat anomalous and unusual. It is the duty of the Legislature to give the new Constitution a generous interpretation and a fair trial. It is also its duty to put down the brakes where ignorance, passion, and demagoguery are likely to gain the ascendancy, and see to it that agrarianism finds no aids in the laws that are to be enacted under it.

In a memorial (anonymous) to the Senate and Assembly, praying that there be no anti-Chinese legislation, it is affirmed that this is the command of Jehovah: "Ye shall have one manner of law, as well for the stranger as for one of your own country." Can any one give the book, chapter, and verse? We should like to know if the command was addressed to the people of California, and with a clear knowledge of the Chinese character.

AFTERMATH.

The following gems of thought and settings of expression are taken at random from the Call's society columns: "A perfect picture of art from top to bottom." "The usual congratulations were indulged in." "The honors of the tea-table were performed." "Mr. Howell is the traveling representative of one of our largest wholesale hardware establishments"—a drummer. "He sent a polite and feeling note of regret." "Their assiduity and care conducted in no slight measure to the enjoyment." "The hall was magnificently decorated, the floor being canvased; the windows were hung with lace curtains"! "One of the most successful entertainments given to the Mission public." "Difficult lot to entertain? "Bewitching strains of music called the dancers to their feet and kept them entranced." "The ladies were elegantly attired." "Eclipsed every other social event that ever transpired in Sonoma County." "On Saturday evening next the annual ball of the Tripecleaners' and Boneboilers' Literary and Social Club will eventuate at Gluemsakers' Hall; and after the festive occasion a prominent and popular member of the club will conduct to the altar a fair and elegant daughter of one of our princely Dead-horse Knackers. After the preliminaries have been indulged in, the nuptials will be consummated in a neighboring temple of religion."

There is growing up in America an earnest, enthusiastic, secret order of native-born Americans, entitled "Sons of America." It demands of its members the qualifications of birth upon the soil, good moral character, the age of eighteen years, a belief in the existence of God. The organization is in favor of free education, is opposed to a State church, and is opposed to any ecclesiastic interference in the affairs of government. Its purpose is charity and patriotism in their broadest and most liberal sense. This organization is rapidly extending, and fast increasing in membership. It means not to relax its exertions until there is a camp in every township within the United States. The Rev. Horatio Stebbins will, on Sunday evening, deliver a discourse to the members of this order at his church on Geary Street. He will treat upon questions touching the order. It is a free lecture, to which all are invited. To-morrow evening at the Unitarian Church.

The General of the Army has been putting his foot into all sorts of hot water. Representative Spear, of Georgia, recently introduced a bill in Congress, the terms of which would abolish Sunday music by the regimental bands. The absurdity of such a measure he who runs may read; and General Sherman is one of those who run. But the method by which the great marcher indicated his dislike to the bill was perhaps the strangest on record in this country. The presence of a detachment of troops at Atlanta has been for some time a social delight to its citizens, its damboys, and its women. To give effect to his protest against the bill, the General wrote to the Congressman that, unless the bill was withdrawn, he would withdraw the troops from Atlanta. Earlier in our history, the Atlantease would have welcomed his resolve. But the great little man must remember that he is not Cromwell, nor Congress the "Barebones Parliament."

A person calling himself "Baillie-Grohman, of the Alpine Club," recently has been shooting in northern Wyoming and western Montana. He writes of his adventures to a London newspaper, boasting that he has killed four hundred animals during a "few weeks' shooting." The "bag" included four buffalo and over seventy Rocky Mountain sheep. Is it not time the hardy Western learned how to shoot, so as to have some of this fun himself? He might begin on this worse than "pot hunter," who has doubtless killed half a thousand valuable food animals for the sheer fun of the thing, leaving the "dead meat" to the coyotes. We wish the sharpest-fanged of that ill-understood fraternity had "Baillie-Grohman" by the throat.

Mr. Charles de Young, it is admitted, is now abroad studying up the life and history of our Rev. Mayor in God. His present field of research is at Leavenworth, Kansas. If Kalloch is all that De Young hopes to prove him, how does this help him, or justify the attempt on Kalloch's life? In the meantime, Kalloch complains, and justly, we think, of the law's delay. Charles does not seem anxious to avail himself of all his constitutional privileges, among which is a speedy trial. We should be glad to see justice done to both parties. We are malicious.

A war has sprung up in Germany against the Jews. It is a war of learned professors, of doctors and rabbins. It is a war of pamphlets and ink. There are some six hundred thousand of the descendants of the two tribes—that were not lost—in Germany. By the way, let us congratulate our fellow-Christians that, out of the twelve tribes, only two were preserved. If the whole twelve had been as prolific, aggressive; and prosperous as the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, there would have been but little chance in the world for us Gentiles. The German Gentiles say that the German Jews get all the best places, shirk all the heavy labors, won't become soldiers or sailors, are too sharp as traders, bankers, and pawn-brokers; and they taunt their Israelitish fellow-citizens with a lack of patriotism and with a want of those qualities essential to a complete nationality. The German Jews, in retort, retail their persecution in times gone by. They reply that the essential facts of their history have developed those traits of which complaint is made. The descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob point out their achievements in arts, the illustrious names of their race, and claim for themselves virtues that do not distinguish their anti-Jewish neighbors. It is a very pretty quarrel as it stands, and one which we will not endeavor to transplant to San Francisco by becoming the ally of either of the belligerent forces. We do not care if the Jews outwit the German Gentiles, or if the latter persecute the Jews. The only oppressed, down-trodden, persecuted race for which we are ever ready to take up arms and break a lance is the abused American, and just now our hands and brains are occupied with the Irish.

The sand-lot is reaping of the whirlwind it has sown. Never in the thirty years' history of San Francisco was there not remunerative employment for all its laborers till Kearney commenced his agitation. From that moment, labor has been in less demand at less wages. A day's work then commanded two dollars as the lowest daily compensation. It is now one dollar, and hard to get. The new Constitution now turns out some thousands of laborers under street contractors. Let the demagogues of the sand-lot explain to their deluded dupes this law.

Let us take a cue from the first Napoleon. There is crying need in this city of the "whiff of grapeshot." The question is, Should it begin first with the newspaper offices—the teachers and guardians of public morality, blind to their opportunities and false to their duty, or ought it to begin and end with the ignorance whose habitat is the sand-lot and whose prophet is Denis Kearney?

Parnell decided to accept the position of commissioner to assist in distributing the Bennett relief fund, provided he might appoint a substitute to act for him until he (Parnell) should return to Ireland. Good of him, but he shows only an indifferent knowledge of what was, or should have been, the object in "tendering him the position"—to get him out of this country.

Poor dear Mrs. Smith, in a sand-lot speech,
Concluded with this intemperate screech:
"I'm hungry; I want an ox killed and dressed,
To keep my jaws wagging—my tongue to give rest!"
O madam, pray do not regard the tongue,
For we don't, although in the middle it's hung;
But those jaws, if they ever get going on ox,
Will never let up till our herds and our flocks,
Our horses, dogs, pigs, and each several goat,
Shall have gone from our gaze down the golden throat.

The Rev. Mr. Cowley, of New York, mentioned last week, has been convicted of starving and cruelly treating the lambs in his "Shepherd's Fold," and will be sentenced to-morrow. When the verdict was announced he "wept bitterly." This is in perfect keeping with his other practices: we never knew a barbarian who was not a cry-baby, nor a sentimentalist who was not a brute.

We are sorry to know that Mr. Parnell, the quarrelsome Irish agitator, is coming to San Francisco. His untruthful assertion concerning the Queen's lack of generosity toward Ireland, his indecent reference to the Duchess of Marlborough, and his quarrel with Bennett, who has given a hundred thousand for charity and nothing for politics, all indicate the small-brained agitator and not the great-hearted philanthropist. The kind of men who will be prominent to receive and welcome Mr. Parnell to our city will not be from the better class of Irish gentlemen.

Presbyterian ladies will undertake to run Lent through the next forty days. Teas, kettledrums, musicales, and lunch parties will not be relaxed. Music and dancing will be dispensed with in deference to the opinions of our Episcopalian and Catholic ladies. Shrimps and oysters will constitute the principal diet.

Before the Legislature appropriates a quarter of a million of dollars to build a Normal School at San José, we suggest the appointment of a committee of inquiry, and submit for its consideration the following conundrums: Upon what principle of political economy does it become the duty of the State to educate school-teachers? How many thus educated at San José are now teaching as a fixed profession? What has been the entire cost of the Normal School since its establishment? We will serve on the committee without per diem or mileage.

The corpses in Marin County are unwaters, and so the wrath of the owner of the cemetery turns on its full-power hydrant against the water company. To think that so many beautiful bodies shall lie "under the sod and the dew," and "await the judgment day," unwaters, with no violets, no lilies, no roses springing from the turf which covers them, is bad enough; but when the man who owns the cemetery, and makes his living out of the sleeping places of the dead, quarrels above his corpses with a water company, the thing becomes objectionable. Where is Marin County, anyhow? and why do these people sound the tocsin, and bother other people about such business? A cemetery owner, no doubt, has a good billet. Probably people die to please him; but when the grim stranger grabs us we would prefer to fly up to heaven under the cool persuasion of a cremating furnace to hiring a hearse to convey us to that arid cemetery in Marin.

Women—if it please them—are not famous for "coming to the point" in a matter of business, but an incident occurred the other day that was pleasantly exceptional. While a committee of "the unemployed" were employed in palavering interminably with a manufacturer as to the advisability of discharging his Chinese workmen, Mrs. Smith, one of the committee, who had patiently listened to a general résumé of all questions immediately or remotely connected with the manufacturing interests of this coast, "spoke up," as our lamented "Little Johnny" would have put it, saying: "I think the main business here is to ascertain whether this firm is willing to discharge its Chinese." We do not quite know whether Mrs. Smith is an exceptionally hard-headed woman, or this business of menacing employers an exceptional business peculiarly suited to the powers and capacities of women.

Good Mr. Pickering does not like wicked Mr. George Augustus Sala, for that gentleman is not enamored of good Mr. Parnell. Sala, in his remarks on Parnell, as reported in a Chicago newspaper, said the Irish had to leave Ireland to get a square meal, and that Mr. Pickering has the intelligence to construe as an indictment against the British Government. Did Mr. Pickering ever have the advantage of reading and properly perpending Dr. Johnson's wise and well-known lines:

"How small, of all that human hearts endure,
That part which laws or kings can cause or cure?"

"Wanted: five hundred workmen to unload schooners—of beer." So reads the sign of a "workmen's saloon" in this city. Less work of that sort, less tobacco smoke, less chin music, less running after strange gods—and goddesses, less spilling of milk and less crying for what's spilled, less of all things bad and more of something positively good, on the part of these schooner-unloading workmen, would drive Chinamen from our factories and rid the twaddle rostrum of Mrs. Smith and Mr. Kearney.

Resolved, that any reporter of any daily newspaper who, having occasion to record the meeting with closed doors of any committee of the Board of Supervisors, shall refuse, neglect, or omit, willfully or by inadvertence, to call it a "star-chamber" session, be, and hereby is, declared incompetent to hold any position of distrust or unprofit on the press of this city.

The splendid rains of the past week will beat the sand-lot by making potatoes so cheap that the most brazen-faced of the base and bog-born will not have cheek enough to promenade the street for alms.

"A lady recently had a premonition," says a contemporary, "that as soon as she should publish her volume of poems, she would die. And she did." We knew the lady—there is a mistake. She dreamed that her book would be praised by Sam Williams in the Bulletin. And it was. Gone to meet Corlett.

Says Kalloch: "De Young from the State has fled;
I'll bring him right back, alive or dead!"
Pray heaven you can't, for before he flew
We'd enough of him. We've enough of you.

A talented contributor writes us (enclosing some excellent verses) as follows: "Good or bad, it is the last I shall write. I renounce scribbling, and

'Swear by yonder starry roof
That henceforth I will be rhyme-proof.'

I want to give away or burn every manuscript on hand, and hereafter attend to my legitimate business."

Well, as the illustrious poet, Dr. Gally, would say, Who's holding you? We understand you are a lawyer—that is your legitimate business. That's first rate. In the pursuit of your vocation you will doubtless come across many interesting incidents which naturally and rightly you will wish to present to the world. Reminiscences and anecdotes of the Bench and Bar are just in our line. Nothing could be more fortunate just now than your entire application to business. The literary lay-out isn't a very good one, that's a fact.

A great author has said, doubtless for the benefit of young writers: "I have observed a fondness for foreign phrases in English writing, usually proportionate to the writer's ignorance of any language other than his—or her—own."

Which reminds one of the same great author's fling at a fellow writer, who builded more wisely than he knew: "Little cares he for congruity of metaphor when he's after alliteration."

It is to be made a felony to engage in any other than politics and sand-lot demagoguery. Possession of a sand-lot is to be declared presumption of theft.

REGULATING WATER RATES.

A New and Popular Form of Confiscation.

We presume there is no way that the Board of Supervisors or the Spring Valley Water Company can escape from that mandatory provision of the Constitution that declares that the Board of Supervisors shall, in the month of February, fix water rates in the city of San Francisco. The Legislature, by the defeat of the Tyler Bill, has virtually declared that it has no authority to intervene, and the power to fix rates is now vested in the municipal board. To us this whole water legislation seems most strange; and, in the position to which it has been driven by politicians, inimical legislation, and unfriendly journalism, most anomalous. To state the present position without going into the details of the company's past history, it is this: San Francisco, occupying a site upon an almost waterless peninsula, in a climate of two seasons—wet and dry—was destitute of water. In the olden time we who are of the earlier residents remember that water was peddled from door to door in carts, and upon the bills a patient, burden-bearing donkey distributed water from casks bound upon his back. Colonel William G. Wood and his associates formed a company to bring in the water of a little lake at the Presidio, and after expensive tunnels, costly aqueduct, and a large expenditure of money, failed to accomplish the work. The Bensley Company, following, was only partially successful, and it was soon apparent that the waters of Mountain Lake were inadequate to the supply of a prospectively great city. Ensign obtained the privilege of distributing the waters of a second spring, located near the corner of California and Taylor Streets.

Business men foresaw the necessity of a larger supply of water, and, with prudent forethought and at great expense, went out to the mountains of San Mateo, and from their streams and rivulets and grassy slopes established a system of catchment, built reservoirs, laid pipes, and conducted water to San Francisco at such a height above tide-water as to accommodate all parts of the city. Bensley's and Ensign's franchises were obtained, pumping works were built at Black Point, and after a large expenditure of money, running through a period of more than a quarter of a century, the result is the Spring Valley Water Company, and an almost perfect system that gives to our people an abundant supply of pure mountain water—water of the very best character. It will be remembered by all business men that, in the earlier stages of this work, wages were high, material was high, and every move was a costly one. Intelligent persons conversant with our mode of carrying on government know the annoyances to which this and all kindred enterprises are subjected by each recurring Legislature and each recurring Board of Supervisors. We know that all such companies are charged with lobbying in the Legislature and with bribery, but we know that no company is willingly dragged into a position where it must pay money to legislatures, boards of supervisors, or courts, to secure just legislation or decisions, or to defend itself against corrupt laws and indefensible decrees of courts. It may be unwise and impolitic and immoral to preserve one's property by such means, but if this company has been compelled to lay out money to protect itself, it has only done what almost every corporation has been compelled to do.

Glancing briefly over this history and coming down to the present time, we find a company that has had no subsidy from the State or city, an enterprise of private individuals, using their own means, who have gone out to the mountains of a neighboring county, where they have purchased some thousands of acres of land—land that the company now owns in fee—and have brought water to the city of San Francisco for the purpose of selling it. The municipal government has conceded nothing to this company in the way of exclusive privilege. It has the right to lay pipes under the streets, as has the gas company, but it must lay them at its own expense. The city gives to railroads the use of streets, and gives them a monopoly of certain highways without cost. The Spring Valley Company has the same right to distribute its water by pipes under the streets as has the milkman to drive his cart over them, and it has no monopoly. When the flippant politician, or the mercenary journalist, or the office-seeking demagogue, talks of the Spring Valley "monopoly," he uses a wrong term. It is not a monopoly, any more than the gas company is a monopoly; and the gas company is no more a monopoly than is Claus Spreckles a monopolist of the sugar industry, or in any other or different sense than any enterprising business man is a monopolist, who by his business sense and expenditure of money establishes a successful manufactory or a prosperous and remunerative trade.

Now comes the people, and by the adoption of a new Constitution declares that the Board of Supervisors, elected by the people who use this water, and legislating for them and in their interest, shall have the power to fix the rates which its people, its corporations, and itself shall pay for this water. This is an anomalous and most strange position in which to put this company. It deprives the company of all voice in the matter. It loses control of its property. The power to fix the rates at which any vendor may dispose of his goods is the power of that authority to confiscate the property. If the municipal government can fix the rent of a building, it takes it from the owner and gives to itself the property. If it can be rightfully done in the case of the water company it can be done to railroads, gas companies, all common carriers, all corporations, all public warehouses, all hotels, and all persons doing business that is in its nature of a public character. It is a dangerous power. In the hands of bad men it is an opportunity to confiscate private property. It is a temptation to which no legislative body should be subjected. It is an alarming stretch of power in the direction of agrarianism. No stronger or better illustration of the danger of this kind of legislation can be cited than the one we are illustrating.

We have a company the stock of which is scattered over the world, owned and held by foreigners, purchased in good faith. It has not paid an average of six per cent. interest per annum. It has never been, and is not now, above par in value. It has expended some fifteen million dollars in money. It has no public aid, no loan of credit, no subsidy; it is, and always has been, a private and personal enterprise. It drags water from its own property and in its own pipes to an adjoining county to San Francisco for sale, and the parties purchasing the water shall say what they will pay for it, and that the company, its stockholders, and directors shall have no voice in the negotiation. The practical result is this: The Democracy and the Republican party each name twelve candidates for Supervisors; it is a heated and close contest, and they outbid each other for political favor by seeing which shall have the courage to do the greatest wrong—which shall steal boldest from the water company—which shall fix the lowest rates. This business, disguise it as we may, is unjust, immoral, and dishonorable. It is altogether dishonest and indefensible. It is dangerous, and opens the door to a kind of legislation that threatens every man's private property. If the Board of Supervisors was a disinterested judicial body, chosen by both parties in interest, or appointed by a disinterested and honorable judicial authority, there would be something more of sense and reason in it. It is a temptation to the Supervisors to do one of two things: To gain popular favor from the people and water consumers by fixing the water rates too low, or to accept bribes from the water company for fixing them too high. It is not for us to intimate what this result will be; but if the Supervisors of the future are as bad as the Supervisors of the past, and the water management is not immaculately pure, there will be such rates fixed as will not relieve us from the present tariff.

It is the duty of the Board, as we understand the law, to fix the rates this month. Then the question is, Under what general rule? We answer, There is but one just rule to be established; there can be no other. It is this: The Spring Valley Water Company to receive a fair and reasonable rate of interest for what its works have cost, its past earnings and dividends being considered, and in addition to this a reasonable amount for carrying on the business and a sufficient sum to keep the property in serviceable condition and good repair. We say the cost, because we are not willing to pay upon what might be esteemed the value of this property when we consider its future, or what it would cost to duplicate it. We would not regard its future, because the rates are to be fixed annually. We would not consider the value of the property to be its cost of duplication. It would cost the city of San Francisco forty million dollars to bring the same amount and quality of water from any other part of the State. The market value of its stock and bonded debt may not represent its true value. It probably does not. The stock is worth some ninety-two cents on the dollar. It is wonderful that it stands up as well as it does under the pressure that is brought upon it. Relieved from threats of confiscation and from political persecution, it would doubtless advance in value. The rate to be fixed should furnish a fair interest on what the work has actually cost.

We have avoided the question whether water is or is not property, because this question is not involved in this discussion—it is a practical one. The city is paying for the cost of bringing the water to the town. Water can have no fixed value; it may be worth thousands per drop to the man dying of thirst; it was worse than valueless to those during the Deluge who were left out of the Ark. The first duty of the Board, as we conceive it, is to pass a resolution declaring the rule upon which it will act, and by which it will be governed; then act upon that rule in fearless and just independence.

A True Story About Animals.

This is Burdette's latest:

"Do you know," said the spotted horse, who is considered a great philosopher by the rest of the menagerie, "that the groomiest hour is just before morning feed-time?"

"Aye," replied the trick mule, "there's the rub."

The zebra said that these remarks were too profound for animals that hadn't been through the entire curriculum.

The carrier-pigeon wondered if a steady course of that treatment would make bombing-birds of all of them?

"Combing birds?" asked the Poland rooster, "there's no carrier-pigeon in the menagerie can lay over me in that feature."

The Mexican dog said he would like to see any man, from the lion-tamer down, comb his hair with a steel curry-comb.

"No," the elephant remarked, "they would have to follow the old recipe for cooking a hare: they would have to first catch the hare."

The buffalo said that, speaking of combs, it was his bornest opinion—

"Hello," the elephant interrupted, "here comes the advertisement of the B. & M. Land Department. Say," he added, "does John Bonnell know you're out of your frame?"

The buffalo asked him if the use of celluloid in the manufacture of billiard balls had affected the ivory trade enough to sour his temper?

But the tiger said the discussion had wandered from the subject, and was growing too purrsonal. "And besides," he added, licking his chops hungrily, as the keeper passed too close to his cage, "it is about breakfast time, and as I don't feel very well this morning, a little manna will be about all I care for," and then, as he made a pass at the wary keeper and missed him, he added that if he couldn't have it, about thirty-five pounds of rare beef would do.

And then the keeper passed around the usual refreshments, and the menagerie speedily ate itself to sleep.

They have invented a gun in England without any lock, and any fool can point it at a person all day long without the usual result following.

It is not decided that women love more than men, but it is incontestable that they know better how—and whom—to love.

People who do not go into society become intellectually emaciated, forever breathing their own mental air, redolent of egotism.

When a woman goes out in a long ulster and a Derby hat, she looks enough like a man to get a seat in a street car. Almost.

Colonel Thomas Scott's first essay in railroad business was made as a station agent at Holidaysburg, Pa.

CHIPS FROM OTHER BLOCKHEADS.

Whenever you see a nobby girl
In an awful nice silk dress,
A-sailing down the avenue
Looking too sweet to bless,
You can't most always sometimes tell,
Unless you happen to know her,
But that her tired old mother
Is home a-scrubbing the floor-er.

A victim of domestic infelicity, who is in the habit of dreaming, should never go to sleep in church. A congregation near Quincy was somewhat startled last Sabbath when a venerable member excitedly yelled: "Here, now! drop that skillet, old woman! If you throw it at me, I'll jam your old bald head agin the wall till you think it's a lodgin' house fur shootin' stars!"

Put some kerosene oil in the stove.
It is thought that her toes
Were turned up as she rose—
By the size of the hole just above.

When General Grant arrived in Cuba, the other day, the island was shaken from one end to the other by an earthquake. When Grant felt the jolting he took off his hat, bowed politely, and remarked to one of the attendants that this was the neatest personal compliment that had ever been paid to him outside of Philadelphia. He should have added, however: "I know that you do not intend this as a compliment to myself, but through me you honor my country."

A hoy arose one winter morn,
And came to breakfast rather late,
Yet raised a fuss because there was
No nice pancake upon his plate.
His father took him o'er his knee,
Raised he his hand off through the air,
And when the boy got loose from him
He hid his spunk ache in his chair.

Listen to this, ladies: It is said no woman who ever was elected to an office, anywhere, ever after received an offer of marriage. Now, don't you go and run for President, and get elected, and sit forever afterward like a lonely whippoorwill on a stump, or the last rose of summer on a picket fence, with nary a young man to come within forty thousand miles of you. Look at Samuel J. Tilden and take warnin'.

His hat sailed high in air, it did,
The hat which pleased his vanity;
Such things we see when winter winds
Do persecute humanity.
And she, poor girl, embraced a post
With tenderness quite curious;
Girls do such deeds when clouds of dust
Are blowing fast and furious.

A Quincy parrot has fallen into the habit of repeating every endearing expression it bears, and it is fun to see the young lady of the house hustle it into the garret every time she holds an extra session with her lover.

Like Brother B., of Pokomoke,
And Brother T., of Ho-ho-ken,
He kissed no aged women-folk,
And never, never kissed the men.
He chose the comely dame and miss—
Then why should people gossip so
About the merely-social kiss
Of Brother Lane, of Kensico?

Terrible vengeance of a husband whose wife has gone off with a bandsomen man: "Dear sir," he writes, "please hand the inclosed set of false teeth to my late wife, and ask her to be so good as to return my father's, which in the hurry of the moment she took by mistake."

There was a man who had a clock,
His name was Mathew Mears,
He wound it regular every day
For four-and-twenty years.
At last his precious time-piece proved
An eight-day clock to be;
And a madder man than Mr. Mears
I would not wish to see.

Mr. Tennyson's heroines "Minnie and Winnie slept in a shell" doubtless because they were afraid Hanlan would saw the boat.

When smug hank-tellers stoop to folly,
And find too late that hooks betray,
What grief can hide their melancholy,
Or make their fluttered souls so jolly,
As having something laid away?

Leap year hangs fire. So far, not a single marriageable man has accepted a diamond ring, or sent out notes announcing his engagement to Miss Japonica Puddifoot.

She cameled up her hacque;
She walked on her toes
And turned up her nose
As she stepped into the hacque.

"It's the prettiest man that I ever saw,"
Said he, as he gazed at the long, lean paw.
Said she: "Don't be giving us so much gush;
You'd much rather hold a royal flush."

It was a Morton Sunday-school boy, who, on being asked what made the Tower of Pisa lean, replied: "Because of the famine in the land."

"Now, don't forget," the fond wife said,
To bring some sugar, tea, and bread,
And starch and prunes and liquid black:
Far down the street a voice yelled back:
"Oh, cheese it!"

It is said that Tennyson is worth one million dollars. The size of the bank account of the Sweet Singer of Michigan still remains a profound secret.

When you go to court your girl, young man,
Keep getting bolder and bolder,
And when the propitious moment comes,
Right in your arms enfold her—and ask her if you dare hope to, some time in the sugar-coated futurity, swear her in to get up on cold mornings and start the fire, while you hold a private seance with old Morpheus pending breakfast.

THE SURRENDER AT APPOMATTOX.

Related by Grant.

I received word that Lee would meet me at a point within our lines near Sheridan's headquarters. I had to ride quite a distance through a muddy country. I remember now that I was concerned about my personal appearance. I had an old suit on, without my sword, and without any distinguishing mark of rank except the shoulder-straps of a lieutenant-general on a woolen blouse. I was splashed with mud in my long ride. I was afraid Lee might think I meant to show him studied discourtesy by so coming—at least I thought so. But I had no other clothes within reach, as Lee's letter found me away from my base of supplies. I kept on riding until I met Sheridan. The General, who was one of the heroes of the campaign, and whose pursuit of Lee was perfect in its generalship and energy, told me where to find Lee. I remember that Sheridan was impatient when I met him, and anxious and suspicious about the whole business; feared there might be a plan to escape; that he had Lee at his feet, and wanted to end the business by going in and forcing an absolute surrender by capture. In fact, he had his troops ready for such an assault when Lee's white flag came within his lines.

I went up to the house where Lee was waiting. I found him in a fine, new, splendid uniform, which only recalled my anxiety as to my own clothes while on my way to meet him. I expressed my regret that I was compelled to meet him in so unceremonious a manner, and he replied that the only suit he had available was one which had been sent him by some admirers in Baltimore, and which he then wore for the first time. We spoke of old friends in the army. I remembered having seen Lee in Mexico. He was so much higher in rank than myself at the time that I supposed he had no recollection of me. But he said he remembered me very well. We talked of old times, and exchanged inquiries about friends. Lee then broached the subject of our meeting. I told him my terms, and Lee, listening attentively, asked me to write them down. I took out my "manifold" order-book and pencil, and wrote them down. General Lee put on his glasses and read them over. The conditions gave the officers their side-arms, private horses, and personal baggage. I said to Lee that I hoped and believed this would be the close of the war; that it was most important that the men should go to work, and the Government would not throw any obstacles in the way. Lee answered that it would have a most happy effect, and accepted the terms. I handed over my penciled memorandum to an aid to put in ink, and we resumed our conversation about old times and friends in the army.

Various officers came in—Longstreet, Gordon, Pickett, from the South; Sheridan, Ord, and others from our side. Some were old friends—Longstreet and myself, for instance—and we had a general talk. Lee, no doubt, expected me to ask for his sword, but I did not want his sword. It would only (said the General, smiling) have gone to the Patent Office, to be worshipped by the Washington rebels. There was a pause, when General Lee said that most of the animals in his cavalry and artillery were owned by the privates, and he would like to know, under the terms, whether they would be regarded as private property or the property of the Government. I said that, under the terms of surrender, they belonged to the Government. General Lee read over the letter, and said that was so. I then said to the General that I believed and hoped this was the last battle of the war; that I saw the wisdom of these men getting home and to work as soon as possible, and that I would give orders to allow any soldier or officer claiming a horse or a mule to take it. General Lee showed some emotion at this—a feeling which I also shared—and said it would have a most happy effect. The interview ended, and I gave orders for rationing his troops.

The next day I met Lee on horseback, and we had a long talk. In that conversation I urged upon Lee the wisdom of ending the war by the surrender of the other armies. I asked him to use his influence with the people of the South—an influence that was supreme—to bring the war to an end. General Lee said that his campaign in Virginia was the last organized resistance which the South was capable of making; that I might have to march a good deal, and encounter isolated commands here and there, but there was no longer any army which could make a stand. I told Lee that this fact only made his responsibility greater, and any further war would be a crime. I asked him to go among the Southern people, and use his influence to have all men under arms surrender on the same terms given to the Army of Northern Virginia. He replied that he could not do so without consultation with President Davis. I was sorry. I saw that the Confederacy had gone beyond the reach of President Davis, and that there was nothing that could be done, except what Lee could do, to benefit the Southern people. I was anxious to get them home, and have our armies go to their homes and fields. But Lee would not move without Davis, and, as a matter of fact, at that time, or soon after, Davis was a fugitive in the woods.

My anxiety for some time before Richmond fell was lest Lee should abandon it. My pursuit of Lee was hazardous. I was in a position of extreme difficulty. You see, I was marching away from my supplies, while Lee was falling back on his supplies. If Lee had continued his flight another day I should have had to abandon the pursuit, fall back to Danville, build the railroad, and feed my army. So far as supplies were concerned, I was almost at my last gasp when the surrender took place.

What a Sonnet Is.

For the instruction—and we hope encouragement—of our huddling poets, who have all gone sonneting, we reprint from the Illustrated London News the following statement of a few of the sonnet's essential qualities. Most of what else it is necessary to know about this "old favorite" of the young and confident bard can be learned from Leigh Hunt's Book of the Sonnet, to which we invite the attention of "aspiring youth," with the caution that it is published in this country in the same covers with a worthless treatise, by a person named Lee, on American sonnets, illustrated with frightful examples:

"The gentle reader" is a highly intelligent and well-informed person, who may not, perhaps, need to be reminded what is the essential peculiarity of a sonnet. Let us be permitted, nevertheless, here to mention that a sonnet is a poem of fourteen equal lines, divided into two parts; the first section containing eight lines, while six lines form the concluding portion. These two parts are distinguished from each other by a striking difference in their structure with regard to the rhyming of the lines. According to the strict rule, there should be only two rhymes in the first eight lines; the first line, the fourth, the fifth and eighth should terminate with one sound; the second and third, sixth and seventh lines should have another similar ending to the ear. The effect is that of twin quatrains, bearing a close external resemblance and, as it were, a sisterly affinity to one another; and these are intimately bound together by the fourth and fifth lines, the last of one quatrain and the first of its successor forming a couplet of themselves. The second portion of the little poem is so designed as to give an agreeable relief to the prolonged stress of the two fourfold rhyming terminations, which have governed its major division. Three rhymes can be introduced, with some variety and freedom of placing them, in this minor division of the sonnet. It was probably suggested, as the Italian name would seem to imply, by a certain feature in the art and practice of bell-ringing, where the chimes for leaving off are different from the more sustained and uniform tune which has pealed from the bells in their principal performance. The concluding six lines may either present a quatrain of two alternate rhymes followed by a couplet, which suits a precise epigrammatic finish of the argument; or three lines, each with its own peculiar sound-ending, may be succeeded by three responsive lines, with a solemnity and tenderness of effect rather adapted to mournful themes. Or there may be only two rhymes, each thrice repeated in the Italian manner of terza rima, and the six lines may form a pair of interwoven triplets; this method gives the air of a perfect separate unity to the second part of the poem.

Now, these laws of metrical composition have a more important use than merely to gratify the ear. They provide, as it were, a singularly advantageous literary framework for the brief and expressive treatment, in a poetical manner, of any subject of imaginative meditation which can be disposed of by the utterance of two or three consecutive thoughts. The main statement of the theme, with its due illustrations and modifications, finds ample space for its development in the first section of the sonnet, which is often printed as a separate paragraph. The secondary part may then be devoted to some logical deduction or inference from the foregoing main proposition, or else to some practical application of it; or it may set forth an exception, if this be the poet's object, to the truth of the general assertion. In any case, the concluding six lines have to say something material, in answer to the sentiment or argument of the preceding eight lines. The whole poem thus properly consists of a strophe and an antistrophe, like those of the Greek dramatic chorus; to which the sonnet is nowise inferior as a vehicle of exalted moral reflection, adorned with pleasing musical effects of syllabic harmony.

"No species of poetry, then, is less frivolous or puerile; and none has been more largely employed for serious contemplative purposes, often dwelling upon the gravest themes of religion, of human duty and destiny, the problems of ethical and metaphysical speculation, and the profound mysteries of life and death. For such uses, and not unfrequently, the sonnet was handled by Petrarch and by Michel Angelo, in the language of its original invention. And it has been consistently applied to such high service by a large number of the worthiest English authors.

"Of the sonnet we could say a great deal more; of its unique structural beauty, like that of a miniature Grecian temple, perfectly proportioned, with a fair surrounding peristyle; of the triumphant grace and orderly force that its harmonized movement lends to a flowing strain of poetic speech; and of the stimulating effect it has upon the process of thought, by exacting the search for appropriate words, and in keeping the fuel of mental emotion held together, as in the bars of a grate, by the regularity of its external frame. These advantages, however, are little understood by any who have not tried experiments in the art, and those who have taken such pains will not require to be told what the sonnet can do."

The Reagan Bill has been defeated in Congress; and, if the argument made by the Hon. James Wilson before the House Committee on Commerce can not be answered, then the bill is justly killed. The Reagan Bill ignores that fundamental principle of transportation that "the longer the carriage the lower the rate." To charge proportionate rates for all distances is to destroy competition. If wheat grown in Iowa must be charged for carrying to New York in proportion to wheat grown in Genesee County, then the wheat-grower of Iowa can not compete with the wheat-grower of New York. It is a practical embargo that destroys the value of Western lands. The principle of cheap rates for long distances is the principle that gives value to distant lands and makes the settlement of the Western States possible. The Record-Union, in an able article discussing the Reagan Bill, says:

"A trial of less than six months would prove that its maintenance must result in the depopulation of the remoter parts of the West, in the ruin of now flourishing cities, in the abandonment of fertile soil, in the paralysis of the growth of the Union. It is a blind and foolish attempt to fetter transportation by applying to it arbitrary rules wholly incompatible with progress."

The Reagan Bill is a menace to the Pacific States. Its passage would not aid Nevada, and would be a calamity to California. The best thing, and the only wise and prudent thing, that Congress can do is to establish a bureau of information, or a national board of railroad commissioners, in order that facts and statistics may contribute to an intelligent understanding of transportation matters. Under the direction and restraint of a Reagan Bill the Southern Pacific Railroad would be of little service to our city of San Francisco or to the State of California.

Americans will not be hankering after the pleasures of Paris very long, now that naughty city is becoming so pious as to close its shops on Sundays, and only thirteen theatres giving matinees on the day of rest! Should this sort of Puritanism get fashionable over there we shall be obliged to stay at home to be really wicked.

LA CRÈME DES CHRONIQUES.

How commendable a thing is politeness between co-tenants!

The lodger on the second floor, looking out of his window, perceives the single gentleman from the fifth story cleaving the atmosphere on his precipitate passage to the sidewalk.

With a bland smile he nods to him, saying, "Ha, Smith! Is that you?"

Poet, who has been reading a few sample copies of his new poem to a friend:

"Come, now, tell me how you find it! Fine thing, isn't it? I always distrust my own judgment, which is apt to be too severe; but it seems to me that many of the lines are finer than the others, but nowhere do I find any that fall below the rest."

A new idea at the Paris Salon this year is the classification of the works of art, so far as is possible, into "sympathetic groups"—all the landscapes by themselves, all the portraits together, etc.

The Charivari depicts a sculptor, paralyzed, on wandering through the gallery, at the spectacle of his knight in full armor, with legs booted and spurred and widely spread, and a lance in his hand.

"What in the name of mercy have you been doing to my equestrian statue?"

"Oh, that's all right, monsieur; the horse is down stairs in the animal room."

At a gathering of ex-pupils of a famous school, two septuagenarians meet who have not seen each other since both were in the third form together, fifty-nine years before.

A common friend introduces them.

"Ah, Balochard, is that you? How you've changed! Hang me if I would have recognized you!"

"Hello, Ducerceau; I wouldn't have known you either. Why, old fellow, you're looking younger than ever!"

They were talking of M. X. "Luckiest fellow I ever knew," said one; "everything succeeded with him—turned out just as he wanted."

"I don't know," hazards the companion; "I know of some occasions when things went contrary with him."

"Bosh, bosh, my dear fellow. Why the last time I met him he said to me: 'Here I am, in perfect health, rich, with a charming and lovely wife, fine children, troops of friends, everything that man could wish. The only thing I have ever feared in my life is lingering illness, and that I have never had and hope never to have.' Well, sir, that night he was struck with apoplexy and died in ten minutes. There's luck for you."

A gentleman in search of a wife consults a matrimonial agency.

"We have just the article—the angel, I should say—that you want," says the manager, blandly, rubbing his hands; "widow lady of twenty-three; husband (aged sixty-eight) died thirteen months ago, during the honeymoon; large fortune invested in bonds and stocks; charming woman; accomplished; her only fault, perhaps, is the severity of her moral nature; but then, having been brought up in a convent—"

The gentleman marries her off-hand, and discovers that all these representations are strictly untrue. Furious, he hies to the matrimonial agency and reproaches the agent with his deception.

"You told me," he cries, "that she was the very paragon of women, that she would make a man ideally happy, that—"

"You illimitable idiot," cries the agent; "if I had thought she was, wouldn't I have married her myself?"

Here is a "local item" from Le Figaro. The translator has conscientiously done his duty—and no more:

Two pigeons were loving each other of love tender. These two pigeons named themselves the one Alfred R., journeyman cooper, the other Julia P., washer of fine. Since two years the two amorous were installed themselves street of Charenton, at the No. 290, when, it there is some days, Alfred quitted the dwelling conjugal. Julia, bitten by the tooth of the jealousy, sought, informed herself, wept an instant, silent, seated on a bench of the Boulevard Richard-Lenoir; then recoming street of Charenton, in the little lodgment where she had been so happy, she took one revolver, and, leaning it beneath the chin, she made fire.

The ball, deviating, came to lodge himself in the maxillary inferior, which was broken in four localities.

Transported to the Hospital St. Anthony, she demanded to resee, before to die, this Alfred of whom the abandoning had reduced her to a such despair. Alfred arrived yesterday night. In seeing him approach of her bed, the poor Julia had a lightning of joy; she stretched the two hands toward her lover, who took her in his arms, and, repenting, tightened her upon his heart.

But all of a blow he backed, frightened.

"Dead! dead!" he cried himself.

In effect, Julia had not had force against the joy of the return; she was dead—well dead.

Around of the bed the assistants wept of emotion.

Poor Julia!

L. J. Gannon and Peter Bell have made a respectful appeal to the President of the Central Pacific Railroad to consider Section 2, Art. XIX, of the new Constitution, and discharge the Chinamen in employ of the company. Governor Stanford in his reply says the company has but seven Chinese in its employ in this county, as against some thousands of white persons, and adds: "The company will ever be mindful of the laws of this State, and will endeavor cheerfully to submit to them as it understands them, or as the courts may construe them. In the management of its business it will be governed, under the laws of the land, entirely by a consideration of what it shall deem, in its own judgment, to be the wisest policy, having due regard for the rights and interests of its stockholders."

Edgar Fawcett looks more like a society man, but the divine afflatus must be there some body writes that his eyes "are as azure as his fringed with dark lashes!" So sweet!

The Queen's Shilling has fairly filled Baldwin's with audiences embracing some proportion of people that one meets. The scene of the play is laid in England; the people are English; the play itself is adapted from the French, therefore it is not English. It is, however, clever. This is the play: The father of "Frank Maitland" (O'Neill), having declined to pay "Frank's" debts, he—as a wholly fruitless youth—enlists in the army, and the regiment is stationed near "Kate Greville's" (Miss Jeffreys-Lewis) father's estate—the Grange. "Kate" sprains her horse's shoulder, and takes refuge in the "Chequers," a public house, where the mistress, "Jenny" (Miss Revel), lends her a change of raiment. Some men of the regiment, including "Maitland," look in for their regular beer, and there is some dialogue between him and "Kate"—in the guise of "Jenny's" rustic cousin. "Jack Gambier" (Welles), artist, and friend of the "Maitland" family, turns up on his way to visit the Grange, and strives to persuade "Frank" to cut the colors and go home. "Frank" agrees to be introduced at the Grange the same evening, in plain clothes, and is then clapped under arrest for being absent from parade. End of the first act. Second act—At the Grange, "Frank" and "Kate" recognize each other, and do a little chaff and a little spoons. Here he meets "Colonel Daunt" (Bradley), newly appointed colonel of the regiment, a martinet and a gentleman, who is to marry "Kate" and take the Grange out of pawn, toward whom "Frank" is made to conduct himself in the spirit of a cad at a chimney-sweeps' ball. In a friendly fencing match (off the stage) the "Colonel" prods him in the arm; the accident is announced, and, to demonstrations of emotion on the part of "Kate," the curtain falls on the second act. Third act—"Colonel Daunt's" quarters. Permission is received from the War Office for "Maitland" to receive his discharge, provided his Colonel shall consent. By this time "Colonel Daunt" has come to perceive the state of affairs existing between "Kate" and "Frank"—who, by the way, steals away from the hospital to have an interview with "Kate," and is concealed by her in a room at the "Colonel's" quarters. "Kate" has begged his discharge, offering the old gentleman her hand as a reward. He, in a benevolent speech, places her hand in "Frank's," and, in a strong moral atmosphere of Bless-ye-me-children, the curtain falls on the third act and the end of the play. The usual comic love business has, meantime, been proceeding on parallel lines between "Jenny," of the "Chequers," and "Sam" (Bishop) of Ours—"Colonel Daunt's" boy—which attains its happy climax along with the gentlefolks.

In its native French The Queen's Shilling must have been vastly entertaining and pleasing. The construction of it is well enough. The interest rises with the development quite to the neat and effective finis; and the dialogue is, presumably, light, elegant, and, if not witty, at least easy. It is done into English, and It's oh, for a grace that is fled!

And it's ah, for a touch that is dead!

It was a light, full-flavored claret; it is a loaded port. For the retort courteous, we have the reply churlish; for neat repartee, we have wit in the plane of tu quoque, tu mentiris, vos damnemini. And finally, while we should discern nothing incongruous in the French Colonel's duel, or his self-conscious and slightly theatric sentimentalism in giving the lady away at the end of the play, both these touches are un-English, and grate on us. Maugre all this, the play was a mons'ous pleasing play, since, for the most part, it was uncommonly well played. Miss Jeffreys-Lewis as "Kate" was dashing without being horsey. The lady misapprehends the optique de theatre for Baldwin's. It is a very small theatre, and one needs to "make up" for it with a light touch. Nothing could have been more admirable than Bradley's testy, simple, explosive, dignified "Colonel Daunt"; a soldier and a tartar, yet never other than a gentleman. His sister, "Mrs. Major Ironsides," was well done by Miss Walters—barring a bouffe grenadier stalk that was quite uncalled for. Mr. Welles did the slight part of "Jack Gambier" in a slight way, that was in perfect keeping. And Thompson's "Sergeant Sabretache" demands praise. Mr. O'Neill can not do "spoons," but it would be unfair not to add that the part of "Frank Maitland" is hopelessly flat. But Bishop! "Sam" of itself is naught, but Bishop makes it a prime feature in The Queen's Shilling. Can any man wonder like Bishop? His face is his fortune indeed.

Shorne's Blithedale Romance is out of print, scarceable in England.

PRELUDES—IN DIVERS KEYS.

The novelty of the week has been the Raff Violin Concerto (two last movements) played by Mr. Wilhelmj at the concert of last Sunday evening. It is a stupid composition, evidently the outcome of one of Raff's many dull and garrulous moods, in which he writes stuff by the ream, without having anything whatever to say. It was written some three or four years ago, and is dedicated to Wilhelmj, by whom—and I think by him alone—it has been played in Germany; is exceedingly difficult and not at all effective. At the same concert Mr. Vogrich repeated his Marmion Overture with a somewhat reduced band. Both the heauties and the faults of the work became more clear on a second hearing; it is full of evidence of a very decided poetic quality, as well as considerable aptitude in handling masses both in formal construction and in instrumental coloring. I am now, however, convinced that the weakness of the overture is in its form, which is too diffuse; it requires concentration, and—above all—a climax. What should be its climax, or central episode, is now cut up into three or four lesser ones which necessarily all fail of their effect. But, in spite of this blemish, it must be considered a work of great promise.

I wonder what our theatre-goers would say if Miss Morris or Mr. Barrett were to announce a performance of, say Romeo or Hamlet, and then, without any explanation whatever, give only the last two or three acts of the play? I fancy that there would be very little hesitancy in denouncing such a proceeding as a fraud, and very properly, too. Nevertheless, this is precisely what Mr. Wilhelmj has done in almost every programme he has offered to our public; he has announced concertos by Paganini, Lipinski, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Bazzini, and Bruch, and out of them all has played only one—that of Bruch—in its entirety. Of the others he has always—without any notice or apology whatever—given only one or two movements. This is the kind of thing Mr. Wilhelmj would not dare to do abroad, or even in the larger Eastern cities; it is evidently what he considers proper for a Western village, where the people do not know the difference between an entire concerto and a fragment of it, and where, in their enthusiasm over the elegant, gentlemanlike manners and profound intellectual qualities of a great artist, the honest burghers slop over into testimonials, silver bricks, etc., etc.

A propos, a late Paris paper brings the report of a suit brought against the director of the Grand Opera by a gentleman who, having bought seats for a representation of La Favorita, complained that the omission of an aria from the sixth scene (said omission not having been previously announced) was in violation of his rights, which were to a performance of the entire opera. He had bought his tickets on the promise of a performance of La Favorita, and not of such portions of it as the director or his singers chose to give, and in this the court sustained him, awarding him his entrance fee, besides damages. I wonder what chance such a suit would stand in one of our courts?

Mr. Henry Ketten took leave of our audience on last Monday evening, playing on that occasion a long and brilliant programme of piano-forte music with his customary brilliancy of style and powerful effect upon his hearers. His best numbers—always excepting his own compositions, of which the new Marche Persane was particularly quaint and original—were the Chopin Impromptu in A flat, the Bach Fugue in C sharp minor (charmingly rendered), and the finale from Schumann's Carneval. Mr. Ketten's stay in San Francisco has been marked by a most brilliant success, and I may say that we shall all be glad to see and hear him again whenever he may like to come.

The Handel and Haydn Society is studying Mendelssohn's Saint Paul, presumably for public performance. Now that this society has found, in Mr. Gustav Hinrichs, an able and competent conductor, it is to be hoped that it will see the wisdom of leaving the musical direction of its affairs entirely in his hands; in which case we may hope for an eventual good result from its work. Nevertheless, it seems to me as though Saint Paul were rather big game for it to fly at in the present condition of affairs. I wonder whether it is possible for any society of musical amateurs to be modest, or have any idea of its own weaknesses and shortcomings?

The programme for the matinee which is to be given at the Bush Street Theatre on next Thursday afternoon—for the benefit of Mrs. William V. Wells—contains, among other attractive numbers, Schumann's Papillons, for the piano-forte, to be played by Mr. Louis Lissner, which, as nearly as I can recollect, will be the first public performance in this city of that interesting and beautiful work. It is of its composer's early period (Op. 2), and was written before he had subjected his glowing fancy and poetic imagination to the restraints and limitations of conventional form; he was still at this time striking out lustily right and left into new paths and unsounded channels, both of form and technique, bringing to the surface many a bright pearl of thought or glittering gem of piano-forte effect, and horrifying the respectable Dryasdusts of German newspaper criticism by the audacity with which he ventured to write what he thought and felt, instead of confining himself to what they had been taught to consider as proper and regelrecht. The Papillons is a series of vividly characteristic sketches in color, alternately grave, humorous, and sentimental; at times almost bizarre with the extravagance that is a part of Schumann's earlier method, and again tender and delicate, as he alone could be when in the softer mood. It is altogether a delightful work, and Mr. Lissner (whom I have heard play it in private) plays it with a full appreciation of all its subtler quality.

At this matinee, Mr. Ferdinand Urhan will also sing some Songs of Schubert, which I wish that all interested in song-singing would hear, since he sings them admirably. Besides his beautiful voice, Mr. Urhan has the advantage of having studied Schubert in Vienna—where Schubert lived and wrote, and where for many years past there has existed a sort of culte for his works—and consequently may be regarded as having the correct tradition regarding his Songs.

At the Bush Street Theatre the week has been almost entirely given over to Balfe, whose Bohemian Girl has been unexpectedly successful. The opera has been nicely mounted, and—as a whole—reasonably well sung; certainly quite as well as such puerile and insipid dramatic music is entitled to be. I do not know but for singers of the calibre represented in the Melville Company these English operas of the hall school are the best thing, after all; they are, as I said before, puerile, childish, and undramatic to a degree that makes it almost impossible to sit one of them out; but a fair representation of them is possible, and their very weaknesses are so many elements of strength with the general public, which likes tunes that it can readily catch and understand, few ensembles (and those as transparent and undramatic as possible) and plenty of high notes and lours de force. Of the latter we had a number from Mr. Turner—"Thaddeus"—who, for the rest, sang the part abominably, or rather didn't sing it at all. This gentleman, who has a really excellent voice and good stage presence, has almost everything still to learn; he sings at present almost constantly at the top of his voice, bringing down the gallery with his fortissimo A's and B flats, and at the same time makes it very clear that he is shouting away his voice as rapidly—and disagreeably—as possible. Miss Melville is in many ways a delightful "Arlene"; the part—a soprano—is somewhat high for her, but she gets through the music musically, and makes good her vocal shortcomings by her dramatic spirit. Miss Montague makes a fine part of the "Gipsy Queen," both dramatically and vocally, and Mr. Peakes's "Devilshoof" is on a line with the other exaggerations he has given us this season. In his confidence in his own ability to do, this gentleman constantly overdoes; his "Devilshoof" was a mere buffoon. Chorus and orchestra as usual beneath criticism.

The orchestra at the Baldwin Theatre has this week been playing an arrangement—by Mr. Widmer—of Mr. Ferrer's pretty Cuban song, Los Lindos Ojos; not well arranged, I think, and certainly not played at all in the spirit of the original composition, but still, even in this form, an exceedingly attractive and bright little piece. I was sorry during the run of The Chimes of Normandy to find Miss Melville using the same song—as an interpolated number—to bring herself nightly rounds of applause, without ever giving any credit to its author; as he gets nothing more out of whatever drawing quality his song may have, it seems to me that a word of acknowledgement, which would cost only a line on the bills and a few drops of printer's ink, would amount only to a decent courtesy which a singer ought to be happy to extend to a composer who has furnished the brains for a performance that she ekes out with her physical advantages.

But in this country we don't do things in that way; our singers take their cues from the publishers, and they are so accustomed to steal from foreign composers—who are without protection under our laws—and find this so much cheaper than the paying for the work done at home, that one can hardly wonder when the singers consider themselves entitled to appropriate anything they can lay hands upon, without even so much as "By your leave," or "Thank you." Mr. Ferrer might compose an hundred songs, of which every one should be as pretty as this Lindos Ojos, and probably the only advantage he would derive from them would be in the satisfaction of having written them. So long as the publishers can steal, Mr. Ferrer would not get paid for his work, and until they are compelled to do otherwise, very few singers will have the decency to credit him with his share of their success. A short Italian prayer which is not without wisdom: "I pray that I may never be married."
"But if I marry I pray that I may not be deceived."
"But if I am deceived I pray that I may not know of it."
"But if I know it I pray that I may be able to laugh at the whole affair."

The young man whom you saw carrying a blue handkerchief with a white border on two sides and a red border on the other, was not, as you unkindly insinuate, a relic of the old French Republican days, but simply one of those extremely fashionable youths who buy new things without regard to their prettiness.

To Miss Clara Morris.

To pay our debt to thee we vainly try.
We hear within a thwarted life's hard ache,
But thou our pangs that dumbly writhe canst make
A splendid, palpable, red agony.
Our hearts are lighter by thine anguished cry.

Thine all the senses' stormy symphonies,
The crisis of our morbid modern thought,
A panther's grace, convulsion overwrought,
Malady's haggard apotheosis—
These things thine art, thy nature more than these.

For oh, the whirlwind and the earthquake past,
The still, small voice of heaven's own tenderness,
Vibrating through with unshed tears' excess,
Fills the heart's hunger; memories thronging fast
Bring up the voiceless dreams that speak at last.

Hail, then, high Priestess at pure Passion's shrine!
Be martyr to the fame that wraps thee round.
Measure fulfillment, by our pulses' bound,
Of that Promethean destiny of thine,
O'er our chill clay to breathe the spark divine.

PHILIP SHIRLEY.

Social Sacramento.

DEAR ARGONAUT:—We went to a lecture last Wednesday night. We heard California eulogized and slandered; but we like your scatter-brained Mayor. We like your shot-scarred Kallloch. He is an orator, a scholar, a man of humor. His clerical robes, to be sure, aren't very long, and we've seen whiter; and preacher and politician doesn't sound very euphonic. But if he is called a bold, bad boy by that sheet of veracity (?), the Chronicle, Kallloch, "with all thy faults, we love thee still!" And honestly, now, faulty people are very much more comfortable to get along with; and people haven't any business to be perfect in this world, where, as Kallloch said, "climate nor anything else is perfect." These play-perfect people make us feel so lonesome; and it's real cruel of 'em, you know.

Ketten was here again last Saturday. Some people were mean enough to say he was an agent, on an elevated, aristocratic scale, for the Chickering. And that's all we're going to say now about these fellows who advertise preaching, politics, or pianos. Friday night we heard that a Miss Gee, a music teacher, gave a piano recital in the Congregational Church, for her pupils, and afterward entertained some of her select (we thought it must be exceedingly select, as we were not honored) friends. But as she didn't see fit to invite us, we don't feel under any obligations to do the "paradise" business for her. Monday night, Norton Bush followed in the wake of some of your artists, and invited many of his friends to a private view of his late paintings. He has very handsome rooms for his studio in the Masonic Building. Artists are always supposed to be in the last stages of starvation. But, goodness! you wouldn't think so if you should go into our tropical artist's rooms. They are elegant, no mistake; and we are perfectly confident that Mr. Bush lives in clover; and he ought to, too, for he's a right good fellow, and well liked by all the Sacramentans. He has wearied a little of his renowned tropical style, and showed us very creditable Robinsonian marine scenes, some still-life studies, also something in the charcoal line; and many of those little panels and palettes and things were scattered around the room. He had thirty-three pictures altogether, handsomely framed, and that's always half of the picture. His style of painting is very cheerful, and we think he is right to always make them so bright and cheerful. Who wants to look on his walls and see a scowl scowled all over the canvas? We admire his vermilion poses and his gorgeous suns. Heaven knows there's enough of clouds in life in reality without painting them. All the artistic people of the city were there. Mrs. G. W. Chesley, who really stands at the head; Mrs. Houghton, who has done some remarkably good work for the short time she has been studying; also Mrs. W. B. C. Brown; young Loomis, a boy of perhaps twenty years, who has exhibited unusual talent; our sculptress, Mrs. General Coshy; Mrs. Bin-gay, who paints so well in water-colors; Miss Kittie Almond, who keeps such a pretty studio on J Street, filled with all the pretty photographed faces, colored so nicely, and others; Mrs. Hubbard, Mrs. Rhodes, Mrs. Lewis, Mrs. Beckman, Mrs. Reed, Misses Perry, Seeley, Tyrell, Russell, and Felter. Our host served us a delicious little supper, and, after two hours spent in delightful conversation, Mr. Bush's very appreciative visitors departed, leaving him certainly well pleased with his success as an entertainer, as well as an artist.

SACRAMENTO, February 16, 1880.

A Zulu youth can not marry a girl until he has whipped all her brothers, and given her father a fall, if demanded, in addition. This makes a courtship more exciting than chocolate caramels and gumdrops; but the Zulu maiden who has four brothers weighing one hundred and eighty pounds each, and measuring fifty inches around the waist, generally dies an old maid; while the girl whose brothers are weak and sickly, and whose father is sleeping beneath the daisies, is overrun with proposals. It is a queer custom, and if it were in vogue in this country a girl who is an only child, and a half-orphan on her father's side, would be at a premium.

If there be anything that will cure a man of the idea that he is a superior being, it is to be caught down town without his overcoat by a biting east wind, and to have his wife, warmly wrapped in seal-skin, come in to walk home with him.

"MOTHS" THAT CORRUPT.

Whatever people may think and say of Ouida and her writings, it still follows that she is popular, and every new book from her pen is a financial success to her and her publishers. We take this bit of gossip concerning her new book from the New York Times: Ouida's new novel, Moths, will see the light next week. Chatto & Windus are the publishers. A friend who has read the proofs tells me the story is "Pucky." Ouida does not now, and, I think, never did, go in for serial stories; so that her works come out with a special freshness of their own. She is never at her best unless she is nasty, and then, as Pat would say, she is at her worst. Her muse loves the nude. She is a female Swinburne among novelists. Moths, I am told, begins at Trouville, and, of course, among the fashionable sirens of that scandalous bit of court, where Phryne and Circe display charms which Conty indicates so cleverly in the Thumbnail Sketches of his little guides. The heroine is "Lady Dolly's" daughter, "Vere," and the book opens with the following discussion about "Miss Vere's" bathing dress:

"That thing!" gasped Lady Dolly.
"What is the matter?" said Vere, timidly and perplexed.

"Matter? It is indecent!"
"Indecent?"
"Indecent," reiterated Lady Dolly, "if it isn't worse; good gracious! it must have been worn at the Deluge. You shall have one like mine made to-morrow, and then you can kick about as you like. You shall see mine."

She rang, and sent one of her maids for one of her bathing costumes, which were many and of all hues. Vere looked at the brilliant object when it arrived, puzzled and troubled by it. She could not understand it. It appeared to be cut off at the shoulders and the knees.

"It is like what the circus-riders wear," she said.
"Well, it is, now you name it," said Lady Dolly, amused.
"You shall have one to-morrow."

Vere's face crimsoned.
"But what covers one's legs and arms?"
"Nothing! What a little silly you are! I suppose you have nothing the matter with them, have you—no mark, or twist, or anything? I don't remember any when you were little. You were thought an extraordinarily well-made baby."

"Might one then go naked provided only one had no mark or twist?" Vere wondered.
"I would never wear a costume like that," she said, quietly.
"You will wear what I tell you," said her sweet little mother, sharply; "and, for goodness' sake, child, don't be a brute, whatever you are. Prudes belong to Noah's Ark, like your bathing-gown."

Vere's serge frock provokes her mother's disdain:
"It is the cut," she said, dropping her glass with a sigh; "it can't be Morgan's."

"Who is Morgan?" asked the child, so benighted that she had not even heard of the great Worth of nautical costume.
"Morgan is the only creature possible for serge; you don't seem to understand, darling; material is nothing, make is everything. Oh, my dear child, cut your gown out of your dog's towel or your horses' cloths if you like, but mind who cuts it; that's the one golden rule."

"Lady Dolly" is one of those creatures who talk bastard art and cheap advertisements. Her conversation is loaded with references to well-known models, coupled with the names of composers, artists, Adam and Eve, and the Deity. "She is really very pretty," she says to her "cousin" as he cloaks her and pockets her fan; "really very handsome, like Burne-Jones's things, and all that, don't you know." How odd it is that the aristocracy of England should be supposed by the Jenkinses and fashionable novelists of the day to talk like that, and mothers of their daughters, too! "Vere" one day, with her bare legs in a sea-pond, is startled by a voice singing snatches from Mozart's Requiem. The singer is a Marquis, who is prouder of being tenor than an aristocrat. The girl calls him the "angel Raphael." She loves him. By and by, when she goes away from home to a distant land, he calls to say farewell. Of course, he brings with him a bouquet of stephanotis and orchids. Notwithstanding her love for the singer, "Vere" is forced to marry a Russian prince. She hated herself after that.

Then there is a complication, in which the lover (not the husband) considers he is called upon to defend the honor of the wife, much after the manner of one of Bronson Howard's heroines in The Banker's Daughter. The difference is that the lover fights the husband, and it begins in this way: The husband has allowed "Vere," his wife, to be traduced. The tenor can't bear it. He meets the husband and tells him he intends to avenge his wife's honor. "Her honor!" echoes the husband "mais c'est a vous, Monsieur." The tenor raises his hand and strikes him on the cheek. "You are a liar, you are a coward, and you are an adulterer," says the tenor, "in his clear, ringing voice, that rang like a bell through the silence of the assembled people, and he struck him three times as he spoke." The book is full of wicked, impossible people; women "like Rubens's figures," women "dark, full-lipped, almond-eyed," and mulattoish, "red and white actresses, gorgeous men, princes, marquises—heaven knows how many—and white, prancing mules, with Spanish trappings and mulatto servants dressed in scarlet, going about the Bois in Paris. Those readers who like Puck will be delighted with Moths.

The Literary and the Personal Dickens.

An Eastern newspaper critic writes: "It is a disagreeable thought to a large number of people who admire the works of Charles Dickens almost to the verge of worship, to be obliged to admit that their hero's fame is on the decline." The writer then quotes the following extract from one of Mr. Smalley's London letters to the Tribune, in justification of the assertion:

"Whether Dickens's fame has, on the whole, been increased by the publication of his letters may be doubted. I have often said that I thought his literary fame was declining; not rapidly declining, perhaps, but appreciably less from year to year. His admirers, who are still in the majority, have now to admit that, on his own testimony, their hero was considerably less heroic than they have heretofore maintained. There is a curious tone of regretful surprise in the notices that have appeared of this book and in the comments one hears privately. Your article on 'Dickens the Man' has been echoed here over and over again. The intense, overpowering egotism made manifest by his letters is a painful revelation—not to those who knew him best, but to those who loved
